To the most High and Mighty Monarch, ELIZABETH, (my dread Sovereign) by the grace of God, Queen of England France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith &c.

AL my labour whatsoever, in translating another mans work, I present here unto your Highness, and consecrate to the happy and immortal memory of your most sacred Majesty. An attempt (I confess) in regard of mine own imperfections, venturous and bold, as the first enterprises right hard and exposed to perill. Yet, most worthy and Powerfull Empress; Who is therefore insufficient, that by the favourable aspect of your countenance, may not be graced and enabled? What so difficult and dangerous, which under the fortunate auspices of your Majesty, cannot be effected with ease and pass in safety?

Accept then, most gracious Lady, the first fruits of a few years study, for the benefit enjoyed of life and liberty. An offering, as well in that respect, as of myself the meanest of many thousands, under all proportion; but considering either the argument or the first Author, not much unfitting. He, in penning the History of the greatest State in his time, for exquisite eloquence had not his equal; no more than your Highness in glorious government at this day any second: Such are the incomparable perfections resplendent in your Royal person; the wonder of the world.

Vouchsafe also, of your accustomed clemency shewed to aliens, of your fervent zeal to learning and good letters, wherein (among other rare virtues and singular gifts seated in your Heroick mind) no Prince cometh near unto your Excellency, to reach forth your gracious hand to T. Livius: who having arrived long since and conversed as a meer stranger in this your famous Island, and now for love thereof learned in some sort the language, humbly craveth your Majesties favour to be ranged with other free denizens of that kind: so long to live under your Princely protection, as he shall duly keep his own allegiance, and acquaint your liege subjects with religious devotion after his manner, with wisdom, justice, virtue, valour, loyalty, and not other wise.

And the Almighty guard your Majesty alwaies with his holy Angels, prolong your life among us in perfect health, adorn your noble heart with divine graces, maintain your Regall estate in all honour: blest the rest of your daies (and infinite may they be) with sweet repose and firm peace, to the joy of your true-hearted and loving people; and finally, accomplish all your desires for present prosperity and future felicity.

Your sacred Majesties most humble and obedient subject, Philemon Holland.

TO THE READER.

The Rue is that Axiome received from Philosophy, τὸ ὅτι ὅτι τὸ γένος ἑνὸς ἐκ τῶν ἑνῶν, i. The corruption of one thing is the generation of another. Thus out of the ashes and ruins of Troy sprung the City of Rome: and by the woful fall of that one state, arose not only the most glorious empire of the Romans, but also the best writer of their history, Titus Livius. For whereas after the fatal destruction of Troy, two principal men of name remained alive, Æneas and Antenor: the one with his fleet arriving in that coast of Italy where Tybre runneth, built Lavi-num, and became the first father of the Romans, according to Virgil in the first Æneid:

genus unde Latinum, Albanique patres, alia moenia Romæ:

from whence are Latines come,
The noble Albanes eke, and walls of stately Rome.

Antenor entered the Venice gulf, & founded the City of Padua, the native place of Livy their historiographer, as the same Poet writeth a little after:

Hic tamen ille urbem Patavi I sedesque locavit Teucrorum, &c.

Yet here the City Padua built he: therein to plant His Trojanes, left when Troy was lost, who resting seat did want.

And I wot not well, whether they were more beholden to that fortune of theirs, (whereof so much they boasted) for Æneas the author of their beginning and admirable greatness: than for this writer Livy, who commended their deeds to everlasting fame. For from their very first rising [even with Æneas] unto their sensible declining and decay, were not 1200 years compieat: but since Livy enchronicled their acts, sixteen hundreds are come and gone: yet continue they as fresh this day as at the first, and spread stil far and neer into all parts of the world. So much more durable and permanent are the memorials recorded by learned Historian, than either any Monarchy be it never so great, or all those wonderful Pyramids and Obeliskes, reared by most magnificent Kings, and mighty Emperors, to immortalize their name and memory. This T. Livius was born at Padua, in the year 694 after the foundation of Rome, when franius and Q. Cælius Metellus Celer were Consuls. He flour-rished all the time of Augustus Caesar, and died in the fourth year of Tiberius. By which account, he lived full LXXVI. years: as appeareth by an ancient Epitaph upon his tomb at Padua, (where it is thought he died) with the pourtrait of his visage: whereof the one is reprinted here, and the other immediately before the beginning of the History.

Other evidences there be concerning the same, which needles it were to call to witness: for no Epitaph nor inscription either enchaſed in ſtone or cut in braſs, is there left, better than the monuments of his own writings (if they had come entire to our hands) and the testimony of good and approved authors. For during the time of Augustus, he wrote the worthy deeds of the Romans, and continued the narration thereof from the very foundation of the City of Rome unto the one and twentieth year of his Empire. A ſtory of 750 years, and a peece of work for the artiſt: all frame and elegant ſetting out, comparable to the beſt in that kind. My purpoſe is not here, to enter into a large field and Rhetorical diſcourſe of his praifes in regard of any gifts of fortune wherewith he was plentifully enriched: namely, the place of his nativity, a City more ancient by 400 years than Rome; flouriſhing in martial puiſſance, able to ſet out and maintain 100000 fighting men for the wars; in ſtately port at home, having a nobility of 400 in number; in gorgeous and coſtly buildings; in traffique and frequent affluence of Marchants thither; as alſo, that Venice was a Colony deducted and drawn from thence; and, which is not the leaſt, how at this day the famous Univerſity there, affordeth excellent Profeſſors in all kind of learning: nor his happineſs and felicity to live and die with the glory and beauty of Rome, and not to behold with his eyes thoſe daies of her declining ſtate & deformity, which in great wiſdome he foreſaw in his ſpirit, and denounced accordingly: ne yet the ſpecial favour wherein he ſtood with his Prince Augustus, and Livia the Empreſs: much leſs then mean I to ſet forth the ſingular qualities and perfections of his mind, and namely his rare and paſſing eloquence, which my pen is more able now to deſcribe and amplify to the worthineſs thereof, than it was to imitate and expreſs the ſame in tranſlating of his ſtory. Moreover, if I ſhould ſet into his commendation, beſides that I muſt needs come far ſhort of his merit, the thing it ſelf would but renew the juſt grief, that all learned men have taken for the piteous maine and defect of that notable peece of work & uniform compoſition which he left unto poſterity. For having digeſted the whole hiſtory into an hundred and two and forty books, as Petrarch was of opinion, and as Sigonius therein well collekteth: like as alſo it is evident by the Breviaries of L. Florus the Epitomift, whereof we have 140, with an evident flaw and default of twain, to wit, the 126 and 137: ſee the partial injury of the time, the crooked and maligne deſtiny of the man! Books of far leſs moment and importance, yea, & thoſe of greater antiquity, have been ſpared & remain ſafe: but of that work of his, one fourth part hath not eſcaped the envy of fortune: and that which now is extant, hath been delivered unto us either by fragments of old copies unperfect, or by the over-curious meddling of ſome buſy Ariſtarches of late daies depraved, who with their correcting have corrupted; and in ſtead of reforming words, have deformed the natural ſenſe and primitive conſtruction. Where, by the way, I muſt advertiſe the Reader of that which Petru Crinitius hath obſerved, even againſt the common opinion proved by thoſe who otherwiſe are well learned, namely that our Author dispensed not this history into Decades: that is to say, suted and sorted them not into several Tomes and Sections of ten books a peece. For Priscian and other old Grammarians; when they cite any testimony out of Livy, quote the book, and make no mention at all of any Decade; and with him the above-named Petrarch, Florus, and Politian do agree. Now in these 33 books, so few as they be preserved as another Palladium out of a generall skare-fire, we may conceive the rare and wonderfull eloquence of our writer in the whole; for the farther he proceedeth into a world, as it were, of matter, the more copious still he floweth; and with such variety, as that he never iterateeth one thing twice; but at every change of new affairs, returneth alwaies fresh and gay, furnished with new devils, inventions; and phrases; much like a second Anteus, gathering greater strength and more forces still at every turn; or after the manner of a little hill, which issuing from a small source, is maintained with fresh springs and new riverets; and hasting toward the vast Ocean, carrieth a deeper channell and broader stream. For the form of his stile, I refer the readers to the sound and staid judgment rather of Quintilian, who compareth him with Herodotus, Thucydides, and the best Greeks; than to the fantastick conceits of some Critics of our time, who seeking nodum in circo, have dreamed of I wot not what Patavinity in him. What should I speake of that Patheticall spirit of his in moving affections? But, that which most of all commendeth an history, which being lux veritatis, ought especially to mendeth an history, which being lux veritatis, ought especially to deliver with sincerity the whole truth and nothing but the truth, without respect of face or person; to keep only to the substance and train of the subject argument; the due and orderly regard of the important circumstances thereto belonging, without incerting extravagant and impertinent by-matters, much less than fabulous tales; therein he hath the prick and price above all others. For, neither forbeareth he to reprove (as occasion is offered) the Romans, in whose favour he might be thought to have written; nor doubteth to praise the good parts and the valiant exploits of their mortall enemies. The Gauls he may seem to gall more bitterly upon a sinister affection, glancing at them as he doth, in many places for their greedy desire of gold and idle sloath, as not able to endure any long travell, and heat least of all; yet so, as the French, now living, seem not much offended therewith; for above other Nations they have given him most friendly entertainment, and twice enfranchised him among them. I am not unwilling to touch by the way this principall point and vertue of an Historiographer, I mean the delivery of a simple truth in his narrations; for that I have observed in him throughout, that he hath been most modest in reporting from others by hearsay any thing that soundeth to an untruth; so little deserveth he to be noted with the infamous brand of lye. The wary circumspection of his in that behalf which I dare be bold to recommend unto the Reader, I proposed unto my self in making him English; endeavouring by conference especially of the select copies in Latine, yet not rejecting other translations (such as

I had some little skill in) to come as near as possibly I could, to the true meaning of the Author; making this account, that if I could approve my diligence that way to men of reason and understanding, all other my wants and defects might sooner be passed by and pardoned. A desire I had to perform, in some sort, that which is profitable to the most, namely, an english History of that C.W. which of all others (if I have any judgment) affordeth most plenteous examples of devout zeal in their kind, of wisdom, policy, justice, valour, and all vertues whatsoever. According to this purpose and intent of mine I framed my pen, not to any affected phrase, but a mean and popular stile. Wherein, if I have called again into use some old words, let it be attributed to the love of my country language: if the sentence be not so concise, couched and knit together, as the originall, loath I was to be obscure and dark; have I not englished every word aptly? Each Nation hath severall manners, yea, and terms appropriate by themselves; have I varied in some places from the French or Italian? Censured I look to be and haply reproved; but like as Antibides said to one, παταγον εν ελκυστον, i.e. Strike hardly (Euribides) so you bear me speak; even so I say, Find fault and spare not; but withall, read the originall better before ye give sentence. And howsoever I have faulted otherwise by oversight, let against it my affection and desire to do some good whiles I live to my sweet native country; add thereto the long travell that I have taken to testifie the same; and if that will not bring down the ballance, let the profit and delight both, which you shall find in the argument and discourse of the history, counterpoise and overweigh my wants, more or less. And thus I recommend unto my countrymen Livy in english habit; Livy (I say) who whether he were more honored whiles he lived, than beloved at this day of forraign nations, I cannot easily determine. For like as then (by the testimony of S. Hieron and Pliny in his Epistles) there repaired many great and noble personages from the farthest parts of Spain and France, only to see his face, for the admiration they conceived of him by the fame of his incomparable eloquence; even so of late time, his spirit (which yet liveth in his writings) hath made a voyage by Florence into the same France and Spain, and hath passed as far as into Arabia one way, and Almain another. In which distant and remote parts he hath found such kind entertainment, not only in Courts of Emperors and Kings, in palaces of Princes and great Potentates; but also with the people in generally; that they seem to strive no less (who may endow him with most ample franchises and free burgesie) than those seven cities in old time who every one challenged to themselves the birth of the Poet Homer. Since then, he hath thus long been desirous to cross the seas into this noble Island, not as a traveller to sojourn for a time in the Court only or the Universities, but to remain here still both in City and country, and thereto hath learned our language indifferently; let it now appear that this nation of ours (like to reap as great fruit and benefit by his acquaintance as any other) is ready to receive and embrace him as friendly as the rest.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the First Book.

A He comming of Eneas into Italy, and his att: there, the reign of Ancanus in Alba: of Sylvius Aeneas, and of fourth of other Sylvii. Ciculus therof, are contained in the fi ft Book. The daughter of Numitor with child by Mars, Romulus and Remus are born, Amulius killed, The City of Rome built by Romulus. The Senate by him chosen. He made war with the Sabines. He presented unto Jupiter Feretrius the royall spoiles of their King, whom he slew with his own hands. He divided the people into Centuries, vanquished the Fidenates and Veientians, and was canonized a god, Numa Pompilius taught the rites and ceremonies of sacrifice and divine service, erected a Temple to Janus, and was the first that shut the doores thereof, after he had made peace with all the Nations thereabout: and raising that he had secret company and conference by night with his goddesse Proserpina, won the stout and fierce hearts of the people to Religion. Tullus Hostilius warred upon the Albans, whereupon ensued the combat of the three brethren, twis on both sides, Horatius was acquit for killing his sister. The execution of Metius Sufferus. Alba raised and destroyed. The Albans made free denizens of Rome, and there dwelt. Why denounced against the Sabines. Finally, Tullus was consumed with lightning. Ciculus Martius renewed the ceremonies by Numa first ordained. He to the Latines, being conquered and made Citizens of Rome, he assigned the mount Aventinus to inhabit. He won again by force a town of the Latines called Politiorum, which the old Latines had surpris'd and possess'd themselves of, and wistly destroyed it. He made the Sublician or wooden bridge over Tybris, and adjoynd to the City she hill Janiculum. He enlarged the bounds of the Empire, took Osilia, and reigned three and thirty years. In the time of his reign, Lucumo the son of Demaratus a Corinthian, removed from Tarquinius, a City of Tuscanie, and came to Rome; and there entering into amity with Ancus, (legat to him the name of Tarquinius), and so to be called: and after the death of Ancus took the Kingdom up to him. He encreas'd the number of the Senators by one hundred, subdued the Latines, appointed the Circus or Theatre, for both the publick games and plaies: and being warred upon by the Sabines, he augmented the centuries of the housesmen, and for to make peace and trivall of Accius Navius the Angur his cunning, he dema'd of him, as they say, whether that which he conceived in his mind were possible to be effected: a woman he made a sower, she it was, he commanded him to cut a whistone in two with an arazor, which out of it he did with Accius done. Moreover, he was the field of the Sabines, and defeated themselves, the City about, made the wall'd sink; and when he had reigned eight and thirty years, was murdered by the son of Ancus. Their succeeded after him Servius Tullius, the son of a Captive, a noble Lady of Corinellum, who being a child, and being foaled in the cradle, had caught fire (at the report geath) burning about his head. He discomfited the Veientes and Tuscanes in battell. He was the first that numbred the people of Rome, and after that good advertisement the Lustrum every five years, in which were reputed to have been numbred eighty thousand Citizens. He destroyed the Classe and Centuries: set out further the bounds of the Pomarine, without and within the City walls, and put to the City the hill Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He together with the Latines founded the Temple of Diana in mount Aventine, and when he had reigned four and thirty years, he was, with the priority, slay'd by the compass of his daughter, Tullia, murdered by L. Tarquinius, the son of Priscus. After him L. Tarquinius Superbus usurped the Kingdom, without the election either of the Senators or the people. On which day at Tullia (most wicked and cruel for her truth) she was caught her Carth to be driven over the Corp of her father, lying dead on the ground. It had about him a troop of armed men for the guard of his person. By a subtiltie he put to death Turnus Herdonius. He had w^{ar} with the Volscians, and of their spoils erected a Temple to Jupiter on the hill Capitol, where he had Terminus and goddesse Juvetas, agreed not to be displaced, whose dates could not be stirred nor removed, as the others, by the feir, For whilst the Cavalry stood unresolved, as it were, in a hammering whether to fly or fight, G and the Infantry withal began to retire: all at once the enemies in thronging manner sallied forth the gates, and chaled the Romans to fiercely, that in their eager pursuit they were drawn to the very place of ambush. Thence the Romans suddenly arose, and charged the flank of the enemies: And to encrease their fright, they likewise that were left behind to guard the camp, shewed themselves with banners displayed. So the Fidenates terrified hundry ways, before well near that Romulus and his men of arms could rein about their horse-heads, turned their backs, and rode full gallop towards the town again, and so much the faster, for that they fled now in good earnest themselves, that pursued them, who a little before made but semblance thereof. Yet for all this could they not escape the enemy: for the Romans hard at their heels, rushed together with them pell-mell into the town, H before the gates could be shut against them. At this Fidenation war spreading so dangerously, the Veientians grew angry in their hearts, and began to chafe. Touched they were also in regard of kindred and alliance: for the Fidenates were likewise Tulsans. And fearing lest (if the Roman forces should thus distress and lie upon all the borderers) they being so near should not go free, they were the rather pricked forward, and thereupon made rodes, and entered in arms the confines of Rome, spoiling and rifling, more like robbers than professed warriors. So without pitching any tents, or abiding the coming of their enemies, but only driving and carrying away great booties out of the fields, they return again to Vei. The Romans contrariwise, not finding the enemies in the field, but yet provided and resolved to give battel, and to hazard all, passed over the Tyber. Whom the Veien- tians understanding to be encamping themselves, fully minded to come against their City: sifted I forth and met them, intending to try the quarrel by dint of sword, and in open field, rather then to be mured up within the town, and to fight and defend themselves from off their houses and walls.

There the Roman King with the strength only of his old beaten souldiers, without any other help and supply whatsoever, without policy or stratagem, had the better: and having thus discomfited the enemies, he chafed them even to their very walls. And for that the City was exceeding strong, fortified as well by natural situation, as by walls, he forbore to assault it. But in his return homeward, he wasted the country, more upon a mind to revenge, than hope of spoil. With this defeature the Veientians no less subdued then if they had lost a field, sent Orators to Rome to sue for peace: A unto whom Truce was granted for an hundred years, but they were amerced to lose part of their lands. These were in manner all the acts that were done both at home and abroad, during the reign of Romulus. Whereof none seemed to derogate any jot from the opinion, both of his divine birth K and beginnings, and also of his immortality or deification after his death. Such was his courageous heart in recovering his Grandfathers Kingdom: his policy and wisdom in founding the City first, and after in establishing and governing the same, as well in war as in peace. By whole good proceedings it got such strength, and so sure footing, that for forty years space after, it enjoyed peace with safety.
Nevertheless of his Commons he was better beloved then of his Nobles: but above all, his Souldiers most heartily affected him: of whom he had always about him, as Esquires of the body, L three hundred Penfioners armed, not only in time of war, but also of peace, whom he called Celeres.
Thus having achieved these noble and immortal deeds, as he upon a time assembled all his people upon the plain, at the marsh Capra, there to number or muster his army, behold upon a sudden there arose a tempest with great cracks of thunder, which with so thick and cloudy a storm, covered the King, that the people lost the sight of him. And never after was Romulus seen on earth. The Roman youth, after their fear was at length past, and that upon so dark and troublefome weather, it proved a fair day again, and calm withal, seeing the Kings Throne empty, albeit they credited the Senators that stood next about him, who gave out he was taken up aloft in the storm: yet stricken into sad dumps, as it were for the loss of their father, held their peace a good while. But afterwards, when some few of them had once begun, they all set on and cried aloud, All hail god Romulus the son of a god, King and Father of the City of Rome: With earnest prayer beseeching him of his grace, that he would vouchsafe to be propitious, and save their off-spring and posterity forever. I am of this mind, that some there were even then, that suspected and secretly surmised that the King was pulled in pieces by the hands of the Nobles. For this rumor also was bruited abroad, although in very dark and obscure teams. But by reason of the high admiration of the man, and the present fear withal, the former opinion took place, and was more current. Over and besides, it grew the rather credible, through the politick practise of one person. For as the whole City was penfive and rowful for the misis of their King, and sore displeased with the Senators, one Proculus Julius, a substantial good author (as men say) and to be believed in a matter of great importance, stepped forth into the assembly. Romulus (quoth he) O Quirites, the Founder and Patron of this City, even this very morning at the day break, descended suddenly down from heaven and met me, and as I stood all quaking for fear, ready to worship him, and humbly beseeching that I might behold him face to face: Away (quoth he) and tell the Romans that the will of the gods in heaven is, that my City of Rome shall be the head and chief of the whole world: will them therefore to follow and practise chivalry, and the knowledge thereof: and wor this world, and so let them reach their posterity, to wit, That no power in the world shall be able to withstand the puissance of the Romans. Which (said he) was not so foon spoken, but he ascended on high, and departed. A wonder it was to see, how much they gave credit to this mans tale, and how greatly the misis of Romulus both among the Commons and the Army, was by this belief of his immortality, digested,

- A In this mean while the Senators fell to strive who should be King, and the desire of sovereignty troubled much and perplexed their minds. But as yet, there was no bending nor riding from any one person in particular: for that in a State to newly risen, and of so small continuance, there was not one that far excelled another in authority. All the contention was between the two several factions in general. For they that were defended of the Sabines, fearing lest because after the death of Italus there was none of their part, that had reigned with Romulus in equal interrelation, they should now lose their possession and title to the Crown, were desirous to have a King chosen out of their corporation. The old Romans again might not abide an alien or foreigner to be King.
Howbeit, thus diversly affected as they were, a King they all willingly gave, as who (quoth we) B had not yet tasted the sweetness of liberty and freedom. Besides, the Nobles began to fear a peradventure in case the hearts of many Cities thereabouts, should not be well disposed, but provoked against them, some foreign power would make in them. Finding the City without government, and the army without a Captain. Therefore they all liked well to have one head, but none could find in his heart to give place unto another. Whereupon the hundred Senators associate and combined together in the rule of the Common-wealth, by dividing themselves into ten Decuries, and or every Decury chusing one to bear the chiefe authority. So that in government they but one alone had the regal Emblems and the Liens before him. This sovereignty and parliament determined every five days: and thus went it through them all round in course. After which manner, they continued the space of one year. And the government upon this occasion was (as it is till at C this day) called Interregnum. Then after a year began the Commons to gudge and murmur, that their servitude was greater then before, having now Lords over them and lord of one, and deemed they would no longer endure, but have a King again, yea, and one of their own chusing. The Senators (seeing them thereabouts, and taking it to be good policy for to obdurate of their own accord, which they were otherwise like to forgoe) carried favour with them in this wisd to wit, by granting the chief prerogative unto the people (in choosing a King) yet for as they gave them no greater privilege, then they referred to themselves. For thus it was decreed, that when the people had elected a King, it should stand firm and ratified, if the Senators liked the choice, and gave thereto their royal assent. And even at this day in making of Laws, and chusing of Magistrates or Rulers, the same right is in force for observed, letting aside the violence of Tribunes. For this now before the D people give their voices, the Senators pass by their authority, that which they would have done, fail it out in the assembly of people, by krutiny, doubtful as it will. To proceed then the Interregne having called a general Parliament: In the name of God (quoth he) O Quirites, and which may be to you good, lucky, and prosperous, elect, or nominate yea new King: for to us the good pleasure of the Nobles and Senators: and in case ye shall elect a man of such quality as may be deemed worthy to succeed Romulus, then will they by their assent pass the same, and allow thereof. This pleased and contented the Commons so highly, that because they would not keep behind in bounty and countreie, they answered again that this only they ordained and agreed upon, to wit, that the Senate should determine who should be King of Rome. There was in those days one Numa Pompilius, much renowned and esteemed for his just life and religions: he dwelt in Antur, a City of the Sabines, E a man right skilful and very well seen (as any one might be in that age) in all Laws both divine and humane: whose teacher and first matter, for want of other Author of his Science and Knowledge (they say) but yet privately, was Pythagoras of Samos. Concerning whom, this is well known, that he 100 years after and above, in the days of Servius Tullius King of Rome, held a School of young men Students, that were his Disciples, and followed his Sect in the most and strictest coil of his, about Metaphisicall, Heracles, and Cronos. From which place (albeit he had lived in that time) whatframe of him could spread so far as to the Sabines? or by what error curie and slinty of sensengue might he possibly have trained any man unto him for desire of learning at his hands? or by what good means and help, could Numa travel alone unto him in Italy, through so many countries, of divers tongues and sundry manners? I am of this opinion rather, that the man by nature F was framed and disposed to vertue, and that he was instructed, not to him, but to the Gods and Sciences, as after that strict rule, that stern and severe discipline of the art of Numa is, then whom there was not a nation in times past, more precise, reformed and void of corruption. The Roman Senators hearing the name of Numa, although they saw well enough, that the Sabines were like to prove of great reputation and power, by chusing their King from among them, yet as there none of them to andious, as to prefer either themselves, or any one of their party or faction, nor any one, I say, Senator or Citizen, before that man: but a fingerer with one ear, and agd out to confer the Kingdom upon Numa Pompilius. Who being sent for and come, the Sabines, as the founding of the City was inagurate King, or attained to the Crown by means of Agropyro also it would needs: that the will and counsel of God should be sought for, in his own election. Where-G upon he was by the Augur (unto whom for ever after that public Ministry or Priesthood) of honor and reverence by patent becomed) brought unto the Cattle hill, and there he let him down upon a stone, with his face toward the South. Then the Augur as his face, and with his covered took his place: holding in his right hand a smooth staff without knots or knobs, and looked towards the top, which they called Latina. From whence after that he had with good advice, taken a prospect and view towards the City and Countrey, and made his prayer unto the gods, he limited the quarters of the Heaven, from East to West: and the parts Southward he appointed for the

A "conven, or frand, and how at this day they are most rightly meant and understood, according to the tenure of the words : for therein articles I say, I shall not the people of Rome hurt but kill," nor make detain : If they shall first go back and fall therein by publick consent, and frandless-ly ; that day, O Jupiter, imite this : the City of Rome, as I to day will strike this swine ; yea, and limite thou home to much more, as thou art more able and powerful than my self. And after he had thus said, he imote the two with a flint stone. The Alban likewise repeated their precept form of words, and the oxen, by their Dictator and Priests for the purpose. The complements of the covenant and agreement thus performed, and all con-cluded, then those three brethren of both sides, as it was before agreed, buckle to arm themselves. And being con-urged on both hands, B by their well-wishers, the friends, that put them in mind of their country gods, their native county and parents, saying, that all their fellow Citizens and country men whatsoever, both at home in the City, and abroad in the camp, every one had their eye only upon them, their weapons and their hands : the young men being both of themselves by nature forward and lusty, and also emboldened with the comfortable words of their friends, advanced forth between both armies. Now were the two hosts set for on both sides before their camps, rid of present danger, rather then void of care and perplexities. For why ? the whole trial of our craginy and nile, felted in their lionr and good specc of a few. Whereupon they longing to see the league and issue, were wholly bent to behold, and only minded this unpleasant sight and spectacle. At found of Trumpet their brave brethren, three to three like as they had been twofold battels and carrying the tombs, they set of two C great armies, affronted one another and with cruel and mortal weapons gave the charge. Neither regarded they their own proper peril, but set before their eyes, only the rule or iurisdiction of the Common-weal, is the title of their country from then, forth by wholly upon their good or bad success in this action. So loon as they began to cope together and make assault, that their harnes and weapons one clattered, and their drawn swords home and glittered again, beheld him an exceeding fear came upon the beholders, that they trembled and quaked withal : and during the time of equal combat, neither inclination of victory to the one side or the other, they were to affonced, that hardly they could well feak or freely take their wind. Afterwards, when as they were once to hand-shocks, and that now not only the flitting of their bodies, and the doubtful handling of their weapons and armor, but bloody wounds also were seen, two of the Romans D (having first wounded all the three Albans) fell down one upon the other, and yec'd up the ghost. At whole fall, the Alban host shouted again for joy : but the Roman legions, albeit they were now pat hope of victory, yet they were not void of care being amazed, and an extasy as it were, with very fear what should become of him, who being but one, had three Centurians upon him at once. But as good hap was, he as yet was fresh and unwounded. And as he was not able alone to make his part good with them all together, so in single fight, man to man, he thought himselfe good enough for them all, one after another. To fingle therefore, and to part them in fight, he begins to flie, thinking thereby they would follow after him, each one as his hurt body would give him leave. Now when he was retired a pretty good way from the place, where they fought, and looking behind him, espied them following far alunder, and one of them not much behind E himselfe, he turned again upon him with great violence. And whilst the host of the Albans cried out to the Centurio to rescue and incur their brother, then the Romans, by that time had flain his foremost enemy, and was in hand with the second. Then the Romans with such a shout, as they are wont to make, who after a great fight recover themselves and take heart again, en-urage their champion : and he himselfe halseth to finish the combat. And before that the third, who was not far off, could get to the other, he had flain the second Centurio. So that now there was but one to one, left to fight on e'en hand : and they, neither in hope nor strength equally matched. As for the one of them, his body as yet not wounded, and his double victory withal caused him to attempt the third conflict boldly and courageously. The other faint and feeble of his hurt, tired with winning, had much ado to come forward, and quite out of heart, feeling his two brethren like an air F his selfe, offered himselfe as a prey to his victorious enemy : for surely hee seen them to be at all to speak of. The Roman he triumphing and crying out for joy : Two brethren like him have I sent to the Divel, the third likewise shall fend after them : that a Roman may command an Alban, which is the cause of all this war. And thereafter he was down a ftrip and killed him, who had much ado to hold his weapons : and so soon as he was down a ftrip and killed him, as his case was more dangerous and well nigh desperate. Then of both sides adde they themselves to bury their champions, but with like cheer and alacrity of heart : For why ? they of the one part were become Lords, and they of the other. Subjects. Their troubles never yet to be seen in the very places where they were each other's overthrow, but distant addeces. As they G then fought and left their lives, before they did so, they agreed and departed thence the one from another. And thus, according as it was capitulated in the composition, asked and demanded what Centurio command him to do : who enjoined him to keep his youth ready in arms at an hours warning, so that he would employ them in service, in case he should war with the Volscians : So were the armies dismissed home. And Horatius he went forth baring on him the gold plate of his

clipping upon her brothers shoulders, the coat of arms of her espoused husband, which she herself had wrought with her own hands; the unbowed her head, let her hair loose, and pitiously called upon her dead spouse by name. This lamentable wailing of the sister presently upon victory, and amidst to great and public joy, moved the proud and haughty young man to wrath, and drawing out his sword therewith, ran the silly damsel through: and with these bitter words rebuketh her also, Get thee hence (quoth he) to thy spouse with thy unseasonable and foolishly love; forgetful as thou art, of thy two brethren dead, and him that is alive: forgetful of thy native country, and the honor thereof; and to with a mischief go she, whatever she be, that shall bewail an enemy of Rome. A cruel and horrible fact this seemed, as well to the Senators, as to the Commons: but his late and treacherous desert made it the less treacherous: yet for all that was he apprehended, and brought before the King. The King, that he might not seem the author of a judgment to unpleasant and odious unto the people, and consequently of punishment according to the doom, assembled the people together and said: I ordain Duumvirs to sit upon Horatius, in trial of a criminal cause of felony, and to judge him according to the law, in that case provided. The tenor of the law runneth thus, in dreadful kind of form. The Magistrates called Duumvirs shall judge the party accused in a capital action of felony, if he shall appeal from the Duumvirs, let him traverse his appeal, if they overthrow him, then hoodwink him, or cover his head, hang him upon a cursed Gallows tree by a rope, and strangle him, having whipped and scourged him before, either within the Pomony or without. [By virtue of this law were the Duumvirs created, who by their rigor of that law thought they might not quit so much as a guiltless person: and having once condemned him, then one of them gave sentence and said: I judge thee O Publius Horatius a murderer and an enemy to the state of Rome. Go Lictor therefore, and bind his hands together. Then came the Lictor and cast a cord about them. But Horatius, by the advice of Tullus, a gentle and mild interpreter of the Law, I appeal (quoth he.) So upon his appeal was the matter debated, and to be tried before the people: who were not a little troubled in deciding or judging this cause, and most of all in regard of Publius Horatius the Father, crying out and saying, That he deemed his daughter was justly and worthily killed: otherwise he would himself have punished his son by his fatherly authority. Beweeching moreover, that they would not now make him childless, whom erewhile they saw with a goodly company of children about him. And therewithal the old father embracing the young man, and shewing the spoils of the Curia, set up and hanging in that very place which now is called Pila Horatia, i.e. Horatius his Pillar. And can ye indeed (O ye Romans, quoth he) abide to see him bound under a Gallows, yea, and whipped and tormented, whom a while ago ye beheld to march in great glory and jollity for his achieved victory? So uncleanly and foul a sight as which, the Albans themselves can hardly suffer. Go Lictor, go bind those hands fast, which armed a little before, won the people of Rome their dominion: Go I say, and hoodwink his head who saved and delivered this City from bondage, hang him by the neck, and strangle him upon a cursed tree: scourge him and spare not, either within the circuit of the walls, so it be among those javelins and spoils of the enemies: or without the walls, so it be within the compass of the Curia Sepulchres. For to what place can you lead this young gentleman, where his honorable acts may not save him from so unworthy and shameful punishment? The people could no longer endure, either the tears of the old father, or the constant resolution of the youth his son, who shewed himself still the same, and not to change for any danger. So they quit him, in the honorable regard rather of his prowess and valor, than in the right and equity of his cause. Yea to the end that the murder so manifest and openly known, should be in some sort expiated, and satisfaction made therefore, his father was charged to purge his sons sin, and make amends, at the expenses of the City. Who having performed certain purgatory sacrifices, which afterward belonged to the house and family of the Horatii, put a raster or beam cross overthwart the street, and caused the young man with his head covered to go under, as under a yoke or gallows: which remaineth yet unto this day, from time to time at the City charges repaired, and they call it Sororium Tigillum, i. e. The Sisters beam. And in that very place where Horatia was wounded and fell down, her tomb was erected of four square stone.

But not long continued the Albans in quiet and peace. For the common people finding fault and greatly discontented, that the whole state of the Weale-publick was put into the hands of three soldiers, infected so, and poisoned the vain and little head of the Dictator: that for as much as plain and upright dealing sped no better, he began to win again the hearts of his Commons by crooked means, and indirect courses. Seeking therefore war in time of peace, as before in time of war he sought peace: and seeing his people had more heart than hand, and their strength not answerable to their stomacks: he stirred up other nations, openly by way of proclamation and defiance to make war, and reserved his own men under a colour of league and confederacy, for to practise treason and falsehood. The Fidenates, a Colony of the Romans, having once the Veientians partakers of their counsel, and combined with the Albans to forsake the Romans, when time came, and turn unto them, brake out and took arms. When Fidene had thus openly revolted, Tullus sent for Metius and his power from Alba, and set forth forward against his enemies: and passing over the river Anio, encamped near the confluence, where both streams meet together. Between which place and Fidene, the army of the Veientians had crossed the Tyber, who put themselves in the right wing of the battle fast by the river, and the Fidenates in the left, left nearer to the mountains. Tullus directly opposeth his own forces against the Veientians, and placeth the Albans to affront the Fidenates. The Alban Captain having as little heart as honesty and truth, neither durst keep his standing, nor openly turn unto the enemy, but by little and little withdrew himself toward the mountains: and when he thought he had gained vantage enough, he mounted up the hill with all his companies, and with a wavering mind to spend the time, displaceth his ranks. His intent and purpose was, on what side fortune seemed to give the better, with them to join and take their part. The Romans that stood near, perceiving their flanks naked by reason of the departure of their friends and allies, at first marvelled much at the matter: but afterwards there galloped an horseman, and advertised the King that the Albans were gone away. Tullus in this so fearful and dangerous case, vowed twelve Priests Salus and two Temples to Palor and Pavor, i. e. to Paleness and Fear: and with a loud voice cried out in the hearing of his enemies, commanding the said horseman to return to the battle, laying, There was no cause at all to fear, for that himself had commanded the Alban host to wheel and lurch about, and so to charge the Fidenates on their backs where they lay open. Willing him expressly moreover, to cause them men of arms to hold up their lances on end. By which means, a great part of the footmen could not see the Albans as they departed and went their ways. And those that had seen them, thinking it was a truth which they heard the King to speak, fought so much the more cholly. So the fear turned now from them, and fell upon the enemies: for they heard the King when he spake so loud, and also a great many of the Fidenates being co-habitants with the Romans, underfoot Latine. For fear therefore, that the Albans should all on a sudden run down from the hills and stop their passage to the town, they turned their backs and fled. Then Tullus presseth hard upon them, and having discomfited the Fidenates wing, cometh back more fiercely upon the Veientians, being already amazed at the sight of the other. Neither were they able to withstand the brunt. Howbeit the river behind at their backs kept them at first from flying away, but afterwards when their slight bended thitherward: some flinging their weapons shamefully away, like blind men, ran headlong into the water: other lingering still, and staying on the bank side, doubtful whether to flee, or to stick to it and fight, were trod under foot, and hewen in pieces. Never had the Romans before that day a more cruel battle. Then the Alban army, which beheld and saw all this conflict, defended down into the plain. And Metius, forsooth, rejoiceth much on Tullus behalf for this victory. Tullus again speaketh Metius fair, and gave order, that the Albans in a good hour should join their camp to the Romans: and against the next day, prepared a purging or Lustral sacrifice. The morrow when it was day, and that all things were in a readiness, according to the manner, he commanded both armies to assemble together: to an audience, the Criers, beginning at the farthest part of the camp, summoned the Albans first. Who also for the strangeness of the matter, and desirous to hear the Roman King to make his Oration, pressed forward to stand next. The Roman legion on pur purpose, as it was before decreed, stood armed round about, and hemmed them in: and the Centurions had in charge without delay to execute whatsoever they were commanded.

Then began Tullus to speak in this wise, "If ever in any war heretofore had cause, O Romans, The Oration of Tullus.
E "to render thanks, first to the immortal gods, and then to your own manhood and valor, certainly it was in yesterdays battle. For ye fought not then with the force of your enemies more than with the treachery and falsehood of your friends and confederates, which is the greater conflict and far more dangerous. For to put you clean out of doubt, and to bear you no longer in hand with a wrong persuasion: The Albans went up toward the hills without my commission, neither was that my commandment, but a policy and countenance only of command: to this end, that ye not knowing how ye were forsaken, might not withdraw your hearts from fight, and also that your enemies weening they were environed behind, should be afraid and enforced to flee. Yet are not the Albans all in general to be charged with this fault which I reprove. They did but follow their leader, as ye likewise would have done, if I had willed the march to have turned any whither from thence. It is Metius that was the guide and leader of this journey, Metius is he that is the worker and deviser of this war, Metius I say it is, and none but Metius, the breaker of the Roman and Alban league. Butler who that will from henceforth presume hardly to do the like, if I make not him a notable example to all the world. The Centurions stood armed round about Metius, and the King goeth on with the rest of his speech as he began, and said: "That which I pray God may turn to the good prosperity and happiness of the people of Rome, of myself, and you the Albans, I am minded to reduce all the Alban nation to Rome: to endue the Commons with the freedom of the City: to advance their chief Gentlemen to the order of Senators, and to make one uniform City and Common wealth: that as in times past the Albans state, out of one body was divided into twain. In now it may be united and become one again. At these words the Alban youth unarmed and helen on every side with armed men, albeit they were distracted in mind, yet were they forced with a general cart to keep silence, and hold their peace. Metius Suffenus (quoth Tullus then) If thou couldst have learned to keep allegiance promise, and covenants, thou mightest have been taught it at my hands with life. But now since thy forward nature is incurable, teach thou by thy carnal example and death all mankind, to hold and repute those things for sacred and holy, which have been broken and violate. Like as therefore erewhiles thou barest a double heart in doubt-

A And there sticking close together with the boats and planks, fired and consumed it clean. This accident both terrified the Sabins in their flight, and when they were discomfited, troubled them much, and hindered their flight: so that many a man having escaped the enemy, yet perished in the very river. Whole armor and weapons floating down the river were known at Rome, and brought news thither of this victory, in manner before word could be brought thither: by land. In this conflict the horsemen won great price and praie. For being placed at the skirts of both the wings, at what time as the main battel of their own footmen, were now at the point to retire, they charged forribly upon the enemy (as it is reported) from the flanks where they were marshalled, that they not only stayed the Sabin Legions pressing hard and fiercely upon those that began to shrink and give back, but all at once put them to flight. The Sabins ran main towards the mountains, but few got thither: for the greater number, as we said before, were by the horsemen driven into the river. Tarquinius thinking it good to take the time, and follow hard upon them whilst they were lighted, after he had sent to Rome, the body with the prisoners, and burned on a great heap together (as he had vowed to Vulcan) the spoils of the enemies, marched on still forward, and led his army into the Territory of the Sabins: who albeit they had already sustained an overthrow, and could not hope for better success, yet because they had no time to consult, and advise with themselves, with such a power as might on a sudden in that strait be raised, met with him. Where they once again were defeated and vanquished, and in the end being in despair to make their part good, they sued for peace. Then was Collatia, and all the lands about it taken from the Sabins. Egerius the Kings brother son was left with a garison at allatia to keep that place, And (as I find upon record) the Collatins were yielded into his hands, and the manner of their surrender was in this order. First, the King demanded thus and said: Are ye Ambassadors, or deputed agents sent from the people of Collatia to make surrender both of your selves and the Collatines? We are (quoth they.) And are the people of Collatia in their own power, and at liberty to do what they will? They are (say they.) Do ye also render up your selves, the people of Collatia their rovin, their territory and lands. their wares, their limits, their temples, their household stuff and implements, and all thing else, as well faced as prophane, unto my power and the peoples of Rome. We do yield (say they.) Then (quoth he) do I accept thereof, and receive all into my hands. The Sabin war thus finished, Jaquinius returned to Rome in triumph. After this, he warred upon the old Latines, but they never proceeded so far on any side, as to join issue in a general battle, and one set field for all, But bringing his power first to one town, and after to another, he made a conquest of the whole nation of the Latins. So as these towns, Corneolum, old Fundania, Cameria, Crustumium, Amicula, Medullia, Nomentum, were recovered from the old Latines, or from those that had revolted unto them.

After all this continued peace, Then was he more earnestly bent to go forward with his works, begun in time of peace, then he was before busied in managing of his wars: inasmuch as he gave the people no more repose at home, then he had in wars abroad. For besides that he prepared to compass the City (which as yet he had not fortified) round about with a fone wall, the beginning of which piece of work was by the Sabin war interrupted and broken off: he devised also certain draughts or vaulted links from aloft into the Tyber, whereby he drained and kept dry the bare City, or lowly grounds about the market place, and the other valleys between hill and hill, for that out of the plains and flats, they might not easily make riddance and conveyance away of the water. Moreover, he levelled a large court or plot of ground, ready for the foundation of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, which he had vowed in the Sabin war; his mind even then giving him, that one day it should be a stately place.

At the same time there hapned in the court a wonderful strange thing, both in present view, and also in consequence. For as the report went, a young lad, whose name was Servant Indragas, as he lay asleep in the night of many persons had his head all on a light fire. And upon an outcry raised at the wondering of so great a matter, the King arose; and when one of the household brought water to quench the flame, he was by the Queen stayed. And after the fire was somewhat appeased, she forbade the boy to be disquieted, until such time as he awoke of himself: and within a while as the sleep departed, the blaze likewise went out, and vanished away. Then Indragas the Queen taking her husband aside into a secret room, "See you this boy (quoth she) whom we lo homeily keep, and in so poor and mean estate bring up? Wot well this, and know too ver aim, that he will one day be a light to direct us in our dangerous troubles and doubtful affairs: he will be the chief pillar and support of the afflicted state of the Kings house. Let us therefore cherish him and foster with all kindness and indulgence the subject matter of so great a public and private ornament. Whereupon they began to make much of the boy, as if he had been one of their own children, and to instruct and train him up in those arts, whereby forward wits are lifted to great enterprizes, and to achieve high place of wealth and honor. And soon came to that pass, which pleased the almighty gods. For he proved a young man indeed princely nure and towardness in such sort that when there flourd he a young boy fought out to match with a young his daughter in marriage, there was not one of all the young gentlemen of Rome to be found comparable to him in any respect. So as the King affirmed to bestow her on him. This great honor wherunto he was advanced upon what reason came or cause it was, indueth me to think he was not the son of a bondwoman, nor that he served whilst he was a little one, as a slave, I am of their mind rather, that report thus:

The Ions of Ancus at the first, seeing the murderers attached, and hearing that the King was alive, and Servius to mighty, retired themselves as bashed persons to Sacell, Pontius, And Servius now thought means to make himself strong, as well by private helps, as by publicke. And till peradventure the children of Tarquinius should another day be as ill affected against him, as the children of Ancus were against Quintinius, he gave in marriage his two daughters to Lucius and Arms, two of the Kings Ions late deceased. Yet could not he with all the policy of mans wit stay the fatal necessity, nor stop and divert the course of the delinities: but that the envy that followeth a Kingdom bred all distrust, dissoluality, and malice, even among those of his own household, for all their alliance and affinity. Howbeit in very good time, and fildy for the quietness of the present state, was the war with the Vientes (for now was the term of the truce expired) and other Tulkans, taken in hand. In which war, both the valour, and also the good fortune of Tullius was well seen and greatly knowned. Who having discomfited a mighty host of the enemies, as undoubted King in the opinion and judgment as well of the Senators as of the Commons, if their hearts had been founded, returned to Rome.

D peace, And first of those who were rated at an hundred thousand Shillings and above, he ordained 80 Centuries; 40 of the elder Iors, and as many of the younger; and all jointly were comend the City Claffis. The elder were charged to be in readines at all hours, for defence of the City: the younger to follow the wars abroad. There were bound to find harness, for defence of their own bodies, an headpiece or morion, a shield, greeves and corselet, all of brais: and for offence of the enemy, a javelin, and a sword. To this Claffis were adjoynd two Centuries of Carpenters and Smithis, or Engineers, who were in wage, and served without amoure: and their charge was to find the Campe Engines of battery and artillery. The second consisted of those that were valued between 10000 and 75000 Affes. And of this sort both young and old were enrolled twenty Centuries: who were chosen to be the Kings of the field: and excepting only a couplet, in all points as the former. The third the world has to be of those that were elected out of the 1000 Ailes, and as many Centuries of them, and with the same distinction of age. The fourth concerning their armour was any thing altered: only for the greaves they were disposed with. In the fourth Clavis were those that were afflicted in the Subdity book, between 1000 and 1500 Ailes, and of them were 10 many Centuries. Their armour was changed, having no more but a spear and a casting darr, with a lope called Coronula. The fifth was greater, containing thirty Centuries. Those carried with them flings and stones to sling at, or arrows, whom were reckoned the bowdies or criers, together with the trumpet and cornetiers, who were divided into three Centuries. This band host of them that were afflicted in the 1500, 1600, 1700, 1800 Ailes. The valuation under this comprised all the rest of the multitude.

from 25000 into \approx 11000 Alles. The Valuation under this prince ended at the year 1000. Whereof arose one Century, freed and exempted from warfare. Thus having furnished and disposed the forces of the Infantry, he enrolled besides twelve Centuries of horsemen, and chose out of the principal men of the City and in other Centuries likewise. To the three that Romulus instituted, retaining the same name (till that they in their first solemn institution had) These horsemen for to buy their great horses had \approx 10000 Alles out of the Chamber of the City a peece: and to for to find and keep those horses were the rich wide-waisted yearly at \approx 2000 Alles a peece. Thus were all these charges and burdens shifted from off the poor mans shoulders, and laid upon the rich. And therefore afterward was their dignity and honor so much the more, For in the grand-leets and solemn elections of Magistrates, every man had not pre-ogative alle, nor equal authority, as Romulus first ordered, and the other Kings continued, when they gave their Votes by the poll indifferently one with another: but there was distinction made, and certain degrees; but so, as neither any one was ex-cluded or shut out, and yet the whole relied by the power of the richer sort, and chief of the City. For till the horsemen were called: afterward, the eighty Centuries belonging to the first Clasis. of the principal footmen: who if they disagreed, and hapned to be at any difference, then the Centuries of the second Clasis were called. And never went they likely so low as to the last of all, Neither ought any man to marvel that this order in these daies, after five and thirty tribes compleat, agreed not with the Centuries of the elder and younger fort, according to the computation set down by Servius Tullius, considering their H numbers now doubled. For having divided the City into four Wards, according to the quarters and hills: those parts which were inhabited he called Tribes, of the word Tribute (as Lippos.) For he it was that devised and brought up the manner of equal contribution and payment, proportionably to the assessment and rate of mens goods. Neither were these Tribes any ways at all respective to the division or number of the Centuries aforesaid. When this Levy and taxation was finished, which he dispatched the sooner, by reason of the peoples fear of an act at him made, concerning those that should not come in to be registered and enrolled in the Subsidy book: he published an Edict, under pain of imprisonment and death, that all Citizens of Rome, as well horsemen as footmen, should the morrow after at the break of day, every one in his own Century: I shew himself in Campus Martius, i.e. in Mars field. There, after he had mulctured and embattelled the whole Army, he assailed and purged the flames with the sacrifice of a Swine, a Sheep, and a Bull. And this was called Conditum Lustrum. Which was the very closing up and accomplishment of the assessment. In this Lustrum there were numbered and assessed 80000 Citizens; Fabius Pictor, a most ancient writer saith moreover, that so many there were of able men to bear arms. For to contain this multitude, it was thought good the City should be enlarged. Whereupon he adjoined unto it two hills more, to wit, Quirinalis, and Viminalis. After this, he proceeded to augment the mount Esquilæ: and to grace that hill, and make it of more reputation, there he dwelt himself, and had his Court. He cast a trench and ditch, and raised a rampire about the City, and then walled it: by occasion whereof, he set out the Pomery further. Pomeryum, according to the Etymology and literal signification of the word, is as much to say, as Postmarium, or the Arrimure, that is, a plot of ground behind, or without the wall. But indeed it is rather a space about the wall on either side, which the Tulcans in old time, when they built their Cities, used by advice of Augurs, to hallow and consecrate in certain bounds and limits, all along where they minded to set the wall: that neither within, the houses might joy upon the wall (whereas now ad days they build close to) and without also there might be a void piece of ground, lying common, free, and unoccupied of men. This vacant space, that neither might lawfully be inhabited, nor yet eared and plowed, as well because it was without the wall, as the wall without it, the Romans called Pomeryum. And ever as the circuit of the City was made larger, look how much the walls should be set out further, so far those hallowed and consecrated bounds of the Pomery were extended.

Thus the City being much increased in compass of building and all things disposed in good order, requisite as well for war as peace; to the end, that he should not always seek to purchase wealth and puissance by war and martial prowess only, he attempted to amplify his dominion by policy, and withall to bestow upon the City some glorious ornament to beautify the same. And even at that time was the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, of great fame, and much renowned: which as the report went, was built in common by all the states and princes of Asia. When as therefore Servius would use highly to praise and commend unto the Lords and heads of the Latines (with whom of purpose he had both in public and private, mutual entertainment and familiar acquaintance) that general agreement of the Princes of Asia, in matters of religion, and in the uniform worship of the same gods: at length, by much iterating and following till that theme, he prevailed with them so far, that the nations of the Latines, and the people of Rome together, built at Rome a Temple unto Diana: which was plain confession, and clear case, that Rome was now the imperial seat, for which they had so often warred. This quarrell, albeit now the Latines all in a manner had neglected quite, and made no care at all thereof, seeing they had so often attempted it by force of arms, and sped so badly: yet fortune seemed to one only man to cast a favourable aspect, and yeeld good hope, by his private policy and industry, to recover again the imperial dignity unto the Latines. A certain householder forsooth, of the Sabines, had, as they say, a cow bred with him of a wonderful bigness, and late withall, (for a memorial of which so rare and wonderful beast the horns were set up, and remained still fixed in the porch of Diana's Temple, many a hundred years after) this was supposed (as it was no lesse in very deed) a strange and prodigious thing: and the N wile men or wizards prophesied, that the sovereignty and Empire should be settled and established in that State, whereof any one Citizen sacrificed that cow unto Diana. This prophetic came to the ears of the Priest of Diana's Temple. The Sabins aforesaid, so soon as he had espied a meer and convenient day for sacrifice, drives the cow to Rome, and leads her to the Temple of Diana, and there presented her before the Altar: where the Roman Priest wondering to see so huge a beast, whereof there had been so much speech, and calling to mind withall the foretold Oracle, spake to the Sabins in this wise. My friend (quoth he) what mean you to sacrifice to us uncleanly unto Diana, and do not rather purifie and wash your self all over in some running stream, before you come hither? Lo where Tyber runneth in the valley beneath. The stranger then, moved with some scruple of conscience, who desired nothing more, than that all should be well and orderly done, that a happy success might be correspondent and answerable to so prodigious a beast, forthwith went down to the Tyber. In the mean while, the Roman killed the Cow in honor of Diana. This thing pleased the King and the whole City wonderful well.

Servius, albeit he were now without all question by so long continuance, fully and really invested in the Kingdom: yet because he heard say, that young Tarquinius otherwise gave out speeches of him, that he reigned without the nomination and election of the people: therefore after he had

A first want the hearts of the Commons, by dividing among them every one certain lands gotten by conquest from the enemies, he adventured to propound unto the people, and put it to their suffrages and voices. Whether their will and pleasure was, that he should reign over them. Thus was he declared King with as great content, as never any before with the like. But Tarquinius for all this, had nevertheless hope to aspire and attain unto the Crown: nay, rather for much the more, because he understood the said division of the lands among the Commons, was a thing concluded and paid against the will and mind of the Senators. Taking therefore occasion thereby to accuse and blame Servius before them, he supposed he had good means offered to wind himself into favor with the Lords of the Senate, and so to become strong in the Council-house. Over and besides, he was

B both himself a young man of great courage and hot stomach, and his wife likewise at home, dame Tullia, lay ever upon him, and pricked forward his discontented and troubled mind: for you mult think, that the royal Court of Rome also hath brought forth and afforded one example of a tragical and horrible act: that by a weariness and loathing conceived against the Kings government, liberty and freedom might the sooner ensue: and that reign be the last, which was by mischief gotten first. This L. Tarquinius, whether he were the son or nephew of Priscus Tarquinius is not very clear: howbeit, I would rather think with most writers, that he was his son. A brother he had, Aruns Tarquinius, a young gentleman of a mild nature. These two (as is aforesaid) had married the two Tullia the Kings daughters; and they also themselves were in conditions far unlike. And happily it is to tell out that two forward and violent natures were not coupled together in wedlock: such

C was the good fortune. I believe, or the Roman people, that thereby the reign of Servius might continue the longer, and the City brought and settled in good order. The younger Tullia, a stout dame and a proud grievous and exced much that her husband had nothing in him, no metal or matter at all, either to covet and desire, or to enterprise and adventure: her mind was fully set upon the other: Lucretia, him she esteemed highly, and had in admiration, him she said to be a man indeed, and dedicated of royal blood. As for her sister, she despised and checked her, for that the having a forward and valorous Knight to her husband, sat still, and seconded him not in audacity and boldness as a woman should do. Well, in short time likeness and disposition soon brought them together, and as it is commonly seen, Naught will to naught, and for best together. But the mischief and trouble that brought all up-side down, arose from the woman. For the using to have secret

D conference with her sisters husband, never ceased to speak badly, and to rail of her own husband unto his brother, and of her sister unto her husband. "A affirming in good earnest, it were better "both for her self to be a widow, and for him to live single, and without a wife, than to be so matched as they were, and through the craven cowardice of others to languish and come to nothing. As for her self, if the gods had given her an husband according to her own quality and worthiness, she doubted not to see, and that shortly, the Crown in her own house: that now "she seeth in her daughters, in this manner posseseth the quickly the humorous young man, and filled his head with her own rashness and follies. Now when Aruns Tarquinius, and the elder Tullia, who died still in a manner both at one time, had well rid their own houses, and made way and overture for a new marriage, it was not long but they were married, with Servius his leave and consent, rather than their good liking. But then every day more and more odious: for now the woman

E continually more in their eyes, his old age hateful, and his reign more odious: for now the woman minded nothing but one mischief upon another: and would not suffer her husband to be at rest night nor day, lest peradventure the former murders done and past, should serve to no purpose, and mislead the effect of their designments. And thus she brake out and said, That she wanted not before one that carried the name of an husband, with whom she served, and kept her self quiet and said nothing. "But she had a want of one, that that thought himself worthy of a kingdom, that remembered he was the son of Tarquinius Priscus, that loved better to be king of a Crown and keeper "indeed than hope for a kingdom, and hear thereof, But first (quoth she) if you be the man to whom "I take my self wedded, then I call you both husband and king: if not, then is our case changed for

F "the worse, in that cowardliness is accompanied now with wickedness. Why resolve you not? "why arm you not your self, and go about this business? you need not go so far as to Corinth or "to Tarquinius, for to seek and compass forraign kingdoms, as your father did. The gods of your own "house and native country, the image and example of your father, the Kings Palace, and therein "the royal seat and throne of estate, yea, the very name of Tarquinius, createeth, nameth, and saluteth "you King. But an if your heart will not serve you to these designs, why bear you the world in hand "and deceive them? why take you so upon you as you do, to throw your self as a Kings son? Get "you hence to Corinth again, away to Tarquinius, turn backward to your former luck and condition, more like to your brother than to your father. With these and such like motives, by way of reproof, he checked the young man, set him on, and pricked him forward, and the her self for her part, could be at no repose, for thinking that Tanaquil, an alien and stranger born, could contrive in her head, and effect so great a matter, as to make two kings together, one after other, namely, her husband first, and afterwards her son in law: and she her own self, a Kings daughter, could bear no stroke either in giving or taking away a kingdom. Tarquinius kindled with these furies and temptations of a woman, went about, laboured and made court to the Nobles, especially those that were Minerum gentes: oftentimes putting them in mind of the pleasures and favours that his father had done them, and requiring now of duty the like good turn at their hands. The young men then

Tarquinus having thus gained the town of Gales, made peace with the nation of the Aequians, H and renewed the league with the Tuiscans. After this he converted his mind to the affairs of the City, among which this was the principal, to leave behind him the Temple of Jupiter, upon the mount Tarpeius, for a monument and memorial of his reign and name. That of two Tarquinus, King both, it might be said another day, that the father vowed it, and the son finished the same. And to the end that the floor and plot of ground, freed and exempted from all other kind of religion, might wholly be dedicated to Jupiter and his Temple, there to be built: he determined to ex- aminate and to unhallow certain Churches and Chapels, which having been first vowed by King Tarquin, in the very extremity of the battle against Romulus, were after by him consecrated and hal- lowed. In the very beginning and founding of which work, it is said, that the divine power and sovereign deity moved the gods to declare the future mischiefs of so great an Empire. For when as the birds by signs out of the Augurs learnings, admitted and allowed the exauguration and un- hallowing of all other cels and chapels besides, only in that of Terminus, they gave no token to the confirming the unhallowing thereof: which was taken for an ominous preface, and thus interpreted, That seeing the seat and house of Terminus was not stirred, and he the god alone that was not dis- placed and called forth of the limits to him consecrated; it shewed that all should remain there firm and stable for ever. This divine token of perpetuity being received for good and current: there followed another strange and prodigious sign, portending the greatness also of the Empire. For as they digged for the foundation of the Temple, there appeared (as they say) a mans head, face and all, whole and found: which might import no doubt, and plainly foretold that it should be the chief Cattle of the Empire and the Capitall place of the whole world. To this effect prophesied the wizards, as well they of the City, as the whom they sent for out of Tuscan, to know their opinion and judgment. Thus was the Kings mind all wholly let upon sumptuous building and spa- rious for no cost. So that the pillage taken at Penates, which was laid by for the accomplishment of the whole work, would hard and scant serve for the very foundation. And therefore I would rather give credit unto Fabius Pictor (to say nothing that he is the more ancient author of the twain) that there were but 40 talents and no more, than to Piso, who writeth, that there was 40000 pound weight of silver set by for that use. Which sum or mass of money could never be looked for to arise out of the fackage of one only City in those daies: and must needs exceed the charges of the foundation of any of the self-same and magnificent buildings in this our age. The King being L thus wholly minded and bent to the finishing of the Temple, and lending for Carpenters, Masons, and other workmen, out of all parts of Tuscan, employed not only the Cities money and stock thereabout, but also had the work and labour of the common people withall, which was no small travail of theirs: considering the travail of warfare besides: yet were they less aggrieved and discontented therewith, so long as they founded and reared with their own hands the Temples of the im- mortal gods. But afterwards were they employed and set to other works, which as they were less in shew, so were they more painful and of greater trouble, namely the making of scaffolds or vault- ing-places in the Cirque or Theatre: and to the conveyance of a mighty great sinke or vault under the ground for to receive and carry away all the filth and corruption of the City. To which two pieces of work, chiefly is the magnificence of our new modern buildings, in any respect com- M parable. Having in this wise held the commons in continual labour, because he thought that a multitude of people would but over-charge and pester the City, when they were not employed some way or other, and also minded by erecting Colonies, to enlarge the Confines of his Domini- ons, he therefore sent part of them to inhabit and people Signa and Cerret, two strong forts and frontier towns for the defence of the City by sea and land.

Whilst he was busied in these affairs, there appeared unto him a strange and fearful sight, namely a serpent gliding down a pillar of wood, which having put the beholders in great fright, and caused them to flee into the Kings palace, did not so much amaze the Kings heart with sudden and momentary fear for the present, as fill his head with perplexed cares what the thing might portend. Whereas therefore the manner was to use the Calchans and wise men of Tuscan about N publicke prodigions tokens only: he being much troubled in spirit, and terrified at this fearful sight, being domestically, and as it were touching and concerning his own person: purposed to send out as far as D. Ipsi to the most famous and renowned Oracle in the world, and for that he durst not put any other in trust with the answers that should be delivered by the fatal lots, he ad- dressed two of his sons to take a voyage through unknown lands in those daies, and more un- known seas into Greece. Titus and Arms were they that went this journey, having to bear them company all the way. L. Junius Brutus. This Brutus was the son of Tarquinus, the Kings sister, a young gentleman of a far other nature and disposition than he seemed in outward shew and semblance. He having heard say, that certain principall Citizens, and his own brother among, had been by this his uncle put to death: to the intent that himself might have nothing left either in the parts of his mind for the King to fear, or in his outward state for him to cover and desire: re- solved under the cloak of bale contempt to save himself, since that in right of justice he might receive small or no safeguard at all. And therefore composing and framing himself of purpose to counterfeit a noddy and a very innocent, as suffering himself and all that he had to fall into the Kings hands as an eicheat, he refused not to be misnamed Brutus, a name appropriate to unconsol- able creatures: that under the shadow & colour of that surname, that courage of his lying close hid,

A which should one day set free the City of Rome, might abide the full time and appear in due sea- son. This Brutus being by the Tarquin brought to Delphi, as their laughing stock to make them pat- tism by the way, rather than to meet mate to accompany them, carried with him (as men say) tortoise and present unto Apolla a golden roil within a staffe of cornell wood, made hollow for the purpose: the very type and resemblance by secret circumstances, of his natural disposition. Thither being arrived, the young men having done their fathers committal as ordingly, were ve- ry devout and earnest to inquire and learn of the Oracle, which of them should be King of Rome. And from the bottom of the deep Vauke this answer, as men say, was delivered in their hearing: [Which of you (O young men) shall first kiss your mothers breast shall be chief and sovereign ruler of Rome.] B The Tarquin then intending that Sextus their brother who was left behind at Rome, might nei- ther know the answer, nor yet otherwise the kingdom, willed the matter should by all possible means be carried to secret as might be, and concealed from him. They themselves agreed upon this together, to draw lots whether of them twain, when they were returned to Rome, should first kiss his mo- ther. But Brutus supposing the speech of Apolla his Priest, tended to another issue, made as though he stumbled forward and took a fall, and so touched the ground with his mouth and kissed the earth, thinking this with himself, that he was common mother of all mortal men. Then returned they to Rome, where they found great preparation for war against the Rutilians.

The Rutilians then were Lords of Ardea. A people in those parts, and for those times very rich and wealthy: and that was it that gave the very occasion and was the first motive of war. The Roman King was desirous both to enrich himself, as having about the sumptuous building of pub- licke works emptied his coffers: and also by some spoil, to mollifie and win again the hearts of his natural subjects: being much discontented (besides their general milke of his pride, otterwise) at his manner of government: and disdainng greatly that they were by the King made labour- ers, to serve carpenters and masons, and held to long to servile toil and painful labour. The Ro- mans assailed at the beginning to surprize and win Ardea by assault: but when that way sped but ill, then began they to annoy and distress the enemies by laying siege, by casting trenches, raising forts, and labours about the town. During this siege, and the landing annoy lying there, (as it falleth out commonly when the war is rather long and late than hot and cruch) there were granted large licences and passports to and fro between the Camp and Rome, with much liberty: and yet more to the Principals of the Army than to the common Soldiers. And the Kings sons had otherwise good leisure to feast and banquet one with another. Upon a time it hapned whilst they were drinking and making merry with Sextus Tarquinus in his pavilion, where Collutius was Tarquinus the son of Egerius sat at upper: there arose among other good table-talk, some argu- ing about their wives: whilst every man highly praised and wondrously commended his own. And growing to some heat and contention thereabout: There need not many words for this mat- ter, quoth Collutius, for in few hours it may be known how far my Lucretia surpasseth all the rest. And therefore if there be any lincelines and courage of youth in us, why mount we not on horse- back, and in our own persons go and see the natures and dispositions of our wives? And as they shall be found and taken of a sudden, and not looking for their husbands coming, to let eve- ry man drink well, and were pretty heat with wine: Mary, content say they all, and to horse they go, and away they gallop on the spur to Rome. Thither were they come by the flurrying in of the evening, when it grew to be dark: and so forward without any stay to Collutius they ride. Where they find dame Lucretia, not as the Kings sons wives, whom they had surprised and seen afore, passing the time away in feasting and rioting with their minions and companions: but sitting up far within the night in the midst of her house amongst her maidens, hard at wooll- work by candle-light. Whereupon, in this debate about their wives, the entire praise and com- mendation relied in Lucretia: Her Husband and the Tarquin had a loving and courteous wel- come at her hands. And heagin for joy of the victory, invited the Kings sons kindly and made com- monly friendly cheare. There at that instant Sextus Tarquinus was bewitched and possessed with wicked wanton lust, for to offer violence and villany unto Lucretia: her passing beauty and her approved chastity set him on fire and provoked him thereto. But for the present, when they had disposed themselves all night long like lute and pleasant youths, they returned betimes in the morn- ing to the Camp. A few daies after, Sextus Tarquinus, unwitting to Collutius attended with one only man came to Collutia, where he was again in good and friendly sort received by them in the house, that suspected nothing less than that whereabout he was come. And being after supper brought up into the guest chamber, when he thought all about him true, and that every body was fast asleep all set on fire and burning in love, he slepeeth with naked sword in hand to Lucretia, as she lay sleeping full soundly, and bearing down the womans breast with his left hand. Peace quoth he Lucretia, & not a word: I am Sextus Tarquinus I have my drawn sword in hand that once speak thou shalt surely die. The silly woman thus starting out of sleep, was sore affright, as see- ing no remedy but in a manner present death, in case she had cried for help. Then uttered Tar- quinus and confessed his amorous passion, tell to entreat and entreat again, and with his power intermeddled threats, and went every way about her, not ceasing by all means to try to found and tempt the womans heart. But when he saw her obstinate and unmovable, he did not so much re- lucting one jot: then, besides the fear of death, he presented unto her dishonour and shame: pre- tending pretending that after he had massacred her, he would lay by her side in naked bed, her own man-servant with his throat cut: that it might be voiced abroad, that she was taken and killed in filthy adultery. For fear of this reproach and infamy, see how insatiable lust gat the victory, and conquered constant chastity: and Tarquinius in great pride and jollity, that he had by assault won the fort of a womans honour departed thence. But would Lucretia, all forrowing for so heavy a mischance, dispatched a messenger to her father at Rome, and so forward to her husband at Ardea, with this errand: That they should come unto her, each of them with one faithfull and truly friend, and heretof they must not fail, but make all the speed they could, for that there was befallen a grievous chance and horrible. So there repaired to her Sp. Lucretius her father, accompanied with P. Valerius the son of Valerius: and Collatinus in the way his wives messenger. Lucretia they found sitting alone in her bed-chamber, all heavy and sad: and she at the coming of these her dearest friends, shed tears and wept apace. How now my dear (quoth her husband) is all well? "No God wot sir, (quoth she againe) For how can I be well with a woman that is depoyled of her honour and womanhood? The print, Collatinus, of another mans is to be seen in thy own bed, Howbeit, "my body only is dishained: my mind and heart remaineth yet unpotted: and that my death shall "make good and justifie. But give me first your right hands, and make faithfull promise that the "adulterer shall not escape unpunished. Sex. Tarquinius is the man, he it is, who this night past, en-

"certained as a friend, but indeed a very foe in the highest degree, hath by force and violence taken "from hence with him his pleasure, a deadly pleasure, I may say, to me: and to himselfe also no lesse, K
"if ye be men of courage. All of them one after another give their assured word, comforted the "wofull hearted woman, excused her selfe that was forced, and laid all the blame upon him that "committed the shamefulle adlaying: could be no fault at all. Well (quoth she) what is his due to have,
"was no will and consent there, howsoever I quit and asail my selfe of sin, yet I will not be freed from "punishment. And never shall there by example of Lucretia, any dishonest woman or wanton har-
"lot live a day: & thus having said, with a knife which she had clole hidden under her cloaths, she "stabbed her selfe to the heart, and sinking down forward, fell upon the floor ready to yeeld up "ghost. Out alas, cried her husband and father heret: and whilset they two were in their plaints
"and moans, Brutus drew forth the knife out of the wound of Lucretia, & holding it out afore him, L
"all embrued and dropping with blood. "Now I swear (quoth he) by this blood, by this most chaste
"and pure blood before the villany wrought by the Kings son, and here before the gods I protest,
"whom I call to witness that I will by fire and sword, and with all my might and main persecute
"and drive the country of L. Tarquinius the proud, and his ungracious wife, and the whole brood "of his children, and suffer neither him nor any else for his sake to reign as King at Rome. Then "gave he the knife to Collatinus, and so to Lucretia & Valerius who greatly amazed at this so strange "occurrence, and wondering how it came to pass, that Brutus should of a sudden be so changed, and "become so stout of stomack and courageous, took the same form of oath that he swore afore: and "so leaving their wailing and lamentation, and wholly set upon anger and revenge, they followed "Brutus as their Captain and leader to put down and overthrow the government of Kings, and ut"terly to root out their race. The dead corps of Lucretia was had out of doors, brought into the "market place and there shewed. And thither, what with wondering (as the manner is) at so strange
"a sight, and what with the indignation of so unworthy a fact, they raised much people together.
"Every man for his part was ready enough to complain of the wickedness and violence done by the "Kings blood. The sorrow of Lucretia the father on the one side, the resolution of Brutus on the o"ther side, who rebuked and blamed all of valour, like true hearted Romans, they would take arms
"all that were present that like men no better pay, worse than ordinary enemies. And presently,
"gaint them that demeaned themselves no better, nay, worse than ordinary enemies. And presently,
"the bravest and tallest young men shewed themselves forward, ready in armour, and voluntary. N
"The rest of the youths followed straight after. And having left at Collatia the one half of their forces in "the garrison, toward the gates, and for certain watches, that no man brought tidings or news unto the "King and his sons of this rising and commotion, all the other were appointed in warlike manner, "followed their leader Brutus from thence directly to Rome. At the sudden coming thither of this ar"med multitude: no marvel if all the way whereas they passed and marched, there arose a fear"ful and trouble among the people. But when they perceived the most substantiall and principall Citi"zens in the forefront: they judged whatsoever the matter meant, it was not for naught. And verily
"this hainous fact disquieted the minds of men no lesse at Rome, than it had before at Collatia. There"fore from all parts of the City there was flocking and running into the market place. And being "thither come, the Bedell or common Crier, summoned the people to appeare before the Tri"bune of the Celeres or Captain of the guard: which office haply Brutus bare at that time. Where "he made an Oration not proceeding from that spirit, nor resembling that quality of nature which "unto that day he had pretended, and made shew of unto the world, for he inveighed against "the violence and filthy lust of Sextus Tarquinius: the shameful villany and not to be named,
"and done upon the body of Lucretia: "he discoursed of her lamentable end and pious death,
"the desolate case of Tricupimus, heretofore now of all his children: who accounted the occasion of "his daughters death a greater indignity, and more pitifull, than her very death. Moreover he "said

A "laid abroad the pride of the King himselfe, the miseries, the infinite toile and pains of the Com"mons, buried as it were under the ground, with cleanting and calling of ditches, voiding and lar-
"ming of the finks, saying, that the men of Rome which were the conquerors of all nations; about "them, were now of warriors become quarriers, hewers of stone and day-laborers. He reckoned "up also and put them in mind of the unworthy death and cruel murder of Servius Tullius: and
"how his daughter (oh abominable act!) rode over the corpse of other father in her charied chariot:
"And herewith he callecth on the gods that are revengers of outrages and wrongs done to parents.
"Thus rehearsing these and other matters much more grievous and horrible, (I verily beleeve) ac"cording as the present indignity at the very time doth minister and give utterance to, not to easily
"B penned and set down by writers that come after. He so mightily inflamed the multitude, that he "caused them to depole the King, to deprive him of his royall state and dignity, yea, and to decree
"and enact, that L. Tarquinius with his wife and children should be banished for ever. Himselfe ha"ving selected and armed the younger gallants who offered their service, and willingly entred their "names, set forward in person to the Camp lying before Ardea, for to excite the Army there against "the King: leaving the government of the City unto Lucretia, who had before been appointed "Deputy and Lieutenant there, by the King. In this time of gabrille, Tullia left the palace and fled,
"and all the way as she went, both men and women curled and cried out upon her and besought the "ghostly spirits and Inuries of parents to be avenged. When news herof was brought into the Camp, "and that the King upon these strange tidings made harte towards Rome, to slay and imprecise these
"C broyls: Brutus having intelligence of his coming, turned another way because he would not meet "with him. And so at one instant in a manner by contrary journeyes came Brutus to Ardea, and "Tarquinius to Rome. But the gates were shut against Tarquinius, and instead of entrance, warned he "was and commanded into exile. The whole Camp received with joy Brutus the redeemer of their "City. From thence were also the Kings sons driven: two of them followed after their father and "departed into banishment unto Carae, a town of the Tullians: as for Sextus Tarquinius, he retired
"himselfe to Gales as it were into his own Kingdom: where he was murdered in revenge of old "quarrels, upon malice and hatred of the people, which he had brought upon himselfe in times past.
"L. Tarquinius Superbus reigned 25 years. This continued the Kings Regiment at Rome, from the "foundation of the City, unto the freedom and redemption thereof 244 years. Then in a solemn
"D assembly and election by the Centuries, he by the Provost of the City, according to the ordi"nance of Servius Tullius in his Commentaries, two Conules were created: L. Junius Brutus, and

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Second Book.

B Brutus took an oath of the people, that they should not suffer any to reign King at Rome. He com"pelled his fellow Consul Tarquinius Collatinus, a suspected man to take part with the Tarquins, by "reason of the affinity he had with them, to give over the Consulship, and to depart the City. The gods of "the King, and his sons he commanded to be seized upon and killed. A field of theirs he caused to be
"Mars, which was named afterwards Campus Martius, or Mars field. He bade a certain young man
"T then of the Nobility together with his own and his brothers sons, for conspiring to receive the King and "his Complex again into the City. About the bondslave Vindictus, that bewitched the camp, because "freedom of whom Vindictus took the name. Having led an Army against the King who had usurped
"a power of Veientians and Tarquinius and made war, he died in battle together with Annus, the son "of Superbus: and for his death the dames of Rome mourned one whole year. P. Valerius the Consul "proposed and made a Law concerning Appealing unto the people. The Capitol was dedicated, Porci-
"na King of the Clitians, warring in the quarrell of the Tarquins, and being come unto the Janiculum,
"was by the valour of Cocles Horatius, encompassed that he passed not the Tiber: who alone while others
"bowed down the Sublician bridge, withstood the Tullians: and when it was broken down, leapt down as "he was into the river, and swam over to his fellows. Another example of mischance is reported of Mutius,
"G who being entered the Camp of the enemies with full intent to kill Porcena, and having slain his prin"cipall Secretary whom he took for the King, was apprehended: and trusting his hands to the good of "the Allys, whereupon they had vowed sacrifices, suffered there to suffer death: and was condemned: and
"withall, that there were behind him three hundred more besides, that had sworn the death of the King
"himselfe. Who wondering in their resolution, was driven to offer conditions of peace, and up-taking of ho-
"tages to give over war: amongst whom, one virgin Clodia, beguiled their keepers with a disguise, and "flew over Tyber to her friends: and being redressed again, was by Porcena sent honourably home and had her statue or image on horseback; set up for a memoriall. Ap. Claudius abandoned the Sabines, and fled H to Rome, of whom the Tribe Clautia took the name, and was added to the rest. The number of tribes was increased to be one and twenty. Against Tarquinius Superbus, who with a power of Latines waged war, A. Posthumus the Dictator obtained a prosperous battell at the lake Regillus. The Commons rising, for being entrall'd unto their Creditors, retir'd themselves into the mount Sacet, and were by the policy and counsel of Menenius Agrippa, reclaimed from their sedition, and appeas'd. The same Agrippa being deceiv'd, I of Menenius Agrippa, was taken by the valour and industrious means of Cn. Martius Coriolanus, a town of the Volscians was taken by the valour and industrious means of Cn. Martius, who thereupon was surnamed Coriolanus. T. Latinius, a mean Commoner, was warned in a dream to make relation to the Senate of certain religious ceremonies: and for neglecting the same, lost his son; I and felt himself to be lame of his limbs, and being brought in the Senate in a chair, after he had declar'd the same, returned sound on his feet home again. Cn. Martius Coriolanus, after he was banished, became General of the Volscians, and with an Army of enemies approached the City of Rome: unto whom, I st. Eul. affiders were of purpose sent, and afterwards the Priests and whole Clergy perswaded with him, not to make war against his native Countrey, but all in vain. Horben Veturia his mother; and Volumnia his wife entreated him and obtained, that he should depart back again. The Law Agraria, concerning division of lands among the poor Commons, was now first put up and proposed, Sp. Calfurcia, an Alderman, after he had been Consul, was condemned for aspiring to be King, and suffered death therefore. Oppia a Vest. Il Nun was for incest buried quick. Against the Veintians near enemies and ill neighbors, yet indeed troublesome rather than noisome and dangerous, the house alone of the Fabii, required to be employ'd in service: and set out three hundred and six armed men to the field, who every one were by the enemies slain near the river Cremera, and left but one only at home alive of that name, under fourteen years of age. Ap. Claudius the Consul having fought unfortunately against the Volscians, and that, by means of the stubbornness and unwilliness of his Army, engag'd every tenth man of his soldiers. Over and besides (this book) containeth the exploits against the Volscians, Equians, and Veintians, and the seditions discords between the Nobility and Commons.

The Second Book of T. Livius.

NOW will I describe from henceforth, the acts both in war and peace of the people of L Rome, a free state now from this time forward: their yearly Magistrates and Governours: the authority and rule of Laws, more powerfull and mighty than that of men. Which freedom of theirs, the last Kings pride made more acceptable and welcome. As for the other Kings before him, they reigned so, as that they might be counted all of them; and that worthily, builders of sundry parts of the City one after another, according as they every one by himself added still one new place or other, for the multitude by them encreased to inhabit. Neither is it to be doubted, but that even the very same Brutus, who deserved to great honor and glory for expelling the proud King Tarquinius, should have done the same to the exceeding danger of the weal publicke, if for desire of unripe and untimely freedom, he had wrested the royall cignity and government from any of the former Princes. For what would have come of it, if that commonwealth consisting of herdmen and fugitive strangers, resorting out of their own countries thither to dwell, having under protection of a sanctuary and privileged place gotten liberty, or at leastwise impunity: being now freed and past fear of a royall Majesty, had begun to be troubled and disquieted, with the rustling storms and seditious tempests of the Tribunes, and in a new and strange City town debate, and entertained variance with the Nobility, before that the surest pledges of wives and children, the dearest affection of the very place and soil, which requireth long time of liking and loving, had united and knit their hearts together? Certainly, the state not yet come to full growth and maturity, had by discord faded and come to nought, which a peaceable and gracious government cherish'd and fostered, and by cherishing and nourishing brought to that paise, that now being come to ripeness and perfection of strength, it might be able to bring forth and bear N the good and wholom fruits of liberty.

The beginning of this freedom you must account in regard hereof. That the Consulary regiment was annual, and from year to year, rather than that the royall power and jurisdiction that the Kings had, was any whit abated and diminished. For the first Consuls had the same absolute authority, held all the former royalties, and retained still the regall ensignes and ornaments of supreme dignity. This only provided that they should not both have the rods borne before them, for avoiding a twofold fear and dread of their Majesty. Brutus with the good liking and consent of his companion in office, had the preheminence and prerogative of that honour to be done unto him alone: who had not been aforetime a greater instrument, and more forward to procure and recover the liberty than he was afterward a true maintainer and protector of the same. And first above O all other things, whilst the people were yet greedy of this new freedom, for fear lest they might any time after be won by entreaty or moved by gifts on the Kings part, he caus'd them to swear that they would never suffer any to be King at Rome. After this, because the Senate might be of more power and greater reputation by the frequent company of that degree and order: he encreased their number (which had been impaired much by massacres, committed by the said King) to the full complement of three hundred: by choosing the chief and principall of the degree of

Kings

A Knights or horsemen. And hereof came, as they say, this custom, to admit into the Senate both them that were before time of the ancient Nobility, and also those that were newly taken for the supply: naming these that were last enrolled, the new Senate. And a wonder it was to see, how much good this did to the concord of the City, and to the knitting of the hearts of Nobles and Commons together.

This done, they went in hand with Religion and Church-matters: and for that there were certain publicke sacrifices that had been usually executed by the Kings themselves in their own persons: left therefore they should not find the mixt of Kings in any respect, nor long after them again they create of purpose a King-Priest or sacrificer: which fact, doubtless, might they ordain'd to be under the Arch-Priest, left that this new addition and title of honour, might prejudice their freedom any jot, whereunto they had then a speciall regard above all other things. And I wot not well, but I think verily they went beyond all measure, and were over precise in the maintenance and strengthening thereof every way, even in the smallest trifles, and toys of no moment. For when as nothing else was offensive unto them, the name forthwith of one of their Commons became suspected and odious unto the City, without any other scandal whatsoever. And thus they interceded and said, "That the Tarquinius had reigned over long, and too much already that P. Postumius began, and when after him succeeded King Servius Tullius, Superbus Tarquinius not living in that time and space between, forgot the Kingdom, as seeing another invited therein: by wicked practice and violence claimed and recovered the same again, as the inheritance properly to his house belonging. And now that Superbus is driven out and gone, the rule and government is devolved unto Collatinus, and there reflect. These Tarquinius belike (say they) cannot skill how to live as private men: giving out among, that the very name was dangerous to a free state, and in one word, they could not endure it. These and such like speeches at first were whisper'd abroad throughout all the City by them that under-hand fowled by little and little the hearts and dispositions of men; and when their humies & insinuations were once buzzed into the Commons heads, and they thereby disquieted, Brutus called them to a generall assembly. Where first and foremost he reviveth the oath of the people: That they should suffer none to be a King nor ought die in Rome, from whence might arise any danger to their liberty. "This oath is the thing (quoth he) that with all diligence, & by all means possible is to be maintained, & nothing thereto appertaining is to be defiled and lightly regarded. As for me, I am unwilling to speak in respect of the person, neither would I speak at all, but that the love and affection to the Common weal doth overcome me. The people of Rome is not thoroughly perswaded, that they have recovered their entire and perfect liberty. For as yet the Kings blood, yea, and the Kings name not only remaineth still, but also searcht sovereign rule in the City: This is it that hurteth, this is it (I say) that hindered their true freedom. Now (quoth he) I, Tarquinius willingly of my own accord rid them of their fear. We remember well, we confess and acknowledge, you it was that expelled the Kings. Finish therefore and perfect this great benefit of yours: take away from hence the Kings name also. As for your goods and substance, your Citizens and Commoners, if they will be advised by me, shall not only yield unto you again but if ought be thought and wanting, that by my content supply the same to the full right liberally. Depart I say, and bravely take your good leave: sever the City and disburden them of this their fear, that peradventure is but a vain and needless: Howbeit, this their minds give them, that together with the flock and home of the Tarquinius, the Kings rule and government will likewise void and depart for ever. The Consul at this strange and sudden a motion first wondred much, and was not able to open his mouth. But afterwards, as he addressed himself and began to make a speech, the heads of the City came about him, and with many prayers besought the same at his hands. As for all the rest, they prevailed with little time, but after that Sp. Lucretius more grave and elder man than himself, of greater worth and authority, and his father in Law besides, took him in hand and dealt with him sundry waies, one while by way of intreaty, otherwhiles by perfwasions and reasonings, that he would consent them, that

C he should the City in one general content required: then the Consul tearing left heretofore, being out of his place and a private man again, he should chanceto be forced therewith, with a loss of his goods and some disgrace perhaps besides; resigned up the office of the Consulship, and receiving all that he had away to Lavinium, quit the City and departed. Then Brutus by an act and decree of the Senate, proposed unto the people, That all the race and lineage of the Tarquinius should be exiled. And in a generall session of the Centuries, he created for to be his C. C. legging government. P. Valerius, by whose assilance he had driven out the Kings.

Now man doubted now that the Tarquinius were about to take arms: yet that was hapned not to soon as men looked for: but see (a thing that no man ever J) they had like by fraud and treachon at home to have lost and forgone their freedom again. There was of the flower of Roms, certain youths, & those of no low degree nor base parentage descended, who in the Kings daies had lived like young Princes more loosely and at pleasure, as companions and playfellows with the young Tarquinius, the Kings sons: who seeking to enjoy the time licentious life still, in this equality of estate wherein all others then lived, made moan and complained one to another. That the liberty of others turned to their servitude. The King, say they is a man, at whose hands one might obtain somewhat as need requires, were the cause right or were it wrong: where a man might find favour and friendship, as who could both be displeased and angry, and also forgive and requit a fault, and principals of the Tufcans, one while he challenged them one by one to single fight: other-whites he rared them all in general calling them the hirelings and slaves of proud Kings and tyrants: who forgetting and making no reckoning of their own freedom, were come to oppugnand impeach the liberty of others. The enemies stood at a bay and in suspense a good while, looking about them: one upon another who should first begin to fight. At last, very shame made the whole troupe to stir and come forward, and to setting up a loud cry, from all sides they let fire their javelins at him one man alone and their only enemy. All this while bare he off their shot which light upon his target, and there stuck, and nevertheless with full resolution kept the bridge still, walking his flations, and talking like a giant. Then assaid they with all their force to beare the man down and to turn him over into the water: but by this time they had finished their work, laid under him, and the shout withall of the Romans, for joy that they had finished their work, laid with sudden fear their violent assault. Then praised Cicero in this wise: "O father Tiberinus (quoth

he) O sacred river, with devout heart I thee beseech, receive with thy gracious and merciful stream these harnes, these weapons, and this thy soldier. And so all armed as he was he leapt into the Tyber: and albeit many a dart was flung from aloft and scitered another day to talk of, rather and escaped safe to his fellows. A brave adventure for all security another day to talk of, rather than to believe. For this so great fortitude and resolution of his, the City was thankfull, and in token thereof his Image or Statue was set up in their common Hall, named Comitium, and as much ground given him in compais, as he was able to plough with a plough and good wils of private persons public labours and honours done unto him, the kind affections and good wils of private persons also well appeared: for in that extreme want and scarcity that then was, every man out of his house-store and provision spared from himself, and for to give him one thing or another defranded:
his own belly. Thus Porcena with the repulse of this his first enterrion in the Janiculum, he parted suing to besieging of the City: and after he had placed a garrison in the Janiculum, he parted himself and encamped on the plain, even upon the banks of the Tyber, and sending for boats and craiers from all parts, both to stop the mouth and passage of Tyber, that no corn should come in and be conveyed to Rome: and also that the soldiers, as they saw occasion might cross the river, and fetch booties in divers and sundry places at their pleasure, in short space he brought the whole cattel also was slain to be driven out of the fields into the City, and no man durst put any creature forth out of the gates. The Tufcans were permitted to be thus bold, not so much for fear as for a policy: for Valerius the Consul, waiting for some vantage and opportunity, suddenly to let upon many of them at once and at unawares, as they straggled abroad disorderly, making little regard to revenge small matters, kept himself to be revenged of them thoroughly, and to pay them home one time or other. To the end therefore he might draw forth these forragers, and toll them abroad, he gave his men in charge, and proclaimed, That the next day in great companies they should put their cattel forth at the gate Esquilina, which was farthest from the enemies: supposing that they would have intelligence thereof, by reason that in this extremity of long siege and pinching hunger, some false knaves and disloyal rogues would give unto them. And so fell it out indeed: For they had knowledge thereof by a fugitive slave. Whereupon they in far greater multitudes pass over the river, in hope to make a general spoil and havoc once for all. Then Valerius commanded T. Herminius with a sufficient company to lie close in ambush at two miles end, in the Sabine high way, and Sp. Lartius with a power of litty lally fellows lightly armed, to keep the gate Colina, untill the enemy were gone by and past: with direction, then to put himself between the river and them, and so to intercept them in their returne. The other Consul T. Lucretius issued forth with certain bands of footmen at the gate Navia: and Valerius himself in proper person set forth from mount Calvus certain ensigns of his best and choice soldiers. These first were defeated and discovered by the enemy. Herminius too soon as he heard some noise and stir, arose and ran at once out of the ambush, and whilst the Tufcans turned to let upon Lucretius, he charged them lustily at their backs: so that on every hand from the gate Colina on the one side, and from the gate Navia on the other, the alarm was given. Thus the robbers were slain and cut in pieces in the midst of them: both for that they were overmatched in fight and also because all the waies were stopped up, that they could not escape by way of flight. And never after durst the Tufcans range about the country so audaciously. Howbeit, the siege continued nevertheless, with great scarcity of corn, and exceeding dearth within the City. At what time one C. Mutius a noble should now, being the same still in time of their freedom be of these Tufcans besieged, whose armies they often had defeated: and supposing that by some hardy and adventurous piece of service this reproachfull indignity was to be revenged, devised at first on his own head to enter into the enemies Camp: but fearing afterwards to go without commission from the Consul and the knowledge of any other person, lest peradventure he might be taken by the watch of the Romans, and brought back for a traitorous runnagate, at such a time especially, when the hard estate of the City was enough to bring him into a deep suspicion, and to be reputed for no better: preferred himself before the Council into the Senate house: "I am right willyng, and I have a purpose not in quality of a robber, nor to be revenged for booties from us taken, with doing the temptable. A greater exploit with the favour of the gods, I intend to perform. The Senators gave their consent, and approved his designment. Then with a skin, hidden under his garment he let tether forward. Being thither come into the Camp, he crept in the thickest throng to stand near the Kings Tribunal. It fortuned that then and there the soldiers were receiving their pay. And the Chan ellor, or Kings principal Secretary lay together with the King in like array, much employed and buried in many matters, and the soldiers commonly had recourse unto him. Mutius leaning to enquire whether of them two were Porcena, set by not knowing the King he should be-B way himself who he was hapned (see how fortune in her callnes directed his hand) to kill the Secretary instead of the King: then as he passed through the thickest multitude, making himself way with his bloody blade there was a peccent outcry, and thereat the Kings guard came running in to hold of him, and brought him back before the King his royal Throne: and albeit he was now forlorn and without all comfort, amidst those threats or throwing stones, yet as a man more feared (till then fearing: "I am (quoth he) a Citizen of Rome, and Curius Mutius is my name, a proffessed enemy, I confess, and an enemy would I have slain: as ready and willing am I to dye myself, as I was to kill another. For, both to do, and to suffer valiantly is the part of a noble Roman, And it is not I alone that carry this mind and resolution against thee. O King, there is a long train and cune behind of them that seek to win the same praise and honour: make thee C re dye therefore, and arm thyself thou thinkest good, against this danger, and to exoner every hour to be in hazard of thy life, and to have always at the very Court gates thy enemies word,

"This kind of war do we youths of Rome denounce openly unto thee: no battle, no light else start thou need to fear. With thee alone will we all, one by one have to do, and with none other. Hereat the King incensed with wrath, and for the danger that he stood in, alighted withall commanded in menacing wise that he should be tried at a stake, unless he would presently unclod in plain terms, what secret and dangerous practices he meant and threatened unto this coverment of words and intrate circumstancies. "Lo, (quoth he again) how little they let by this: as that aspire to great glory and aim at honour: and with that thrust his right hand into the hearth on fire that was made for the sacrifice and when he endured the roasting thereof, as if he had been careless, and felt no pain, the King well nigh astonished at this wonderfull and mira-D culous sight, start up and leapt from his royall seat and chair of estate, commanding the young man to be had from the altar. "Go thy waies (quoth he) in peace, thou that hast done thy own kille more mischief than thou hast attempted against my person. I would lay God bless thee, and worthy hadst thou been of honour for thy prowess, if it were in my service, and in the behalf and defence of mine own Country: and now by the law of arms I discharge thee freely, and give thee leave to depart without any hurt or able offered unto thee. Then Mutius, as it were to requite again his censure and desert, "Forasmuch as (quoth he) thou wast so great for by valour and honour thou wert so high: to the end it may be seen that thou shalt get at my hands "by course that which by cruel threats thou couldst not: these are therefore to let thee under-E stand that there are three hundred of us noble youths, even the very flower and knighthood of Rome, that have conspired and sworn thy death, and in this manner to assaile thee. My lot it was to be the first the rest as it shall fall out, will be here shortly, and wait every man his turn and time: untill they hit right upon thee. Mutius, summoned afterwards Scavus, by reason of the main of his right hand, was no sooner dismissed and gone, but there followed straight after him Rome Embassadors from Porcena, and so much troubled in spirit was he, both for the danger past of the first assaile, (from which nothing preserved him but a small error and oversight of the assailant) and also for the hazard to come, (for look how many conspirators remained behind to give the like attempts, so often stood he in jeopardy of his life) that of his own accord he offered the Romans conditions of peace. And among other capitulations, he stood hard upon this article, but F all in vain of restoring the Larginus into their Kingdom. This point the King urged instantly, rather because he could not well himself deny the Larginus so much, than for that he was ignorant, that the Romans would never yield thereto. But another article he got granted, namely, the restitution of the Veintians lands again: and the Romans were driven of necessity to give him hotages, in case they would have the Kings garrison to quit the Janiculum. Upon these conditions peace was concluded, and Porcena withdrew his forces from the Janiculum, disarmed and departed out of the territory of Rome. The Senators bestowed frankly upon Mutius as a testimoniall of his valiantness, a piece of ground lying beyond Tyber, which was afterwards called, Mutius pa-tis, i.e. Mutius his meadows.

Upon this honourable regard and reward of vertue, women were likewise provoked an Len-G gered to enterprize worthy acts in the service of the Common-wealth. For a young damoel and Virgin, named Clelia, one of those hostages afore said, whilst the Tufcans were encamped (as it fell out) not far from the banks of Tyber, desiring her keeper and leading a company of other maidens after her, even within the shot and darts of the enemies, took the river, swam over with them, brought them all to Rome safe, and delivered them to their parents, kindred and friends. Which being reported to the King, he at the first frowned at it, and was all in a rage, and sent unto Rome certain Orators to demand again his hostage Clelia by name: as for all the left, he made no great account of them: but afterwards, upon further consideration he admired H the enterprise, and plainly said, it surpassed far all the adventures of the Codrus and the Amia: so as he pretended that if the maid were not rendered again, he would take the league as broken, and being yielded, he would send her back to her friends, undefiled, and without any abuse or violence done unto her. On both parts was promise faithfully kept: For both the Romans restored the pledge of peace according to covenant, and seen also it was, that virtue was not only secured safe, but also highly regarded and honoured with the Tulcan King. For after he had commended and praised the damsel, he promised to give her part of the hostages, chuse whom he would. And when they were all brought forth before her, he made chuse (they say) of those young boys that were under 14 years of age: which was not only most befitting her virginity, but also by the accord of the hostages themselves best approved: namely, that that age especially should be delivered out of the enemies hands, which was most subject to injury and taking wrong. The peace thus renewed and confirmed, the Romans rewarded this rare valour in that sex, with as new and strange an honour, for, in remembrance of her, in the top of Via sacra, there was erected her statue, A maiden sitting on horseback.

There remaineth yet even unto our daies amongst other solemn ceremonies, this one custome receivd from our ancestors, far differing and disagreeing from this peaceable and friendly departure of the Tulcan King from before the City of Rome, and this it is: In the portage of goods they use to proclaim first aloud, The sale of King Porcena his goods. This ceremonial custome must needs either begin in time of war, and so was not afterwards forgotten in peace: or else arose from some more gracious and gentle occasion at the first, then this title or outward form pretends, of selling goods by way of hostility, and after the manner of enemies. But the likeliest conjecture, and nearest to the truth of all those that are given out is this: that Porcena did lodge from the Janicle, gave freely unto the Romans, (the City at that time being after long siege distressed and in great straits) his rich Camp furnished with victual and provision, conveyed thither out of the plentiful countries of Hetruria near adjoining: which goods, for fear there should have been some havock and spoil made thereof in warlike wise, in case the people had been let loose to the rifling of the tents, were after sold, and called Porcena his goods: which title signified rather their thankful acceptance of the gift, and remembrance of the giver, than any open and overt sale of the Kings goods, which were not so much as in the Romans power, nor at their disposition.

Thus Porcena having given over the Roman war, because he would not seem to have brought an host of men into those parts, and performed no exploit, sent his son Armus with part of his forces to surprize and assault Aricia. At the first this sudden and unexpected enterprize much troubled the Aricins. But afterwards when he had gotten aid both from the Latine nations & also from Cumes, they took such heart again, that they durst enter into the field & bid the enemy battell. In the beginning of the conflict, the Tulcans charged them so hotly that at the very first encounter, they brake the arraies of the Aricins. But the troops of the Cumes letting policy against them, went a little aside, made way and gave some ground, and when the enemies had outstripped them & were rashly and disorderly passed beyond them, they turned their ensignes, and let upon their backs: so were the Tulcans, being in the very train of their victory, beset round about, and slain in the midst between. Only a small remnant of them after the loss of their Captain, because they had no other place of refuge nearer, were fain to trudge to Rome without weapons and belovied in several lodgings, both in deed and shew. Where they were kindly entertained home reporting the hospitality & courteous usage they have found. Many remained still at Rome for love of their hosts and the City: who had a place allotted them to dwell in, which after they called Thufens vicus, the Tulcan street.

After this, were P. Lucretius and P. Valerius the third time created Coff. In that year, for a small end, there came Embassadors from Porcena, to treat about the restoring of the Verginius into their Realm: to whom this answer was returned: that the Senate would send Embassadors N to the King himself: whereupon there were immediately addrested unto him in Embassy the most honourable personages of all the Nobility, who in the name of the people of Rome delivered this speech: That the chief of their Nobles were sent, rather than any dispatch given by word of mouth unto his Embassadors at Rome: nor for that they could not have shapen their wish in this short answer, "They would no Kings have: But to this end that for ever after there should be no just renewed of that matter, nor in to great mutual benefits, and favours passed between them, some discordant arise on either side, whilst he might be thought to request that which was repugnant and prejudicial to the liberty of Rome, and the Romans again, to make they would be executors of their own wrongs, and seek their own mischiefs, to make denial to him whom by their good will they would not seem to deny ought for anything in the world. But as to the substance in the matter, this was the point: namely, that the people of Rome were not under the regiment of a King, but were a free State: and fully settled in this purpose. To let open their gates to the enemies, sooner than to Kings: and were all generally of this mind and resolution. That look when the freedom of that City had an end, then should the City come to an end also. To conclude therefore they were to entreat him that if he tendered the weal and safety of Rome, he would permit them to be free still and at their own liberty.

The Roman
Embassadors
to King Por-cena.

A The King overcome with very modesty, and much abashed in himself, answered thus again: "Since you are so fully minded and fully bent (quoth he) neither will I importune you, nor shall I your ears with harping still upon this impatient thing, and do no good: nor bear the Verginius any longer in hand, and deceive them of that hope of aid, with nothing at all in my power to perform. Let them from henceforth seek some other pace of exile, either for peace or war, as they shall think more expedient, that there may be nothing to let and hinder the free course of amity, and alliance between me and you. To their good and kind words be joynd better and more friendly deeds, for all the hostages that remained in his hand he sent home and to the Verginius lands which by the covenants indentured at Tusculum, were taken away, he restored to the B Romans again. Thus Turpinus seeing all hope of return cut off, removed unto Tusculum, as was in law Mondus Octavius here to live and spend the rest of his daies in banishment, so there continued faithful peace between the Romans and King Porcena.

Then were Coff, M. Valerius and P. Posthumus. In that year the Romans fought with the Sabines formatively, and the Comituli triumphed. But afterwards the Sabines made greater preparation of war: to withstand whom, as also for fear of some sudden danger that might arise from Tusculum, from whence they suspected war, although none was openly seen, were P. Porcena the fourth time, and T. Lucretius the second time created Coff. But among the Sabines there grew some civil discord between that part that would have war, and the contrary part that for peace which gained the Romans some strength even from thence. For Appius Claudius (who afterwards at Rome was intimated Appius Claudius) a perwader himself of quietness and quiet-peace, being overmatched and not able to make his part good with the adverse faction that minded and stirred troubles, accompanied with a great power of friends and followers, from Rome did lead to Antium, who were enrailed Citizens, and possessed of those lands that lie beyond the river Tiber. And from thence came the name of the old trade Appia: after that other new Citizens were put unto them, those I mean, that defended of that race and out of the same territory, this Appia was admitted into the number of the Senators, and not long after advanced to be one of the chief men and heads of the City. The Coff went with a strong power into the Sabines land, where after they had first wasted the Country, and after in battell abated the strength and puissance of the enemy: so, as for a long time after they needed not to fear any rebellion from thence, they returned D to Rome in triumph.

The year following, when Acipia Menenius and P. Posthumus were Coff, P. Porcena ended his daies in great glory, reputed the only singular man in those times, by all mens judgement, for skill and knowledge as well in martiall feats as in civil affairs: but to poor was his estate that he had not wherewith to defray his funeral expenses, and was therefore at the Cities charge right honourably entred. And the Dames of Rome mourned for him as they did for Berut.

The same year two Colonies of the Latines, Pometia and Ardea, revolted to the Auruncs. The Romans first began to war upon the Auruncs. And after they had discomfited a great host of them, who met with the Comituli as they entered the borders and fiercely made head against them, then all the Auruncan war was given and translated wholly to Pometia. The slaughter and execution E was no less after the conflict, than during the fight: for whereas there were many more of them slain outright in the place than taken prisoners, those also that were prisoners, they spared not but murdered every where as they went: neither laid the furious rage of war therewith, but even the very hostages whom they had received, to the number of 500, they put to their sword. In this year also was a triumph at Rome.

The Comituli Opter Verginius and Sp. Cassius, that followed the next year, assailed Pometia, still by measure to scale the walls, after with pikes, muntrels, platforms, and other fabrics, gained against it. Upon whom the Auruncs sallied forth, rather of a cankered and malicious hatred than for any hope or vantage given them of good exploit: the greater part of them furnished better with fire-works than armed with sword and spear, killed and burned all about them: and in this F thus fired their fabrics afore said, hurt and slain a great number of their enemies, one of the Comituli also (but his name precisely is not by any author left down) was sore wounded, (the Comituli from his horie and well-near slain. Whereupon the Romans returned back to Rome, and were sorely dejected, leaving the Comituli behind them amongst many that were hurt, like to die soon after, and no longer than whilst their wounds might be healed, and a new supply of soldiers made, they came against Pometia, in more furious manner than before, and also with a stronger power. And when by making of new munitions and other warlike instruments of assault, they were proceeded thus forward that the souldiers were ready to scale and get up the wall: then they with yielded: and notwithstanding the Town was thus surrendered up, yet there was no more harm shewed unto it, than if it had been forced by assault. The chief and principal Citizens of the G Town, and the rest of the inhabitants were sold at the spear in open market like beasts, the Town sack and raved to the ground, yea and money made of the lands belonging to the Comituli for that they had so weakened their anger, and sharply revenged themselves, more than for any great war they had finished, obtained triumph.

The year following, were Posthumus Cassius and T. Lucretius Comituli. In this year, downe the games and plaies at Rome, certain yonkers of the Sabines, went about in a warre on justice, to carry away and ravish the Curteans and common Strumpets of the City. Whereupon the people rose together.

together, and made a riot, grew to words, and from words to brawls, inomuch, as they went to- H gether by the ears, and made a fray in manner of a battell: upon which small occasion there was a rebellion like to ensue, Over and besides the fear of the Latines war, (for to encrease their troubles the more, news came, and it was certainly known, that by the soliciting and practice of Ornatius Mamilius, there were already thirty nations banded together against the Romans. The City thus being perplexed for the event and expectation of these so great occurrences, there arose the first occasion and mention made of creating a Dictator. But neither in what year, nor in what Consuls time (for that it can hardly be believed, that they should be of the Tarquinius faction, and yet that also is reported) nor yet who was first created Dictator, is it certainly known: However, in the most ancient writers I find that T. Lavinus was created the first Dictator, and Cunctus Cassius Generall of the horsemen: and Consular men (such as had been Consuls afore) they were that elected him: for so the law provided that was enacted, concerning the creation of a Dictator. And this inducteth me the rather to believe, that Lavinus an ancient man, and one who had been Consul before, was appointed as a Controller and Master over the Consuls, and not M. Valerius the son of Marcus, and grandson of Volsus, who as yet had not attained to the Consuls dignity. For if these Consular men afore said had been minded to have chosen a Dictator out of that house above all other, surely they would have made choice rather of his father M. Valerius, a noble personage, of approved prowess and valour, and one besides that had been Consul, when the Dictator was once chosen at Rome, and the axes were seen borne before him, the Commoners stood in great awe, and took better regard to be obedient at every beck and command. For neither could they make account of any help (as they might under the Consuls who were both in commission alike, and of equall authority, when they had recourse from the one to the other) nor yet appeal unto the people: no nor look for succour at all, but in their own double diligence and care of obedience. The Sabines likewise were afraid of the Dictator thus created at Rome: and so much the more, because they were verily perswaded he was made of purpose for them: and thereupon they sent Embassa-dors to treat for peace, who beseeching the Dictator and the Senate to pardon so small a fault, and being but a trick of youth, received this answer: That youth indeed might well be pardoned, but such old abuses as they might not, who never rested to fow debate, and minister occasion of one year after another, Howbeit they fate in consultation about a peace, and obtained it had been, if the Sabines could have found in their hearts and condescended to make good and repay the expenses. I So defence was sent and war proclaimed. And yet for that year all was quiet, as it were in time of a secret truce: during the Consulship of Servius Sulpicius, and M. Mamilius Tullus, in whole year there was nothing done worthy of remembrance.

* Called Tullus,

After them were T. Ebutius, and C. Vatinus. In their time Vidua was besieged. * Crispumeria won and Pre-est revolted from the Latines unto the Romans. And the Latine war, which had been a breeding and budding for certain years, was no longer delayed, but brake forth. A. Posthu- mus the Dictator, and T. Ebutius General of the Cavalry, with great power of foot and horse, set forward and advanced as far as the Lake Regillus, in the Territory of Tusculum and there encountered the Army of the enemies in their march. And because they heard say that the Tarquinius were M in the host of the Latines, they could not for anger forbear any longer, but presently fell to it, and began battell. This field was fought right fiercely, and cost more bloodshed a good deal, than others usually before: because the Generals and chief Commanders were there present, not only to give direction by their counsel and advice, but also in person themselves hazarded their own bodies, and fought bravely in the medley. And not one almost of the principall leaders escaped out of the skirmish, either of one side or of the other, save only the Roman Dictator.
For as Posthumus was encouraging his men, and letting them in array in the vanguard, Tarquinius Sabeus (albeit he was now very aged and unweildy, and not able to bestir himself) let spurs to his horse, and ran full butt against him. But having caught a thrust from aside, was rescued by his men that came about him, and retired to a place of safety. And in the other wing, Ebutius General of N the horsemen, set upon Ott. Mamilius: but he the Captain I mean of the Tuniclans, was well ware of him, and espied him coming, and ran his horse with full career likewise upon him, and so de-spicrately they beat their Lances one against the other, that Ebutius was run quite through the arm, and Mamilius wounded in the breast, when the Latines succoured and received into the middle ward. As for Ebutius not able any longer to bear his staff, with his arm fore hurt, withdrew himself out of the battell. The Leader of the Latines nothing dismayed for all his hurt, maintained fight still: and seeing his souldiers somewhat distressed, he tenderth for the Regiment of the Roman exiles, that were under the leading of L. Tarquinius his son: who thicke more couragiously into it for anger that their goods were spoiled: and as the Romans from that quarter began to renew the combat afresh for awhile, And as the Romans from that quarter began to renew and give ground, M. Valerius, the brother of Publius, espying young Tarquinius vanishing himself gloriously in the fore-front of the exiles, inflamed also with a desire of domestical glory of his house: that the same family which had the praise of expelling the Kings, might likewise win the honor of killing them, spurred his horse and with deadly spear ran against Tarquini- us who giving way to his mortal enemy, retired back to his own Regiment. But Valerius by this time was disbanded from his company, and rashly ridden into the battell of the exiles, and

The famous battell at the Lake Regillus.

A and there a common souldier hapned to charge upon him a flank, and run him through. The horie staid not a jot for all the rider was wounded, and so the Roman Knight ready to die, fell to the ground with his armour upon his body, and paid nature her debt, Posthumus the Dictator, after he perceived to valiant a man slain, and the banished man advancing lustily forward with full trot, and his own souldiers distressed, and at point to turn their backs gave express commandment unto his own band, which he led to chide them for to guard his person that as many of their fellows as they saw lie they should take them for enemies, and kill them in the place. Thus by reason of a counter-let the Romans made head again, and renewed the battell. Then began the Dictators cohort to fight, and coming with fresh bodies and courageous stomacks, charged upon B the wearied exiles, and killed them one every side. Whereupon began another combat also between the Colonels and Captains of quality and mark. The Generall of the Latines seeing the battellion of the banished well near environed round by the Roman Dictator, speedily took with him into the forefront of the battell certain squadrons of those that were appointed in the rear-guard to succour and aid: whom T. Herminius, a lieutenant, espied to come marching in good order, and knowing amongst them Mamilius by his gorgeous harness, and goodly coat-armour, with far greater violence than the Generall of the horsemen a little before encountered the Colonell of his enemies to hotly that both he ran Mamilius through his sides, and flue him outright, and also whilst he was disarming and rifling his body, he was wounded himself with a short javay, and being brought back with victory into the Camp, and at first dressing yielded to nature and died. There C rode the Dictator apace to the horsemen, and earnestly cried unto them, that seeing the footmen were toiled out and wearied, they would alight from their horses, and take the matter into their hands. The horsemen soon obeyed, leapt from horseback, and set forward as if they had flown to the forefront, where they exposed their targets in defence of them that fought before the engines.
Whereat presently the Infantry began again to take heart, seeing the principal men of arms, and noble young Gentlemen in the like kind of service, exposed to the same danger, and ready to take part with them. Then at the last were the Latines put back, and their whole battell began to shrink.
The Gentlemen had their horses brought to them again, and they mounted on horseback to pursue their enemies. The footmen likewise followed after. There the Dictator omitting no help of God and man, vowed as men say, a Temple to Cassus, and openly promised and propoed rewards D to that souldier that made either first or second entry into the enemies Camp. Whereupon they bestirred themselves so courageously, that the Romans at one brunt both vanquished their enemies, and also were possessed of their tents. This was the noble field fought at the Lake Regillus.
The Dictator and the Generall of horsemen returned into the City with triumph. For three years after there was neither assured peace between them, nor yet professed war.

Consuls were Q. Cloelius, and T. Lartius. After them A. Sempronius, and M. Minucius. Whiles these two were Consuls, the Temple to Saturn was dedicated, and the least called Saturnalia instituted. After them succeeded A. Posthumus, and T. Virginius. And in this year and not before, Hind in some authors, that the said battell was stricken near the Lake Regillus, and that A. P. Posthumus suspecting the fidelity of his brother Consul gave over his place, and so was made Dictator. The E account of times doth to vary and is so intricate and confused, whilst writers diversely set down the chief Magistrates, that in so great antiquity, not of acts only, but also of authors, man cannot orderly and directly distinguish, according to some writers, who were Consuls, and what was done in every year.

Afterwards were Ap. Claudius, and P. Servilius created Consuls. This year was famous for the news of Tarquinius his death. He died at Comus, at which place after the defection of the Latines power, he went to Aspidodemus the Tyrant. At which tidings the hearts of the Nobles were well lightened the Commons also began to look up. But the joy in the Nobility was above measure too excessive and licentious. For why? the great men began now to wrong and wring the commonalty, whom until that day they had favoured and pleased to their full power. In the same year F Volturnus, which King Tarquinius had created, was now filled again the second time, and the number supplied with new inhabitants. And the tribes or wards at Rome were now made up 21. The temple of Mercury was dedicated in the Ides of May. With the Nation of the Volturnians in the time of the Latine war neither was there peace nor war: for both the Volturnians had levied a power for aid to lend unto the Latines, if the Roman Dictator had not made good speed an-also the Roman Dictator halting the more for fear he should in one battell have to deal with Latines and Volturnians both at once. Upon this quarrell, the Consuls led forth their Legions into the Volturnians Country. The Volturnians fearing no revenge for their disengagement (that was intended only, and never came in action) were much troubled with this sudden and unlooked for a current. Not minding therefore to make resistance and forgetfull of warlike prowess they delivered G 300 of their Noblemens children out of Coras and Pontius for hostages. Whereupon the Roman Legions from thence without any fight were withdrawn. But not long after the Volturnians being somewhat calmed and delivered of their fear, came again to their old bias, and returned to their wonted nature, and secretly under-hand made preparation anew for war, joyning with them at some degrees in this quarrell the Hermikes. They lend also their Embassadors all out to move and to persuade L. Titus. But the Latines, for their late overthrow at the Lake Regillus, took such a spleen and hated against him wholeover, that should once put into their heads and perswade them to take Rome.

arms, that they could not forbear the very Embassadors, but offer them abuse. They apprehended H therefore the Volscians, conveyed them to Rome, and delivered them to the Comituli: where they revealed and gave intelligence, that the Volscians and Hernicks were out in arms ready to war upon the Romans. Which being reported unto the Senators, they were well pleased and contented therewith, that they set at liberty 6000 Latines, prisoners, and sent them home. And concerning a league to be concluded with them, which was like before to have been denied for ever, they referred the consultation thereof, unto the new Magistrates that should next enter. And in good sooth pleasant & glad were the Latins then for that they had done, and the authors of peace were magnified and had in great reputation. They sent moreover a Crown of gold into the Capitol, for a present to Jupiter. With these Embassadors, and the present, those prisoners which before were in fetters came in greater number. Who repaired straight waies to every man his house, where they had been prisoners, yielding them great thanks for their kind usage and friendly entertainment in time of their calamities and miseries, and promised therewith the like comely and mutual hospitality. Never were the Latines at any time afore, both publicly and privately, united more necerly to the Roman Empire.

But as the Volscian war was now at hand, so the City was at discord among themselves. The Senators and Commons hated one another at the heart, and all this arose by occasion especially of certain persons that were indebted, and in danger of their creditors: who muttered and gave out in murmuring wile, how that abroad they adventured themselves and fought for the liberty and dominion of the City, and at home by their own neighbours they were held prisoners and oppressed: saying that the freedom of the Commons was more late in time of war than of peace, among the enemies rather than their own fellow Citizens. This inward grudge and heart-burning, which of it self still kindled more and more, the notable calamity of one man above all others, set on a light fire. A certain aged person chained to bondage, and with the arms, badges, and ornaments of all his ancestors, ran into the market place. His apparel was all so tattered, foule, and loathsome, but the habit or plight of his body much more filthy: so pale, so wan, so lean withall, as if he had been over-pined and contumace wild and gally. Howbeit, for all he was thus disfigured by this deformity, he was a man well known, and as some said, he had done good service in the wars: had been a chief Centurion, and had the charge and leading of bands in the field: and the common people, as pitying his estate, and to move compassion, recounted many worthy exploits of his, to his great credit and singular commendation. Himself likewise shewed the scars of wounds, which in his breast and fore-part of his body in divers places he had received that might testify his valiant service. The people flocking about him as it were in a common assembly to hear a solemn Oration, enquired of him, how he came to be in that taking, so poor, so disfigured and deformed? He answered, that while he served in the Sabine war, he by reason of the continual foraging, and wasting of the Territory, not only lost the revenues and increase of his lands, but also his Mannor-house was burnt all his goods ransacked and spoiled, his cattell driven away: and when a levy and tribute was exacted in a time when he ill might he was driven to take up money and run in debt: which growing more and more by payment of interest, first he was constrained to sell his land, that his father and grandfather had left him, and to turn himself out of all, by making a clean hand of the rest of his goods: untill at length his body also began to winder away in a consumption, Complaining moreover how by his creditor he was not only brought into bondage and thralldom, but also imprisoned and whipped, and tormented in most cruel and but herlike manner. With that he shewed before them all his back lately scourged, with the fresh wales of the lashes newly given him. At the sight and hearing hereof, there arose a great outcry of the people, so that anon the upore kept not within the compass of the market place, but spread over all the City: in such sort that as well they that were bound, as they that were loose came forth from all parts into the open streets calling the Quirites and the people pitifully to help. In no corner wanted any companions to the part willingly in this tedious rout and N every where in all the streets they ran by companies into the common place. Those Senators who chanced to be abroad, at their small perill light upon this multitude: and had not the Comituli P. Servilius, and App. Claudius made the better speed, and come upon them to appeale the commotion, there would have been some knocks, for hardly could they and all their other shamefull misdeeds and misery, saying, This is all the good we have gotten for our warfare: upbraiding every man the services they had performed. Some in one place, some in another, requiring them in threatening wile, rather than by way of supplication, to call the Senate together, and they the while stood about the Comituli, as if they would be judges and moderators of their publick complaint. Very few of the Senators, such only as by chance came that way, could be brought to resist, for the Comituli: as for the rest, they were afraid not only to come into the Comituli house, but also to venture abroad into the market place, so that by reason of their small assembly, there could be nothing done nor determined. Then thought the people, indeed they were mocked and dallied withall, and driven off with deliaies, furling, that the Senators which were away, absented themselves not by chance, nor for fear, but only to hinder the proceeding of all question cause: and that the Comituli themselves did dissemble and shrink, and without all question made

A made but a torn and game at their miseries. This broil so in-reared, that hardly could the reverence and Majesty of the Comituli restrain the peoples rage, But the Senators standing in doubtful fears, whether to tarry behind or to come forward would be more dangerous, at length they resolved to repair into the Senate, and being now at last a full and sufficient house gathered, neither the Lord, there assembled, nor yet the Comituli, could well agree amongst themselves what to do in this case. Appius a man of a hot spirit, was of opinion to order the matter by Consular authority and commandment, saying, That if one or two of them were laid hold on the rest would be quiet. But Severus more inclined to mild and gentle remedies, thought it a more late and easy course too, rather to bend than to break their angry and ill stomach. But amidst these troubles there happened a greater and more terrible occurrence: For certain Latins on horse-back rode in post, and brought news in hasty and tumultuous manner, that the Volscians were coming with a mighty and cruel army against the City to assault the same. Which news being heard (see how discord had of one City made twain) wrought far other effect in the Nobles, than in the Commons. The commons they kept for joy, and said they gods were now come down from Heaven to be revenged of the Senators pride, and encouraged one another not to take prettymony, or to enter their names in the matter: matters book-keeping that they had rather dye at once with all, than perish alone and venge them: "Let the Nobles (quoth they) pierce as soldiers; let them take weapon in hand, and abide the brunts and hazards of war, who receive the profits, the prizes and rewards thereof. But contrary-wile the Senate perished and discharged with this resolution, as well from citizens as enemy, before the Comituli Servilius (a man by name more able and powerful) That he would provide for the safety of the Commons-well, be it as it were round with a consular power. Then the Comituli dismissed the Senate, and came forth into the assembly of the people, where he shewed what care the LL. of the Senate had for the good of the City, and that while they were (quoth he) busy in consultation for the greater part of the day, yet in truth no more but a part, it fell out so in the mean while, that the Volscians, who they must see to the whole body of the Commons-well, whereof they stand in extreme fear, seeing therefore the enemies were almost hard at the gates, they could not possibly do or intend any thing before war. Neither (if there should be any respite and leisure granted) were it either for the commons credit and honesty, nor to fight for their Country, which they had their pay before hand; nor well becoming the Nobles and for their reputation, to look unto and take order hastily, to redress the miseries and calamities of their citizens upon fear, rather than afterwards with good deliberation, for love and of willing mind. This speech of his he confirmed with an edict, by virtue whereof, he gave (freight commandment: Quod none of his men should keep bound or in prison, any citizen of Rome, but that he might be brought before the Comituli. Item, that no person should hold in possession, or sell the goods of any soldier, so long as he abode in the camp, nor arrest his children or childrens children. This edict being once published and proclaimed, not only the enthralled debtors there present, were joyfully by name enrolled, but also from all parts of the City, they leapt quickly out of their houses, seeing that now their creditors had no right nor power to detain and arrest them, and came into the market place for to take a military oath of allegiance, to be true soldiers and faithful to the State. A number there was of these: neither was there any that more mutually behaved and quit themselves or took more pains in the Volscian war. Then the Comituli took his power again, and within a little of them incamped himself. The night following, the Volscians presuming upon the variance and discord of the Romans, assailed the tents, if haply in the night season any of them might have been wrought to abandon the camp and come to them, or to practise any treason. But the Sentinels detected them, and upon alarm given, the whole army arose, and every man made halt to his weapons. Thus came the enterprise of the Volscians to nothing. The rest of the night both parts rested, and were quiet. On the morning by break of day, the Volscians having filled up the trench, assailed the bulwarks and rampiers. And by that time they had on every side planked up the fences, palliades, and other fortifications, the Comituli who for all he was called unto instantly on every hand, but of the debtors absented, alpe, alpe, alpe, to give the signal, and to found the battle, made himself on purpose to try the courage of his men: and seeing well now their forwardness and their manly, at length gave them a token to rush forth, and to let forth their loose, as eager to fight as might be. So at the very first onset the enemies were presently discomfited and put to flight: the rout followed hard upon them in haile, and as they could reach, wounded them behind on their backs, and killed them: the horsemen likewise pursued them even to their pavilions, who still feared exceedingly what might become of them: and within a while their very camp also, environed about with the legion, and abandoned of the Volscians themselves for fear, were taken and filled. The next day to following, the legions marched to Subura Pometia, for thither the enemies were fled: and within few days the Town was won, and put to the sack, and the spoil and pillage given away: whereby the needy soldiers were somewhat refreshed. The Comituli in great glory and honour brought back his victorious army to Rome. In his way homeward the Ambassadors of the Latines Pellius distrusting their own state upon the loss of Pometia, came unto him. To whom after consultation had with the Senate, and a decree passed, peace was granted: but they were fined to part with their Lands. Immediately upon this, the Sabines also put their

Romans in a fright, and in every deed it might be called a tumult, rather than a war. For word was brought in the night season, that an army of the Sabines were come in a rode, as far as the river Anio robbing, spoiling, and burning all the villages and hamlets as they went. Forthwith was sent thither the whole power of horses under the conduct of A. Posthumius, who in the Latin war had been Dictator. After him followed the Consul Servilius with a chosen regiment of footmen. Most of the enemies as they ranged abroad foraging in scattering were by the horsemen surprised and indolent. And when the Infantry besides marched against the Sabines legion, they were not able to resist: for being tired out, partly with their long journey, and partly with plundering all night long, and many of them having overcharged themselves with meat and wine within the villages, had hardly strength enough to run away. Thus the Sabine war in one night was heard of and ended. The day following, when as now the Romans were in good hope that they had peace on every side, behold the Auruncan Embassadors came into the Senate proclaiming war, unless they would forgo the Volsian lands, and restore them to their rightful owners. And even at one time with the Embassadors was the army also of the Auruncans abroad, and had taken the field. The news whereof, and namely, that they were now in fight not far from Aricia, raised up the Romans in to great a broil and hubbub, that the Senators could neither be consulted with, and deliver their opinions in order, nor yet give a peaceable answer to those that came as it were with weapon in hand, being thus forced to take arms themselves. So to Aricia direct in warlike manner they march, and not far from thence they joined battel with the Auruncans. And in one day that war had also an end.

Thus when the Roman souldiers had gotten victory within a few days in so many places, and had now defeated the Auruncans, they looked for the promise of the Consul, and the faithful performance of it by the Senate. At what time Appius both upon a proud stomach, and arrogant spirit of his own by nature, and also to discredit and disanul the word of his fellow Consul, in all actions of debt proceeded, and gave judgement with rigor against the debtors. Whereupon, both they that had been before imprisoned, were delivered again into their creditors hands, and other also became prisoners anew. Whereat when as a souldier, whose case it was thus hardly to be dealt withal, called upon the Consul his fellow for help, they ran all at once to Servilius, at his hands they claimed a promise: every one upbraided and reproached him with their service in war, with their fears there gotten, requiring that he would propose the matter again unto the Senate, and as a Consul, succour and protect his Citizens: or like a General, maintain his souldiers. These matters no doubt, moved the Consul: but so flood the care that he could neither will nor chuse, but dissemble, deal double, and temporize with them: so fully bent, and wholly wedded to the other part, was not only his colleague, but also the whole faction of the Nobility. Thus by bearing himself as a Neuter, and going as they say, between the bark and the tree, he neither avoided the hatred of the Commons, nor yet won favour with the Nobles: whiles the Nobles took him for a soft and base minded Consul, seeking to please all parties, and the Commons for as crafty and false dissembler: in somuch as within a short time it appeared he was as much hated of the people as Appius. For, the Consuls happened on a time to strive, whether of them twain should dedicate the Temple of Mercury. The Senate put over the deciding of this matter from themselves unto the people: and decreed withal, that to whether of them the dedication of the Temple was by the people election granted, he should over and besides have the charge to purvey corn and victuals, he should erect and institute a Colledge or fellowship of Merchants, and he in stead of the high Priest, should undertake the iolemn feasts or festival days. Then the people gave the dedication of the Temple to M. Lehorius, a principal Centurion of the vanguard: which as it early appeared, was done not so much to grace the man, as who had an higher office bestowed upon him, then was fit for one of his degree and calling: as to disgrace and deface the Consuls. Hereat, one of the Consuls, yea, and the Patricii stormed and fumed exceedingly against the Commons. But the Commons took heart unto them more and more, and began to proceed far otherwise, and to take another course then they purposed at the beginning: for despairing of the Consuls and Senats help, when they saw a debtor sued and brought to the bar, they would run flocking from all parts together, so that the Consuls sentence and decree could not be heard for the noise and clamour. And de facto judge what he would, no man would obey. And so violently they went to work, that in presence of the Consul, the creditors were singled out, evil-treated, and misused of the Commons, being many together. So the whole fear and hazard of the main chance, even of liberty it selfe, was now altogether transferred from the debtors to the creditors. In the very neck of these troubles, there arose a fear of the Sabine war, and when it was determined, there should be a muster of souldiers, no man would answer to his name and be enrolled. All this while Appius raged and took on, inveigling bitterly against the nicety and popularity of his brother Consul, who with his keeping silence for dispeacing the people, by his soft carriage of him self, had betrayed the Weal-publick, and over and besides that, he had not ministered justice for the loan of money, nor dealt according to law in that behalf, he had brought the matter for so pass that he could take no multers by vertue of the decree of the Senate. Howbeit (saith he) the Common-wealth is not wholly forsaken and forlorn, nor yet the Consular authority utterly cast down and trodden under foot: for he would himself alone, if there were no more but he, defend and maintain both his own place, and the Senators dignity. When as the multitude

A multitude therefore stood thus malapertly as their daily manner was about the bar he commanded one principal Captain of sedition to be attached and hid away; and as he was haled to prison by the Sergeants and Lictors he appealed. Neither would the Consul have given place to the appeal (for he knew the people now they were bent, and what their doom would be) had not his obstinate it self with much ado been overwayed more through the direct and adiection authority of the chief Nobles & Lords of the Senate, than by the clamorous noise & menaces of the multitude to release him, and his heart so courageous to undergo their ill will and heavy displeasure. Thus grew the mischief more & more daily, testified not with open mouth & broad speech, but only by also (which was more pernicious and dangerous) by convocations secret meetings, and conferences. At length these Consuls odious unto the Commons went out of their offices, to wit, Appius a man wonderous well affected of the Nobles, Servilius liked neither of them nor the Commons.

After whom A. Verginius, and J. Vatinus entered their Consulship. But then the Commons not knowing what manner of Consuls they should have began to assemble together by night some in Effra, others in the Aventum, to the end they might not be unprovided and to seek upon a sudden, what to do in the common place, nor manage their business hand over head and at a venture. Which the Consuls inproving (as it was indeed) a perilous example and of ill consequence, propounded the matter before the Senators: but when they had proposed it, they could not order, ask their advice what was to be done: they took for on and kept such outcry and clamour at it, on all hands fretting and tinning, that the Consuls should lay upon the Senate the burden and heay load of that, which properly they by vertue of their authority and office should execute and perform themselves, and surely if there were any Magistrates in the City (say they) there would not be thus suffered in Rome any other comit but publick: whereas now the State is divided into a thousand Confes and conventicles: whiles some have their meetings and assemblies in Effra, others in Aventum. Assuredly one only man indeed (for that is more than a Consul) such a one as Appius Claudius was, would soon dispatch, and in one minute of an hour, after these their unlawful assemblies, the Consuls upon this rebuke and check, replied again and demanded in this manner: And what would you have us to do (quoth they) for we are resolved to do nothing ill, kely and coldly but with as great courage and diligence as shall be well liked of the Senators. Whereupon an order passed that they should take muster and levy souldiers with all rigour and severity, adding moreover, that the Commons with idleness and ease were grown over-malpert and too confident.

And when the Senate was dismissed, the Consuls went into the Tribunal & took their places, and summoned by name all the younger sort to appear: and none making answer to his name, the multitude standing about as had been to hear some publick Orator, said plainly, that the Commons from thenceforth would be no longer deluded, and that the Consuls should never get to much as one souldier, unless they would stand to their word, and make good the promise that publicly before was made, and restore to every man again his liberty. Before they came then to take weapon in hand: to the end they might fight for their country and country-men, and not for their Lordlike Matters, the Consuls saw well what they had in commission from the Senate & that of all those who within the Council house were spake so stoutly & gave out to great words, there was not one present to take part of this odious malice of the people. And like they were to have a bitter fit and cruel broil with the Commons. They thought good there where they tried the word, and dealt by extremity, once again to ask advice of the Senate, and to confer with them. But then all the younger sort of the Senators, approached by multitudes, hard almost to see the Consuls fears, willing them to give over their Consulship, and to resign up their rule and authority, to the maintenance whereof they lacked courage. Now when the Consuls had indelicately weighed and tried both ways this at length began they said, A great sedition and commotion is now ready to rise. To the end therefore that ye pretend no ignorance, and lay another day ye were more told of it, there is a great sedition and commotion toward, we require therefore that they who find greatest fault with our countenances and lack of courage, assist us and sit with us while we take the matters: and since you will needs have us, we will execute it according to their will, that is, as the most cruel and severest. Then come they back again into the Tribunal, and some of them for purpose, one of them that were there in right to be cited and called by name. But he could not find him, and heid his peace, with a company of men gathered round about to guard him, so that he should have some harm or violence done unto him. The Consul then sent a Sergeant to attack him, who being repelled off, then those Nobles which fate there on the bench to sit, the Consuls, cried out upon the shameful indignity, and said it was intolerable, and for to down with it from the Tribunal seat, for to rid the Sergeant. But the violent rage of the men under who set the Lictor alone, and only they did him from lying hold on the man, turned upon the Patricians. So that the Consuls were faine to flee between, and then the tray was appeased. In which there being no bones flying about their ears, nor weapon drawn, there was more clamor, brow beating and chafing than any hurt done. Then was the Senate house full in great hurry, and with more confusion for the yhere in Council: whiles they that pretended how they were beaten and mistreated, required that commissioners should sit upon this riot and make aduication: and as some of them gave their determination, namely, by clamor and noise, as by sentence and opinion, so some did upon reason. At last when there met was no objection and their heat allayed, and that the Consul hit them in the teem, and reproved them, saying there was a little discretion and gravity in them.

their Court and Council-house, as in the common Hall, they began in the end to confute orderly H and three opinions there were amongst them, P. Virginus would not have a common and general rate (to wit, that all debtors should be released from their creditors) but his advice was, that they should only be constricted, who relying upon P. Servilius the Consul his word and faithful promise, had served in the wars of the Volcians, Auruncans and Sabins, T. Lartius he supposed and thought this, that it was not a time then to make amends only for good defaults, and to respect them alone that had done well, and to recompence good service: but for as much as the whole commonalty was deeply engaged and plunged in debt, unless they were all provided for and good order taken for them every one, there would be no quickness nor end of troubles: yea, and (that which is more so) in case they be not all alike regarded, but some debtors in better condition than I others, the disorder would rather be more kindled than quenched. Appius Claudius a man both of natural disposition fierce and cruel, and also by occasion made more outrageous, meddled with the Commons hated against him on the one side, and tickled with the praise and commendations of the Nobles on the other side, who ever magnified him and lift him up to the skies, spake to this effect: "There is great stir and mutinous humors, my Masters (quoth he) is not long of this "military and calamity, but only of too much liberty of the Commons: who rather upon fumes "are grown wanton and unruly than for any want impatient and discontent: and all this mischief "no doubt is sprung of this, that they have liberty to appeal. For so long as it is in their power to "file for help unto those that have erred as well as they, well may the Consul threaten and give "out menacing words: as for any rule or command they shall have none among them. Come K "on therefore, let us create a Dictator from whom they cannot make their appeal. Then shall "this furious rage, which now setteth all on a light fire, be soon lust and quite extinguished. Let "me see then, who dare bear a Lictor, when he shall well know, that he alone whose honor "and Majesty he shall offend and abuse, hath power to scourge him and take away his life. Many men thought this sentence of Appius to be very hard and cruel: yea, and dangerous withal, in regard of the late precedent of Virginus and Vulturnus. That other likewise of Lartius was thought inconvenient, in taking away all keeping of credit with the creditors. The opinion and advice of Virginus was supposed as well in one respect as in another most indifferent and mean between both. But by reason of the faction and regard of private benefit, which always hath done hurt and ever will, to publick Council, Appius prevailed, and he himself very little but he himself had been made Dictator. Which if it had come to pass, it would surely have estranged and alienated L quite the hearts of the Commons, in that most busy and dangerous time: when it happened that the Volcians, Equians, and Sabins, were all up at once in arms. But the Consuls and elder Senators, had great care and consideration to chuse such a one, as might by mildness of his own nature allay and qualify the exceeding rigour and fierceness incident to Sovereign and absolute authority. They elect therefore to be Dictator, Marcus Valerius the son of Vulturnus. The Commons albeit they saw well enough this Dictator created for to curb them, yet having got by his brothers law, the benefit of Appeal, they feared no severe and insolent proceeding from that house and name. The Edict besides, that the Dictator set forth, which was welcome all one with that other of the Consul Servilius much confirmed and settled their minds. For supposing now, they M had more hold both of the man, and also of his authority, and that they might with more confidence rely themselves on the one and the other, they gave over all debate, and entered their names into the muster book: so there were enrolled full ten legions. The like army for number was never levied afore. Of which legions, the Consuls had the conduct of three a piece, and the Dictator commanded the other four: and high time, it was: for the war might not be delayed any longer. The Equians had already invaded the territory of the Latins, and their Embassadors were petitioners to the Senate, either to lend succour, or to give them leave to put on armor themselves for the defence of their confines, and frontiers. It was thought the safer and surer way, that the Latins without arming themselves should be defended, than to permit them again to take weapon in hand. So the Consul Varus was sent thither, and he stayed them from further foraging and waiting. For the Equians were departed out of the plains, and trusting rather N in the vantage of the ground, than in their weapons, stood upon their guard, kept themselves safe from danger, upon the high tops of the Hills and Mountains.

The other Consul who was gone against the Volcians, because he would not allow lose any time, drew the enemy forth (by waiting the country especially) to encamp himself nearer, and to at length to fight a field. Now was there a plain in the midst between both camps: where each army stood before their rampiers, embattelled, and ranged in array, with banners displayed ready to fight. The Volcians were somewhat more in number, whereupon they began battail dis-deedly and as if they set light by the enemy. But the Roman Consul neither advanced forward, nor suffered his men once to shout and answer again, but charged them to stand still with their javelins fast in the ground, until the enemies were come within the reach of hand fight, and then to lay about them lustily with their swords, all that ever they could. The Volcians out of breath with running and shouting, charged the Romans, who seemed for fear to stand motionless: but after they once perceived that they were hotly reconntered by them again, and saw their swords glittering in their eyes, they were troubled therewith, as if they had been entrapped and alien into some trains layed for them, and so turned their backs. And by reason they came running before

of Appius Claudius in the Senate.

A to battail, their strength would not hold out now to run clear away: The Romans contrary-wise, because against the beginning of the fight they had stood quiet, were fresh of body, and soon overtook them thus overtaken, won their camp by force, and after they had driven the enemies out from thence, chased them into Vulturnus, and entered the Town pell-mell one with another in a medley the Victor together with them that were vanquished. More bloodied there was by execution of them one with another, of all ages and sexes, as they came in their way than in the very battail. A very few, even such as without weapon yielded themselves were spared and pardoned.

Whiles these things were doing amongst the Volcians, the Dictator did omit and put to fight the Sabins, with whom he had much cruel war: yea, and ordered them to abandon and B quit their camp. For having lent his horsemen into the main battail of the enemies, which they had but slightly strengthened within, and bestowed the ranks there very thin, and all to stretch out the wings on both sides more at large, he brake their array: and when they were once dis-ordered, the footmen came in upon them: and in the same brunt were they Masters of their camp, and to the war ended. There was not in those dayes a braver battail fought and more renowned, letting aside that only at the lake Regulus. The Dictator rode in triumph unto the City. Over and above the accustomed honors, both he and his posterity after him were allowed a certain place in the great Race or Theater, called Circus maximus to behold it cate the toling games, and there was set the Ivory chair of estate, called Sella curulis. The Volcians thus vanquished, lost the territory about Vulturnus, and new inhabitants were sent thither from the City to C people and to till the grounds, so that it became a Colony.

Somewhat after this, there was a field fought with the Equians, but in truth, full against the Consul his will, for that they were to finish up a steep Hill (to their disadvantage) for to meet with the enemy. But the Soldiers blaming him for trifling out, and making delays, to the end that the Dictator might be out of Office before they made return to the City, and for his word and promise, like the Consuls before him, should come to nothing: drove him perforce to lead up his army, rashly and at adventure against every well through the cowardice of the ordered, and an error escaped, fell out notwithstanding very well through the cowardice of the enemy: who before they were come within fight and the darts cast, amazed at the venturouness of the Romans, forsook their holds which they had in most defendible places, and leapt down into the valleys over against them. There was booty & pillage good enough, and a bloodless victory.

Having spent thus fortunately abroad in three several wars, the Senators and Commons were not careless of home-affairs, what would be the issue thereof, the Binkers and Officers, what with favor, and what with subtil and cautious policy, had devised abroad and wrought forth by means, as might infringe and disappoint not only the Commons, but also the Dictator, and put them by their expectation. For Valerius, after the return of Vulturnus the Consul, dealt first and had above all other matters and causes at the Council-table, in the behalf of the people that had achieved such victories, and propounded to know their minds. What should be done with those "endangered, and imprisoned persons. "Which motion of his being disliked and re"jected: I see well (quoth he) that I cannot please you, so long as I perswade to concord and "unity: with ye will (trust me truly) ere it be long, that the commonalty of Rome had more "Patrons and Advocates like my self. As for me, I will neither bear my citizens any longer in "hand to deceive them, nor be a Dictator in vain, to effect nothing. Civil discord at home, and "forraign war abroad, caused the State to have need of this office. Now, when peace is gotten "without, behold it is crossed and hindered within: yet had I rather be present at the sight of a "mutiny and insurrection when I am a private person, than whiles I am a Dictator. This went be-"out of the Council-house, and yielded up his Dictatorship with grief that he took in his fault, for "very pity and compassion of them, he gave over the place: for that there was no default in him, but "it charged himself of his faithful word to them given, (for that there was no default in him, but "it had been performed indeed) they accompanied him along home to his house with hearty affection,
"praising and commending him all the way they went. The Lords of the Senate began then to re-
"lect if the army were broken up and discharged, there would be some secret conventicles, and new "conspiracies contrived: therefore, albeit the matters were taken by the Dictator: yet because the "soldiers had sworn allegiance to the Consuls, supposing they were still bound to warfare by "virtue of that oath, and pretending a colour that the Equians renewed war, they commanded the "legions to be led forth of the City.

This hastened the sedition the sooner and set it forward. At first somewhat, they complained and laid their heads together about murdering and making away the Consuls: to the end they might be acquit of their oath unto them: but afterwards being better schooled and advised, that G no mans confidence can be cleared of scruple, and discharged of oath, once taken by committing a sinful act and working mischief, they withdrew themselves out of the way by the persuasion of one Servilius, and without cause of the Consuls, departed as far as Mount Sacra, on the farther side of the River Tiber, three miles from the City. This is the more common report, and seemeth more current, than that whereof Pisus is the Author (namely, that the commons revived themselves to Arventum). There, without any head or Captain, they encamped and fortified themselves within a trench and rampier, and kept quiet for certain dayes, neither taking nor doing

But,

The speech of Valerius the Dictator in the Senate.

The first revolt of the commons

was Cæso with an Army sent, who invaded and overran the very country of the Æquians, foraging and spoiling as he went, The Æquians thereupon retired, & put themselves into their towns, and kept close within the walls, whereby there was no memorable field fought, But at their enemies the Veientians hand, they received an overthrow, and that through the rashness of the other Consul: and had not Cæso Fabius come to the rescue in good time, the whole Army had been utterly lost. From that time there was neither war nor peace with the Veientians: but their dealing was much what after the manner of robbing. For when the Roman Legions were abroad, they would leave the field & take to their Cities: when they perceived the Legions were abroad, and gone, they would make excursions and waste the country. Thus plaid they mock holiday, and dallied with them, shifting off war with quietness, and quietness again with war, by turns. So as the Romans could neither all wholly rest careless and secure for them, nor yet with any great peril or hurt. And yet as little as it was, it might no time be neglected, nor gave them leave to be employed in the mean while elsewhere. Then came the whole house and kindred of the Fabii unto the Senat, in the name of them all spake the Consul in this wise: "My Lords of the Senat, the Veientian war had need rather of a resident garrison, as ye know well enough, to keep the frontiers, than great forces for expedition, As for you see ye to other wars, Let the Fabii alone to deal as private enemies with the Veientians, We dare undertake and warrant, that the State of Rome shall receive no dishonour nor danger there. We are fully minded and resolved to our own proper cost and charges, to maintain and manage that war, as appropriate and peculiar to our name and family: the City shall be charged neither with men nor money there. Great thanks were given them for this their forwardness. The Consul being come out of the Senat house, was attended home with the whole generation of the Fabii who stood at the porch of the Council Court, expecting the Senat's decree. And being commanded to be ready in armor well appointed the next day, and to give attendance at the Consuls door, they departed from thence home to their own houses. The bruit hereof spread all over the City. All men extoll the Fabii up to the skies, saying: "That one family had taken upon them the whole burden of the City. The Veientian war now is become (say they) Ja privat charge, and requiteth the power and force only that privat persons could make. Or that there were two such families more in Rome of that stomach and valour: that one of them might take the Volscians in hand, and another the Æquians, Surely all the nations bordering hereabout might soon be subdued, and the people of Rome sit still the while and rest in peace. The day following, the Fabii armed themselves, mounted on horseback, and repaired to the Rem-zvous doreside, as they were commanded. Then came the Consul forth, clad in a rich coat of arms, and standing in his porch, beheld his whole blond and lineage armed and marshalled in order and being received in the midst of them, cauked the gasons and Cornets to be advanced. Never marched three along the City an Army either less in number or more renowned for their fame and the admiration of men. Three hundred men of arms they were and six, all nobly defended, of one stock, of one race and name all. And of all them there was not one that a sage and prudent Senat would have reined at any time as insufficient to be a Leader and Commander in the field. Thus furnished with the force and strength that one only Family could make, they advanced forward, threatening and menacing the ruin and destruction of the Veientians. There followed a number and multitude of Citizens: one private company by themselves of kinsfolk, allies, friends, and fellows, calling in their minds no mean matters, neither of hope nor fear, but all exceeding measure and furloughing: another of the common people, moved with a careful regard, and attended again in a favourable applause and admiration of their enterprise, crying with one voice, Hold on right valiant Knights, March on a Gods name in happy hour: God grant lucky speed, answerable to your magnanimous attempts and designments: and look for, at our hands from henceforth, Consulships triumphs all rewards and honourable dignities whatsoever. And all the way as they paced along the Capitol the Castle and other Temples they besought the gods, as many as were presented to their eye, as many as they could conceive in their minds, to vouchsafe that Squadron to be attended upon with good success and fortunate felicity, and soon to return home again in safety to their native country and loving parents. But alas the while, in vain were all their prayers made. Then set they forward on their journey leaving Janus Church on their right hand, taking the more cautious and unlucky way, from the gate Cementalis, until at length they came to the river Cremera, That was thought a convenient place to fortifie in, and there to plant a garrison. After this were L. Amilius and C. Servilius made Consuls. And so long as they adventured no farther than foraging the Country, the Fabii were good enough, not only to defend their hold and fort: but all their frontier parts and marches were the Fabii on Territory adjoining to the Roman they frequented and travelled, between the one confine and the other, that they kept all their own in safety, and mightily endangered the enemies. Then forsook they a while, but it was not long, from wasting and spoiling. By which time both the Veientians had gathered

A power out of Hetruria, and assaulted the fort of Cremera, and also the Roman Legions under the conduct of the Consul L. Amilius, encountered the Tufcans in open field. And yet the Veientians had hardly time enough to put themselves in order of battle: so suddenly at the very first skirmish, whilst the files were entering into array under their colours in the vanguard, and the tum-cours and supplies a placing and disposing in the rearward, a Cornet of Roman horse charged them so hotly on the flank, that they had not room and space either to begin fight, or to keep their standing fire. Thus were they discomfited, and chased back as far as Saxa rubra, i.e. Red rocks (for there they were encamped) where they humbly craved peace. Which when they had obtained (see their inbred infancancy so naturally engrafted) they were weary of it, and repented thereof, before the Roman garrison could be withdrawn from Cremera. And so the Fabii once again skirmished with the Veientian without preparation of greater war. Neither made they inroads only, and sudden violent incursions into the Territories but sundry times they encountered with banners displayed, and joined battell in plain field. And that one house and kindred of the Roman people carried oftentimes the victory away from that most mighty and rich City (in those daies) of all the Tufcans. This took the Veientians at the first for a foul disgrace and indignity. But afterwards they devited to lay trains, as occasion should serve and entrap their fierce and hardy enemy: and well apaid they were and rejoiced that the Fabii upon the good success that still followed them, were become more bold and venturesome. And therefore divers times when the Romans were abroad a plundering they would drive cattle in their way but yet so, as they might seem to light upon them by chance. The ruttish peasants made shew as if they fled out of the Country, and left the fields waste: yea, and the companies of soldiers lent out to restrain and slay their spoiling, made shew of running away, pretending oftner they were afraid than they had cause indeed. So as now the Fabii by this time let to light by their enemies, and thought lo well of themselves, that they beleaved verily their power was invincible and might not be withstood in any ground, or at any time whatsoever. This conceit and hope of theirs let them to aloof, and made them so bold, that clyping upon a time cattle far from Cremera (for there was a large plain between) although here and there they might desire armed fouliders of their enemies, yet from their fort they ran down, with bridle in their horse neck, and when unadvisedly without foresight, they were past the ambush, which was laid covertly about the very way that they were to pass, and were stragling here and there disorderly, driving the cattle away, which gadded in and out, as their manner is when they be scared and affrighted, then suddenly start the enemies all at once out of the ambushment: so as both before and behind, and on every side they were beset and environed with enemies. At the first the very hunting and oncray they made round about terrified them: afterwards flew their shot from all sides. And as the Tufcans gathered themselves together, the Fabii were soon hemmed within a round battallion of enemies standing armed thick and close one to another: and the nearer the enemies approached about them in so much less room were they enforced also to cast themselves into a ring. Which, considering their araises were thrall to thick together in so straight a compals, made their small number appear the less, and the multitude of the Tufcans to carry a greater shew. Then forbearing to fight as they first intended, on every hand alike, and with all at once, they made head to one only place. Therto they endeavour with might and main, body and armour: and with a pointed patel wedgewise pierced through and made themselves passage. And they took the way that led to a little hill, rising up with an easy ascent, from whence at first they made resistance only and kept their ground: but soon after, when by reason of the vantage of the hill, they had some time to breath themselves, and to take heart again after so great a fright, they forced the enemies also to give back that were mounting up the hill. And as few in number as they were yet by the benefit of the ground they had gotten the better if the Veientians had not set a compals about the hill side, and gained the very top and pitch thereof. Thus became the enemy again to have the upper hand. And to were the Fabii slain every man, and not one of them elaped, yea, and their fort overthrow. The Fabii all

F and raled, Three hundred and six there were that died, as all writers do agree. One only of the Veientians name was left behind at home, well near fourteen years of age, for to renew and encrease, as out of a stock, the name of the Fabii, and to provide in time to come the great prop and pillar that the people of Rome should have in their dangers and extremities many a time both at home and abroad.

But ere this heavy loss and overthrow hapned, C. Horatius and T. Menenius were Consuls. Menenius was lent forth with against the Tufcans pushed now up with pride for this their victory: with whom then also he fought unfortunately and sped but ill, for the enemies surprised and got the Janiculum, and the City had surely been besieged, (considering that besides war they were greatly distressed for want of victuals, for the Tufcans were passed over the Tiber) but that G. Horatius the Consul was called home from the Volscians. And so near approached the enemies in this war and pressed to the very walls, that first there was a skirmish even hand at the Temple of Spes: and another again at the gate Collina. Where albeit the Romans got but very small odds of the enemy, yet did that conflict upon a little recovery of wonted courage prepare the fouliders to better service in the battels ensuing.

Now were A. Verrinius and Sp. Servilius created Consuls. The Veientians after this late defeat, came no more into the field, yet they robbed and wasted still, And from the Janiculum from

from a fortrels and place of safe retreat, they would make excursions out into the Territory of the Rome all about, and neither cattle nor country people could any where be in safety for them. But afterwards, they were overtaken themselves in the same wile that they had caught the Fabii with. For as they followed after certain cattle, which were driven forth here and there of purpose to draw and train them abroad, they were plunged themselves headlong into an Ambuscado laid for them. And the more they were, the greater was their slaughter. Upon this foil, their cruel and fell anger gave the occasion and overture of a greater overthrow. For having crossed the Tiber in the night sea on they gave the attempt to make an assault upon the Camp of the Consul Servilius. But being discomfited, and many of them slain the rest retired themselves from thence, and with much ado recovered the Janicule. The morrow morning by sun rising, so venturesome he was by reason of his fortune to fight the day before, and more for the scarcity of corn and victuals, which drove him to take he cared not how rash and dangerous courtes, so they tended to more quick and speedy expedition) full fondly he advanced forward, and marched up the steep hill of the Janicule, and charged the enemies hold : but being set back himself from thence more shamefully than he had the day before repelled the enemies : yet by occasion that his fellow Consul came in the while to rescue, he and his Army both were saved : and the Tuscan enclosed between both hosts, were forced to turn their backs both to one and the other, and were killed every mothers son. Thus by a rash enterprise (which as good luck was) sped well, the Veientian war came to an end. The City then, as it enjoyed peace, so it came again to be better stored of corn and victual : both for that there was some grain brought out of Campania, and also because the old store that was hoarded up came abroad, by reason that no man now stood in fear of death to enlue.

Afterwards upon plenty and ease they began to be buse again, and their heads to work, seeking to broach old troubles at home, since they had none to occupy them abroad. The Tribunes they fell to sollicite and infect the Commons with their venom and poyson, the Law Agraria: inciting them against the Nobles that gaind it: not in general terms only, but also by touching particular persons. For Q. Confidius and T. Geminus, who were for the Law Agraria, framed an inditement, and sued T. Menenius. And this was laid to his charge, to wit, the loss of the fort and garrison at Cremera: for that, he being Consul lay encamped not far from thence. But of this danger he soon stopped the course, both because the Nobles laboured and took his part, no less than he had done afore for Coriolanus: and also the affection and favour that men bare to his father Agrippa, was not worn out, and clean forgot. The Tribunes used moderation therefore in the penalty, for having commenced a capital action against him, and convicted him thereof, they set a fine on his head of 2000 Asles. Howbeit this cost him his life: for he grew, men say, in to such a melancholic fit for shame of this disgrace, that he fell thereupon from grief of heart unto a pining sickness, which followed him to his dying day. Then was there another accused and brought into trouble, to wit, Sp. Servilius, so soon as he was out of his Consulship at what time as C. Nautius, and P. Valerius were Consuls. In the beginning of whole year the Tribunes L. Caudinus and T. Statius, called him straightwaist to his answer. Who sustained the violence of the Tribunes, not as Menenius did, by his own inrecreancy and the prayers of the Nobles, but bare himself confidently upon his own innocency, and the good grace wherein he stood. Blamed he was likewise, and charged for the barrel with the Tuscan at Janiculum. But being a man of an hot spirit and stout courage, as he carried himself before in the publick danger, so now in his own private peril, by refusing in a bold and stout speech that he made, not only the Tribunes, but also the Commonalty, and calling in their reerch and reproving them, for the condemnation and death of T. Menenius, by whose fathers means the Common: being in times past restored, had obtained first those very Magistrats and Laws, whereby at this day they exercise such rigour: he went through all his troubles, and with much boldness avoided the present jeopardy he stood in. The testimony of his Colleague Valerius stood him in great stead, who produced forth as a witness, N made him partner with himself in all his worthy acts. But that process of judgment which passed against Menenius (so altered were they now, and repented therefore) did him much more good, and struck it dead inure.

When this broil and contention was ended at home, the Veientians war began abroad: to whom the Sabins also had joyned their power. Whereupon the Consul P. Valerius, with the aid of the Lutines and Hernicks, was sent out with an Army to Veii: and incontinently he set upon the tents of the Sabins, as they lay encamped under the walls of their confederates, and put such a terror amongst them, that whilst they ran forth scattering by bands and companies, some at one gate some at another, to repell the violent assault of the enemies, it hapned that the gate which he first advanced his ensigns against, was won. And within the trench small fight there was, but O more manly laughter. The tumult and noise hereof was heard from out of the Camp into the City. And the Veientians in great fear ran hastily to their weapons, as if Veii had been surprised. Some make speed to incoor the Sabins: others do what they can to assail the Romans, who were wholly busied about the pillage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to some trouble, diffidly subdued the pillage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to some trouble, diffidly subdued the pillage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to some trouble, diffidly subdued the pillage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to some trouble, diffidly subdued the pillage of the Camp.

A broke the Tuscan array, and put them to flight. And thus in one hour two armies were defeated, two most puissant nations, and nearest neighbors to the Romans vanquished. Whilst these exploits were performed about Veii, the Volskians and Aequians had encamped themselves in the Country of Latium, and harried the marches thereof, Whom the Latines on themselves, with the help only of the Hernicks, and without any Leader or aid at all from the Romans, forced to abandon their tents: and besides the recovery of their own goods again, achieved a great and rich booty. Notwithstanding all this, the Consul Nautius was sent from Veii against the Volskians. They were not well pleased, I believe, with the manner of it, that their allies should wage war at all with their own power and direction, without the Army and conduct of the Romans. He spared not to work all the mischief he could, all abuse and spiteful posture against the Volskians: yet could not they be brought to fight a field. Then succeeded L. Junius and C. Maenius Consuls. To Maenius fell the charge of the Veientian Province. Howbeit war there was none at all. But at their own sute, a truce was granted unto them of forty years. And they were enjoined to find corn and soldiers pay. Peace was not so soon procured abroad, but pockitly enured difford at home. For at the intigation of the Tribunes, by occasion of the Law Agraria, the Commons were set a madding. But the Consul, skared neither with the condemnation of Menenius, nor yet with the peril wherein Servilius stood, redressed all they could. And when the Tribunes were ounce out of their Office, Geminus a Tribune laid hold upon them, and arrested them: and L. Aemilius with Opter Virginis enter their Consulship. In some Anna's or yearly records I find Papirius Julius Consul instead of Virginis. But in this year, whoever then were Consuls, Favrus and Marcius being indicted before the people, went about arraid in the apparel and mournful weed to the younger sort of Senators, as well as the Commons perswading, advising, and warning them to forbear and refuse all dignities and offices of state, yea, and all charge of Common-weal. And as for the Consuls rods, born afore them, their purpled robes with purple, and chair of state, they should esteem no otherwise of them than of the pageants carried in a funeral pomp. And that with these gorgeous ornaments and ensigns they were but destined to death: much like to beards adorned with faced white ribbands and labels, appointed to sacrifice. But if the tweneens of a Consulship were in their consideration now withal and periwade themselves, that it is become private and overwaded with the power of the Tribunes: and that the Consul, as if he were the Tribunes serjeant, must do all at his beck and command. For if he quethched never so little, if he seemed to regard the Senators, or make account of any thing, he in the whole State but of the Commonalty, let him set before his eyes the exile of C. Manlius, the judgement and death of Menenius. The Nobles incited with these speeches, from thenceforth began to consult and confer together, not openly and in publick council, but privately, and apart from the privacy of many. And when they were resolved once upon this point, that those accused parties now in trouble should be enlarged one way or other, by hook or ruse: then the cruellest advice, and hardest course that could be delivered best pleased them, and for to put in execution the most audacious designments whatsoever, there wanted not one or other to give counsel. Well the law day of trial came, and when as the Commons gave attendance devoutly in the E Forum, in great expectations of the sequel and issue, they began at first to marvel much, that the Tribunes Geminus came not down in place: and suspecting somewhat because of his long tarrying & delay they imagined that he durst not for the great men and chief Magistrats of the City: and so they complained that the common cause was forlorn and betrayed. At the last, they that kept about the door & porch of the Tribune his house, brought word that he was found at home stark dead. Which news being once noised through the assembly, mark how an Army is dispersed and scattered when their General is slain, even so in all the world the Commons flit aside every one from one way from another. But above all others the Tribunes were in bodily fear, being thus by their fellow taught how little help or none at all, their sacred and redoubted Laws afforded. The Nobles could not dissemble their joy, nor use it with moderation but shewed it expressly, and for so little repented any one of them of the last committed, that they avowed it, and took it upon them, and would not seem culpable in the action: but gave it out in plain terms, that the Tribunes by lost means were to be tamed & their wings clipped in a mischief. Upon this their victory, so shameful a precedent in times to come there were out an edict for the publishing of a statute: and whilst the Tribunes were in this feare damed the Consuls without any contradiction, went through with it clear. But then were the Commons much more offended at their Tribunes licence and sitting still then at the Consuls rule and impious government: saying, Farewell freedom, now farewell liberties and all: now is the old world come again, and the Tribunes authority is both dead and buried together with Geminus. Now they were to go in hand and bebind themselves of some other counse, how they might withstand the Senators proceedings: and seeing G they were destitute of all other help to rely themselves upon, the only way was for the Commons to trust to themselves, and stand upon their own guard. Whereas therefore, there gave attendance upon the Consuls 24 Liberes or Vergers. Commons all and no better, none more contentible and best-minded if they met with those that would let them at naught: they might thank themselves only, and their own timorous conceits & imaginations, that in things were so dread and terrible, thus having animated & provoked one another with these speeches there was a Sergeant sent from the Consuls to one Petron Publius a Commoner, who because he had been

A Officer to the Confil: the Confil likewise, a Licitor to the Tribune, crying often aloud, that he was but a private person without command, without Magistracy. And doubting the Tribune had been hardly used, but that both the assembly rose up in a rage, and took part with the Tribune against the Confil: and also there was a con.ourse of the multitude, raised out of all parts of the City into the Common Hall, Appius notwithstanding flood thither to it till, and abide the bunt of this tumultuous storm: neither had this broke it till without some bloodshed, in the Quæstion the other Confil: form: nor let yet some of the Aldermen that had been Commons, to get his another Confil: by force. (If otherwise it might not be) out of the Hall, whiles blood was in hand, "one while with the Commons, to appeale theiriury, by way of intreaty and with soft words, B" otherwhiles beought the Tribunes to break up the assembly, persuading with them to take more leisure in this their heat and anger: for that time and space would abide nothing, but if it power, but would joyne counsel and advice thereto: on finding with that both Nobles should be ruled by the people, and the Confil ordered by the Nobles, hard y and with much ado were the Commons quitted by Quæstus, but far more trouble had the Nobles to till the other Confil. At the length, when the assembly of the people was dimissed, the Confil: called the sent together, Where after much variety of opinions proceeding from fear and anger according as the one or the other swayed among them: look how much longer time they had to reclaim their mind from violent courses, and eagerly with deliberation to consider of the matter: to finish the more their hearts went against all contention, and further thier: infinitely, as they yeelded Quæstus hearty thanks that by his travel between parties, the discord was well allayed. And to Appius they were petitioners, ~ That he would be content, that the majesty of the Conill might be more glorious than would stand with the unity and concord of the Citizens. For while the Tribunes for their part would needs have all and the Confil on the other side draw all to them: between this this pinking and having there was no strength left in the midit: and to conclude the Commons, as well was rent, torn and dismembred between the rulers: the one of who gave neither for the managing nor rule, than for the safety and preservation of the State. Against whom Appius replied with a solemn protestation before God and man, and said, ~ That the weal publique was abandoned, forsaken, and betrayed by nothing else but foolish fear: that the Senat wanted not a Confil: but the Confil wanted Senators: who now yeelded to harder conditions than they had before time in mount Sacer. Howbeit or overweighed at length by the general consent and accord of the Nobles, he was content: and to the law passed quickly by royal consent authorized. Then and never before were the Tribunes created in a congregation of the tribes, and by their offices, Piso wroth, that there were three more made to the other as if there had been but twain before: and he nameth also the Tribunes, to wit, Stevius, L. Nævius, M. D. natus, Sp. Julius, & L. Mælius. Then had the Volians and Aquilans, between the civil edition of the Romans, and the beginning of war harried & walled the country: that in all the Commons had made an inheritance, they might have retired to them as to a free place of retreat and refuge. But when it was that all matters compounded between the Nobles and Commons: they removed their camp towards, Appius Claudius was sent against the Volians: and to Quæstus fell the Province of the Equines. The fame rigorous severity continued Appius still in warfare that he made at home in the City: but to much more freely for that he was not curbed nor hindred by the Tribunes. The Commons he hated more than his father had done, for seeing he was over swayed and had taken the foil at their hands: and being the only Confil opposed against the Tribunes power yet more his head, the law passed clear a way, whil the former Confils pride, selfs, with little ado, nor with to great hope and expectation of the Nobility, had ever hindered and delayed. This his envy and indignation gave an edge to that fell blow: for his by kind for to plague and punish his enemies with imperious and lordly command. But so it they were to quarrel again and disobey, that by no forcible means they could be tamed doing all things that they did truly flowly forwardly, and stubbornly. Neither baffled they for shame, nor flooded in awe for fear. If his will was they should march on apace, they would on set purpose go far and fully: If he enragged them in proper person to attend their business they would all of them slack their former care wherein they were content of themselves: whiles he was in place they would hang down their heads and look on the ground as he passed by they would readily curse him in their hearts. So as that invincible storm of his against all hatred of the Commons, was known and they grieve hereat. And when he saw that all the shrewdness and rigour that he used was in vain, and that now he could do no good with his soldiers, he fell to the kin the Captains and Centurions, trying. They had spoiled and mard the Army, terming them Tribunes of the Commons, and otherwhiles in taunting, wile knowing them Volians. At all these doings were the Volians aware of, and therefore were they more eager and forward, hoping that Appius should find the Roman Army as froward and disobedient, as they had been against P. Clodius. And to say truth they were more crooked and unruly with Appius than with Clodius a great deal. For they were not only unwilling to have the victory as Clodius his Army was, but also desirous to lose the victory, and to overcome. Being brought forth and set in battle array they shamefully took their heels and fled into their tents: and never mid head and resistance, before they saw the Volians with banners displayed, advancing against the munitions of their Camp, and a foul slaughter committed upon the tail of their reeward. Then were they driven perforce to fight for very necessity, that between, wherein they rested quiet as though there had been a secret truce agreed between them. H In which mean space, a great sort of people from all parts of the Volscians and Aequians repaired to the Camp, thinking verily, that if the Romans were aware of them, they would depart in the night. Whereupon, at the third watch they came to make an assault upon their Camp. Quintus after he had quieted the tumult, which upon this sudden alarm arose, and given commandment that the founders should keep themselves within their pavilions, brought forth a company of Hermines to guard the gates, and caused certain cornetiers and trumpeters on horseback to wind and found before the trench and counterscarp, and so to hold the enemy in suspense and expectation until day-light. The rest of the night all was to quiet within the Camp, that the Romans had time enough, whom the Volscians imagined to be more than they were, and all Romans: the neighing steeds, and noise that the horses made by reason of their strange riders that they were not used unto, and the found also of their trumpets and horns that made them to let up their ears, and to stamp and fume outrageously, amused the enemies waiting ever when they would charge upon them. When it was day, the Romans being in heart and flesh, as having slept their fill, came forth and embattelled themselves, and at the first shock discombed the Volscians, wearied with long standing and overwatched with all. And yet the enemies rather gave ground and retired themselves, than seemed to be driven from their standings, because they had at their backs certain hills, whereunto they might retire behind the Principia, and not break their ranks, and so save themselves. The Consul seeing he was come to a place of disadvantage, K made a stand. The footmen hardly would be slain, calling and crying to the Consul to follow upon them seeing they were discombed. The horsemen were more eager, riding all about the Consul, and with open mouth cried out, that they would advance before the ensigns. Whiles the Consul held off in aammerling what to do, for as he was assured of the valour of his footmen, so he little trusted the ground: they all at once let up a shout, that they would let forward, come what would: and as they cried, so did they in good earnest. And pitching their javelins fast in the ground, that they might more nimbly get up the steep place, they took their full career, and ran up the hill. The Volscians having in their first brunt spent all their darts, and other sort which they had let fly, and made no spare, took up stones that lay under their feet, let drive at the Romans as they climbed up, and so thick and threefold they bestowed them that they annoyed them L and beat them down the hill. Thus the left wing of the Romans was well-near overcharged, and had not the Consul at the point, when as they were ready to retreat, blamed them first for their rashness, and then for their cowardice, and made them for very shame to shake off all fear. First they stood to it stoutly, and kept their ground, and after, as their strength served them, considering the vantage of the place which the enemies had gotten, they adventured to let foot forward, and won ground with a fresh front and outcry. And taking their career again the second time, they strain all they can, and at length overcame the disadvantage of the place. Now when they were almost at the point to win the very pitch and ridge of the hill, the enemies turned back, while they ran on heap to the enemies Camp, which in that fright was won. The Volscians, as M once in one company into the enemies Camp, which in that fright was won. The Volscians, as many of them as could escape, ran as fast as their legs would carry them to Antium. And to Antium likewise was the Roman army conducted: and after a few daies siege, was furnished upon no fresh and new force of assault but for that presently upon their unfortunate conflict and loss of the Camp their heart were done, and utterly failed.

The Third Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation N of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the third Book.

SEditions about the Laws Agraria. The Capitol taken and held by banished persons and slaves. They were flung and recovered. A survey and census was taken twice. In the former there were found of Roman Citizens 124,714, besides orphan children. And such as had no children at all, as well men as women. In the other following there were 132,419. Upon a great overthrow received in the war against the Aequians, L. Quintus Cincinnatus was made Dictator: and being in the country at his farme busie about his husbandry, was sent for to the conduct of that war. He vanquished and subdued the enemies. The number of the Tribunes of the Commons, arose to consist six years after their first institution. The Laws of Athens were fit from thence by Embassadors, sent for that purpose: to the establishing and publishing whereof there were ten personages elected in the room of Consuls which were called Decemvirs, without any other Magistrates: and this happened in the three hundred and second year

A year after the foundation of Rome. And as the Government of the State was translated from King to Consuls: so was it now from the Consuls to the Decemvirs. They having propounded tables of Laws, and born themselves modestly in that high dignity were therefore by the consent of the people, permitted to remain still in office the second year. But after they had committed many useless parts they would congeal over their room of Magistracy, sent into a still the third year: until such time as their offence and intolerable rule came to an end, increased by the filly lust of Appius Claudius: who being named upon a very sordid one to make claim unto her at his house, whereupon her father Virginius was driven of necessity to catch up a knife from a butchers stall next by, and to kill his daughter: as having no other means to save her from the hands of him that purposed to abuse her body into a filthy Libe Commons. B Upon this foul example of filly lascivious, made a full surrection, and took the main Avenue for then held, and compelled the Decemvirs to leave their place, and give over their government. Of whom Appius and one of his Collegues (which two had principally deserved punishment) were committed to prison, and there kept the rest were driven into banishment. This book containeth besides the editorious wars against the Sabines, Volscians, and Aequians. And the unbecom arbitrament or award of the people of Rome, who being chosen Arbitrators between the Atridians and the Atridians, awarded to themselves the Land whereabout the strife and controversy was.

The third Book of T. Livius.

AFTER the winning of Antium, T. Aemilius and Q. Fabius were created Consuls. This was that Fabius that only remained alive of all the name that perished at Cruciana. Now had Aemilius in his former Consulship perswaded to distribute certain Lands among the Commons. And therefore in this so like, both the favorers of the law Agraria were in good hope of the foretold law: and also the Tribunes supposing verily that now by the help of a Consul, that might be brought about and obtained, which oftentimes had been enterprised against the pleasure of the Consuls: took the matter in hand and gave the attempt: and withal, the Consul still continued in the same mind. But the great landed men and many of the Nobles, finding themselves grieved, and complaining that the chief and head Magistrat of the City buied D himself with the Tribunes suits, and was by large giving away of other mens possessions, become popular and gracious with the people, turned the whole burthen and odious heavy load of this action from the Tribunes upon the Consul his head. And a cruel broil was toward, had not Fabius, by a device and policy to neither party offensive, made an end of the matter with expedition. For whereas there were certain Lands gotten by conquest from the Volscians the year before under the conduct of T. Quintus: "There might (said he) a colony be brought to Antium, a City near adjoining, very commodious, and leared by the Sea side: so should the Commons without any grudging, or complaints of the possessors or Land-lords, be seized of Land, and the City rest in quiet and Unity. This opinion of his was accepted of all hands. And they created three especial officers or Triumvirs for the division of the said lands, to wit, T. Quintus, Ant. Fannius, and E. P. Fannius. Then proclamation was made, That whosoever would hold any of the Land, should give up their names in writing. But plenty, as the manner is, soon caused loathing for there were so few that preferred themselves, that to make up the full number of the inhabitants, they were faine to adjoin unto them certain Volscians. The rest of the multitude did rather, as it seemed) to keep a calling for Land at Rome, than be possessed of Land elsewhere. The Aequians craved peace of Q. Fabius, who was come against them with an army: and they themselves by making a sodain inroad into the territories of Lavinium, cancelled the land and made it void. But the year next following, Q. Servilius (for he was Consul with Sp. Postumius) being sent against the Aequians, kept a standing camp in the Country about Lavinium. But by the reason of a contagious disease or a plague, that raged in his army, they were of necessity forced to keep quiet within their tents. So their war was decreed unto the third year, when as Q. Fabius and T. Quintus were Consuls. And for almost as Q. Fabius had upon his victory before granted peace to the Aequians, he had an extraordinary commission directed unto him for the rule of that Provin. Who being thither gone with full assured hope that the very time of him and noise of his army would quiet the Tribunes, sent Embassadors to the Council of that Nation, with this message: "Q. Fabius the Consul saith, that as he craved before peace from the Aequians unto Rome to be brought now war to the Aequians from Rome; having now his sword in the very same hand, which he gave unto them before in friendly manner unarmed. Whole treachery it is and perjury that is the cause of this. Gods can witness now, and in some measure will revenge hereafter. Nevertheless, he or his part, however the case standeth, desireth that the Aequians would yet beark themselves to their own accord, and repent rather than stand to the extremity and abide those calamities on their sides that follow wars. If they would come in therefore and be sorry for that they have done, their submission should be received, and they taken into the safe protection of his clemency. Where a ready they had experience. But in case they persist still in their disloyalty, and take pleasure in being tormented by they well assured that they should have the ire and wrath of the Gods more than their enemies to fight against them. These words so little or nothing at all moved any more there, that the very Embassadors had like to have been very hardly used and evil entreated. Yet and an army withal was sent forth as far as Algidum against the Romans. When these tidings were brought to Rome, the indignity of the thing and the shameful manner thereof, rather than any fearful peril otherwise, raised the other Consul out of the City. So two Consular or royal armies approached the enemy in order of battail, ready to try it out presently by the dint of sword. But the day being (as it fell out) wellnigh spent, there cried one aloud from out of the place where the enemy kept ward: "This is to make a shew of war only (ye Romans) and not to war indeed: ye let your battalions in array against night forlooth, that now draweth hard on: we had need of more daylight I wis, for the business in hand, and to try this quarrel. To morrow therefore at sun rising, let ye come again into the field, ye shall have fighting fear not, your hands full. The soldiers metled and galled at these words, retired back into the camp until the next day. I thinking the night was long, that kept them from battail and so for that time they refreshed themselves with food and sleep. On the morrow to soon as it was day, the Roman host being stirring somewhat more early, stood ready arranged in array: and at length the Æquians likewise flowed themselves in field. A sharp fight there was on both sides, by reason that both the Roman soldiers fought in anger and deadly hatred, and also the Æquians upon prick of conscience, that bare them witness how they embarked themselves into this danger, and were out of all hope ever to be trusted again, were forced to hazard all upon a cast, and venture the utmost. Yet were not the Æquians able to endure long, the violent fight of the Romans, but were discomited and put to flight. And being returned within their own Frontiers, the unruly multitude for all this, were never the more inclined to peace, but reproved and blamed their Captains, "That they put the trial of the issue to a set field, in which kind of fight the Romans had singular skill, and surpassed them. As for the Æquians, they were better at robbing, spoiling, and foraging, in making incursions and inrodes: and a better and safer kinde of service it was, here and there in sundry places, to skirmish with forces divided, than reduce all into one grois army, and to pitch a field. Leaving therefore a guard to defend the camp, they went forth, and with such a tumult invaded the confines of Rome, that the very terror thereof reached unto the City. This ill, especially coming so suddenly and unlooked for, made the Romans fear the more. For who would ever have doubted and suspected, that their enemies so lately vanquished, and in manner besieged within their own camp, could possibly think upon entering into the lands of others, and to drive booties. Besides, the ruttal peasants came in at the gates, crying and laying, that they were not petty companies, and small handfuls of thieves and robbers, but (such was their foolish fear, augmenting and making every thing greater) whole armies & legions of enemies were at hand, and marshed up with banners displayed full against the City. From their mouths, they that were next made report unto others: & as they heard news from them they knew not whom, so they let them abroad they cared not how, but ever in the carriage they added somewhat of their own, and coyned lies good store. Here was running, there was crying alarm & generally such a confusion every where, as if the City had been quite lost. By good hap Quintus the Consul was returned from Algidum to Rome. That remedy cured all and layed the fear. When the tumult was appeased, he rebuked the people for fearing those enemies whom heretofore they had vanquished, and placed good guards over the gates. Then he assembled the Senate, and by the authority and assent of the Nobles, proclaimed Justitium, or a general cessation or vacation in all courts of law: and went himself forth in person with a power to defend the marches, leaving Quintus Servilius Provost of the City: but the enemy he found not in the territory all about. The other Consul performed his affairs passing well: who having certain intelligence, which way the enemies would come, let upon them laden with prey, and (by that means marching more heavily in disorder) made it a dear booty unto them even as much as their lives were worth. For few of them escaped the Ambush, and all the pillage was recovered. So the return of Quintus into the City, made an end of the publick Lawless, or above-said vacation which lasted but four dayes. Then was a Censé or Assesment for of mens goods and a muster or view taken of the number of Citizens, together with a solemn purging of the people, or called Lustrum, celebrated by Quintus. And there were numbered of Citizens 1542744 polles, or N above men and women that lived single, or had no children, and all orphans besides. And among the Æquians afterward nothing was done worth remembrance: for they betook them to their strong Towns, suffering their territory and villages to be consumed with fire, and spoiled. Thus strone Towns, suffering their territory and villages to be consumed with fire, and a huge booty, then the Consul, after he had divers times overrun the Country of his enemies, with a cruel army wasting and spoiling as he went, returned home to Rome with great honor and a huge booty. Then were Coili, Antus Posthumus Albanus, and Sp. Furius. Some have written them Fufii, who indeed are rightly named Fufii. Which I note, lest any man should think they were sundry men, whereas the variety is only in the name. No doubt there was, but that one of the Coili, would war with the Æquians: and therefore the Æquians sought for aide of the Eccene Volcians. Which being gladly granted and sent with speed, (such a perpetual hatred bore these Cities always against the Romans) there was great preparation for war in most forcible manner. The Her-nicks having an inkling and knowledge thereof, certified the Romans afore-hand, that the Æquians were revolted and banded with the Æquians. The Colony Antium likewise was had certain in jealousy, for that when the Town was lost, many people fled from thence to the Æquians, who all the time of the Æquian war, served in the field, and proved the most hardy soldiers and fiercest of all others. And now when the Æquians were driven into their Towns, that multitude

A multitude being slipped away and retired to Antium withdrew from the Romans the allegiance of the Colonies and inhabitants there, who were already of their own in imitation unbound and not to be trusted. But before the matter was come to ripeness, and they entered into any action, the Senate upon intelligence given that they intended soon, and were upon the point to revolt, gave the Coili, in charge to lend for the chief men and head persons of that colony to Rome, and to enquire and learn of them in what terms Antium stood: who being come wisely enough, without any great intreaty, and convinced by the Councils before the Senate, made answer to their interrogatories in such manner, that they were sent away more suspected, than at their first coming: whereupon they revolted fully of war. Spurius Postumus one of the Coili, to whom that province by lot fell, having taken his voyage against the Æquians, found the enemy pouring and waiving in the territory of the Her-nicks: and being ignorant what means they were (for that in no one place they were all dispersed together) he rashly joined battel, and hazarded his power, being in number and force inferior to the other. And at the first encounter he was driven back, and retired into the camp: and yet was he not put at danger and in peril there: for both the night following, and the next day after, the camp was so strongly beset, and so holily assaulted, that he could not dispatch so much as a messenger from thence to Rome. The Her-nicks sent word both of the importunate fight, and also how the Consul and his army were besieged. With which news they certified the LL. of the Council, that they granted Postumus the other Consul the solemn commission, To save the State, that he might overthrow and overcome. The order of which order and decrees, hath been always accounted to signify some great extremity of the Common-wealth. And thought best it was, that the Consul himself in person should abide at home to enrol in the muster books, all those that were able to bear arms: that Postumus should be sent as Pro-consul or Vice-consul, with a power of committate Al-lies to the siege and reduce the camp: and for the furnishing of this army, the Laines, the Her-nicks, and Colony Antium, were commanded to send unto Quintus, Subitary soldiers (for so they termed it at that time, the aids and supplies taken up in haste and on a sudden). Many attempts were made, and sundry assaults for certain dayes on each side were attempted. For the enemies being more in number, assailed in divers places and sundry wayes to cut off and diminish the power of the Romans, as not only sent and able to make head at all times. For at one time they both made an assault upon the camp, and withal sent out certain of their force to waste the territory of Rome, yea, and to give the venture upon the very City, if they could enjoy any good opportunity to offer it self. Postumus was left behind to defend the City, and Postumus the Consul was sent out to restrain and withstand the waiving of the marches. No point of care or travail on any hand was slack, watch and ward both night and day was let in the City, a good number of guard appointed after the Gates, and soldiers bestowed upon the Walls: and (that which was needful in so great a hurry) for certain dayes it was no Term, or intercession of Law was observed. In this mean while, Furius the Coili, who at the first had quietly endured the siege and made no resistance, suddenly and at un-awares sallied out at the broad gate called Decumana, upon the enemies: and where as he might have chased them, he made some stay of that, for fear lest on some other side, they would have given assault upon the camp. But Furius the Lieutenant (who also was the Consul's Brother) engaged himself too far, and upon a short desire of pursuit and following the state, neither saw his fellows as they retired, nor yet the enemies as they came to charge him on the back. Thus being shut out from all the refuge, after many essays made (but all in vain) to make way through unto the camp, manfully fighting he was slain. The Consul likewise hearing that his Brother was environed all about with enemies, returned again to fight: but as he ran more rashly than warily into the midst of the skirmish, he was sore wounded, and being hardly and with much ado saved by those that were about him, he both disquieted and daunted the hearts of his own men, and made his enemies more fierce, intire, and courageous. Who were so animated and set on fire, both with the hurt of the Consul, and also with the death of his Lieutenant, that nothing afterwards could stand in their way: no for as was able to stay them, but that they beat the Romans again into their camp: where they were besieged afresh being now both in hope, and also for strength worse than they were before. So that their main State thus lying a bleeding, had utterly perished, but that Postumus with a supply of strangers, namely, a power of Laines and Her-nicks, came to the rescue in time: who charging the Æquians behind, whilst they were wholly united in assailing the camp, shewing them within the Lieutenants head in a great bravery and pride, at the same instant caused a fall out of the camp, by a signal that he gave them a shout, and so incited round about a great number of the enemies, so full of the slaughter, but great was the flight and scattering of the Æquians in the territory of Rome: upon whom (striding here and there and driving their booties after them) Postumus, who in divers convenient places had bestowed certain companies and bands of soldiers, ran violently. And as they fled every way in dismay, they lighted upon Quintus as he with the hurt Consul returned with Victory. Then the Consul's army bravely did their endeavour, and had a good day of victory: and was revenged both for their Consul's wound, and also for the death of the Lieutenant and the Squadrons with him. Many losses and overthrowes were given and taken on each side for certain dayes. But in so ancient

"selves at their own liberty and unbridled, turned the edge of all freight and dreadful Laws: yea, H "and the rigor of all punishment, against the Commons. But let this their licentiousness should "continue for ever, he was minded to prefer and publish a Law, by virtue whereof there should "be five men created, who should set down certain conditions, to limit and gage the authority "of the Consuls: and look what authority and commission the people granted out over them, the "same should the Consul exercise, and no more, and not rule of themselves, and the Nobles to ring,
"will and licentious lust in stead of Law. This act being once published, and the Nobles to ring,
"left whilst the Consuls were away, they should be taken down and yoked, Quintus Fabius Presi"dent of the City, assembled the Senate, who so bitterly and sharply inveighed against the Law and "the Law-giver himself, that if both the Consuls themselves had feared about the Tribunes purpose "to contradict and cross his proceedings, there had been no threats nor terrible menaces left for "them, to have thundered out. For he laid fore unto his charge, that he had lay in wait, and now "having spied the time to fit his purpose, had given the venture to assail the C.W. and the State.
"And in case the Gods in their wrathful displeasure had lent among them such a Tribune as he the "year before, together with war and pestilence, there had been no remedy then, but he must have "had his way, and then they had been all undone. For when the Consuls both were dead, and "the City lay bed-ridden as it were, in a miserable confusion of all things, he would have made laws
"then indeed, to the utter abolishing of the Consuls authority out of the Common-wealth, and "been a ring-leader to Volcians and Aequians both, for to have assaulted the City. For what "might not he have lawfully done by virtue of his place? If the Consuls had either promptly or "cruelly proceeded against any one Citizen, he might have entered an action against them, and "commented there forthwith before those very Judges, of whom peradventure some one had been
"by them hardly dealt withal. This would have been the course and end of it. And he that thus
"did, should not cause the Consuls authority and rule, but the Tribunes power to become odious
"and intolerable: which having been of late well quieted and reconciled unto the Nobles, began
"now afresh to come unto the old bias, and to be troublesome again. Neither intreated he him "not to go on still as he had begun. But yet my Matters (quoth Fabius) that are the rest of the "Tribunes, we would request you to consider well this one point especially: That this power you "have, was brought in for the succour and relief of every particular person, and not to the general
"prejudice and undoing of all. Again, that ye are created Tribunes of the Commons, not enemies "of the Nobles. A heavy and lamentable case it is to us, odious and hateful unto you, and will "breed you much ill will and displeasure, in case the C.W. now forlorn, should thus be invaded
"and assailed. Ye shall lole nothing of your own rights, I assure you, nay, you shall avoid much
"mislike and hatred of men, in case ye be in hand and deal with your brother Tribunes, to put off
"this matter and defer it wholly until the Consuls coming. Why, the very Aequians and Volci-
"an themselves the last year, when both our Consuls were dead of the plague pressed not hardly up"on us, to prosecute any proud and cruel war against us. So the Tribunes commended and per"suaded with Terentillus: and this his commended suit or action being adjourned in outward show,
"but in very truth let full quite and disannulled, the Consuls forthwith were sent for home. Lucretius
"returned enriched with a right great booty, but with far greater honor and renown. Who at M
"his very first coming was himself more glory, by laying abroad in Marsfield all the prizes, that "every man for three dayes space might know his own and have it away. All the rest, that had no
"owners to come forth and make claim, was sold in port-sale. By all means consent, the Consul
"was thought worthy of triumph: howbeit that matter was put off by reason that the Tribune had "not yet done with his law: which was the thing that the Consul thought meet should be first re"garded. The matter was debated and treated for certain dayes, both in the Senate and also before "the people. At last the Tribune yielded to the Majesty of the Consul, and gave it over. Then was "due honor rendered both to the General and also to the army accordingly. He triumphed over the "Volcians and Aequians: and in his triumph his own legions followed after him. To the other
"Consul granted it was that he should in a kind of triumph called Ovatio, ride into the City, but N "without his soldiers. The year next ensuing, the Law Terentillus was by the whole College or "fellowship of the Tribunes revived and propounded again: which put the new Consuls P. Valerius
"and S. Sulpicius to some trouble. And in the same year likewise seemed to be on a light fire,
"and there was an exceeding earthquake. And that which the year afore was no credit given unto,
"was now for truth believed, to wit, That a Cow did speak. Among other strange wonders it "ruined itself: during which shewre, a huge number of fowls flew among, and were reported to "have much it and carried it away as it was falling. But that which fell down and escaped their talons,
"lay scattered here and there for certain dayes in fitch fort, as the fowls changed not at all,
"nor the flesh one jot taken and corrupted. Then the books (of Sibylla) were perused by the Du"mivir deputed over matters of Religion: who fore-told of some dangers to ensue by a Company O
"of strangers, and gave warning to look lest haply some assault should be made upon the highest "places of the City, and thereof a slaughter and massacre ensue. Amongst the rest, warning was given "to abstain from civil discord and mutinies: which the Tribunes found fault with, as a devised "matter to hinder the law. Whereupon great debate and contention: was like presently to grow.
"But behold, (that the revolution and course of troubles might turn about every year to the same "point,) The Herniks bring news that the Volcians had Aequians for all their wings were well-
"ped,

A ped, and their forces greatly decayed, began together and levy new armies: Item, That in Antium
"lay the whole weight and importance of the affairs, and depended upon it: That the An-"tiat coloners held their councils and had their meetings in open show, at Antium, but Antium
"was the principal seat of the war, and from thence came all preparations and forces whatsoever.
"As soon as the news were reported in the Senate, order was given to mulier foindies: and that "the Consuls should part between them the admittition, and managing of his way, so as the one "should have the charge against the Volcians, and the other against the Aequians. But the Tri"bunes rung it out openly in the common Hall before the people. That this was but a medita"tion of the Volcian war, and a tale devised by the tribunes, who were informed and framed to "play their parts in the Pageant, and to reverse the turn of the Nobles. And that now verily the "freedom of the people of Rome was not oppressed or endangered by plain provokes & virtue,
"but finely fluted off and dallied unmanly withal, y flye and crany inventions. And forasmuch
"as now it was an unlikely thing and incredible, that the Volcians and Aequians after so great
"slaughter committed upon them, whereby they were all in a manner killed up, should be able of "themselves to wage war, there were forthwith new enemies sought out: A famous Colony near "adjoining, was now flandered and defamed: war was pretended for a show against the guidicks "and innocent Antiats, but in truth, intended with the very Commons of Rome, whom they "meant to drive out of the City in all haste headlong, hurled with heavy armor, and to cry "turning out their poor fellow citizens into banishment, and sending them away. God knows "whether to be assayed at length of the Tribunes. And thus the Law (say the Tribunes) for they "must think their drift is to this end and to none other) should be trodden under foot, unless
"whies all is entire and whole, and nothing done, whies they remain at home in their houses,
"whies they be in their gowns, they take heed and look well about them, that they be not dis-
"possessed of the City, and take the yoke of servitude upon their necks: alluring them that if "their heart only feared, they should want for no help: and that all the Tribunes agreed and were
"of one mind, that there was no cause of fear abroad, no terror war to trouble them: but of all, "that the very providence of the Gods the year before assured them that their liberty might with "safety be defended. There and such like Remonstrances, gave the Tribunes out. On the other "part, the Consuls casting their chairs of estate to be seen, even in their fight and presence, began to "D mulier. Thither ran the Tribunes down in all haste, and drew the whole assembly of people with "them. And, to make it were a proof and trial, some few by name were called, and right-
"ways began a stir. For whomsoever the Sergeant by the Consul his commandment arrested, the "Tribunes charged again that he should be let go. And neither sides obtained within the limits and "compuls of their commission and rightful authority, but preformed of their might and show, "hand, to attain unto their desired purpose. For even as the Tribunes had denounced themselves in "forbidding the mulier, scemably the Senators bestowed themselves to stop the law for going for"ward: whies it was propounded every Court day, and when the people might assemble. And ever"more the brawl began, when the Tribunes commanded the people to avoid the Hall, for that the "Parity would not endure thus to be let out and so hindered. Few or none of the ancient would
"E be present at these troublesome stirs, being such as were not to be managed and ordered by sage "Council, but wholly left to the rauciness and boldness of young and green heads. The Consuls also "were much absent, and forbore to be in place, for fear lest in such a confused hubbub their Ma"jesty and dignity, might have been subject to some shameful contumely and disgrace. But there "was among them one C. Cassius, a lusty young Gentleman and a stout, in regard both of his "noble parentage, as also of the goodly tall personage and length of his body. Besides these good
"parts that God had bestowed upon him, he had won himself many ornaments by industry and "achievement in wars: He had withal an eloquent speech and good grace at the bar, as in one "word throughout the whole City, there was not one thought to be more ready in counsel, or "taller of his hands. This Cassius standing in the midst of the Nobles, higher to be seen above all the
"F rest, as one that in his speech and strength carried above him the countenance and authority of all
"Dictators and Consuls, was the only man that bare off the brunt of the Tribunes, and from of the "common people. Many a time were the Tribunes driven out of common Hall, the Commonalty "defected and put to flight by the conduct of this Captain. Whosoever came within his reach, it "was sure to go away thoroughly beaten, and clean tripped. So as it is idly spread, that when all "this commotion might have been allowed, the law had soon been the laid and overthrown. Now when all "the other Tribunes besides were herewith dismayed and well-nigh cast, Antius was in a capital crime,
"being one of their fellowships, was so bold, as to enter an action against Cassius, of a capital crime.
"By whies he died of his, he either died, thus heared his hot and furious nature. For to much the "Tribunes eagerly withstood he the Law, counselled and troubled the Commonalty, and persecuted the Tri"bunes as it were with open war. The plaintiff in the mean time, suffered the defendant to run on
"G and fill, and with many outrages to kindle more coal of ill will, and hatred upon his own head,
"to minister further matter of crime to be charged with. And all while while he could not respect
"the Law afore said, nor to much of any hope to bring it to pass, as to provoke and for ever, as the "giddy head and humorous vein of Cassius. Whereby it came to pass, that many foolish common times "were committed both in word and deed, by the younger sort: and evermore the blame light upon "poor Cassius: he alone was always charged, because he had been once intreated. But nevertheless hee gain'd and cross'd the Law, And Aulus Virginius ever and anon would entertain the Commons with these and in like speeches, "See ye not already (quoth he) O Quintus, that it may be "not now have Cæso your Carizen, and the law which you desire both together, But what mean "I to speak of your Law? It is your liberty that he in ringeth and letteth himself against, and in "pride and arrogancy he exceedeth all the Quintus that ever were. But wait, ye were bell-until "he be made Consul or Dictator, whom ye see already, being but a private person to hear him, "felt to greatly of his strength and boldness, as to Lord it over you, and rule as a King. Many loo- "th'd the Tribune and said the like, adding moreover, how they had been well knocked and beaten "at his hands: and were forward enough of themselves to let the Tribune on, to proceed in "his commended action against him.

Now was the law day of judicial trial come: and it seem'd abroad, that all men verily thought that the very foundation of their liberty consisted in the condemnation of Cæso. In conclusion, driven he was with much indignity and shame, to creep and crouch unto every man, humbly craving their favor one after another. There followed him his kinsfolk and nearest friends the best men of the City, Titus Quinctius Capitolinus, who had been thrice Consul, spake in his behalf: and after he had reckoned up many honors and dignities, both of his own and a fo of his family, affirmed, that neither in the house and race of Quintus, nor yet throughout the City of Rome, was ever seen so great towardsness, no such show and likelihood of piety and perfect virtue and prowess as in Cæso: saying, that he had been first his soldier, and served under him, and that with his own eyes he had seen him oftentimes fight valiantly hand to hand with his enemies in the field. Again Sp. Fufius made this good report of him, That upon a time, when himself was in great distress and extremity, Cæso was sent unto him from Quinctius Capitolinus to help at a pinch: and that there was no one man, by whose good service, as he thought, the Weal publick at that time was more relieved and restored, then by his. L. Lucretius the Consul last year before, glittering in his bright glory to fresh and new, joined with the rest, avowing Cæso partaker with him in his praise-worthy acts: he recomended his brave combats, rehearsed his noble exploits, both in his robes, and voices, and also in the plight field, advising & counselling them that in any hand they would retain him till for to be a Citizen of their own City, rather then of any other, this excellent young gentleman, furnished with all good gifts of nature and fortune, like to prove a singular stay of the publick affairs, unto what City and State soever he should come. As for that best and halfeless (quoth he) I which was in him milked and offensive, age and time would daily diminish, and become him of use: grave and sage counsel, which now was wanting, would come on apace every day more then other. Seeing therefore his faults waxed old and faded, his virtues now were in their growth, flourish'd, and grew ripe unto perfection: they should permit so brave, so rare a person, to live till among them, and be a good old man in this their City. His father among the rest, L. Quintus, furnished Cæso with another way to work: who not by iterating till his praises, for fear of heaping more matter of envy and repine, but craving pardon for his wildness and youthful demeanor: besought them for his sake at least, to give the son as a present to his father, who neither in word nor deed had ever offended any person. Some took no heed and gave a deaf ear to his prayers, either for modesty and reverence, or for fear. Others complaining how they and theirs had been beaten and hardly used at his hands, bewailed and shewed plainly by their shrewd and churlish answers what their judgment was. Besides, the common dislike and malice conceived against the defendant, there was a perilous matter and crime above all, that touch'd him very near. And that was this: M. Volscius Fictor, who certain years before had been Tribune of the Commons, came in against him as a witness, and depol'd, how that not long after the plague was in the City, he hapned upon a company of youths, as they made a riot and robbery in the Subura: where there arose a brawl and fray, in which his elder brother, a man well in years, and not thoroughly recovered of his sickness, was with a buffet with Cæso his fist fell'd to the ground, and lay there for dead: so as he was fain to be had home between mens arms: and as he deemed, of that blow he died: yet might not he as hairous as the fact was, bring his action and prosecute the law, for fear of the Consuls of these last years. As Volscius thus informed, the whole court was moved therewith, in so much that Cæso elapsed hardly, from being murdered, in that rage and fury of the people. Then Virginius commended to lay hold on the man, and to have him away to prison. The Parian again by force resisted, T. Quintus cried out, That he who was under arrest for to make his appearance, and answer at a day for his life, and who shoud fly should come to his trial, and be judged, ought not before sentence of condemnation, and before he had pleaded for himself, thus violently be mislead. The Tribune replied again, That his meaning was not to punish him before he were condemned: howbeit, by his leave he would be so bold as keep him fast in prison, to be forth-coming at the law day: that he who had killed a man, might suffer therefore, as cording as the people of Rome shoud award. Then were the Tribunes called unto for their help, why by the means of an indifferent decree then made, shoud their lawful favours with speed, by verine whereof they forb'd expressly, that he shoud not be imprisoned, but pronounced that it was their will and pleasure, that the defendant shoud personally appear, and a piece of money be promised unto the people, in case that he made default and failed of his appearance. Much question there was what sum of money shoud be thought reasonable to be appointed. And the matter was put over to the Senate to be decided: and whilst the Senators fate

Nobility.

A thereupon the defendant was kept still in ward within the common Hall. At length they thought good and set it down that he shoud put in mecties, And they bound each him by the neck of his tunic. But how many of the shoud put in bond was left to the will and discretion of the Tribunes, who assigned and determin'd ten and no more. With so many mecties, they came bound the defendant perionally and peremptorily to appear at his day. This man was the first Roman that went under special bail, and put in good pledges to make his publick answer. He being contrived out of the common Hall and dimitt'd the next night following, unawares to the Commons, he departed to the Triclin into exile. Whence the day of this judgment was come, and that it was assigned for his exile, that he was out of the town, and gone into banishment. Virginius assembled the people about this matter: but his fellow Tribunes being called unto for their help, dimitt'd the Court and licensed every man to depart. But the federal money was exactly exacted at his fathers hands, so that he was driven to sell up all that ever he had, and for a long time to live apart as a person banished, on the other side of Tyber, in a poor blind cottage out of the way. This process of judgment, and the peccing of the law above stand together, built the City and kept it occupied. Quiet they were for any wars abroad. At what time the Tribunes like Conquerors, seeing the Nobles appall'd at the banishment of Cæso, imposed no laws their law was in manner fully established and enacted. And for as much as the more ancient Senators had dispossessed themselves, as it were, of the Common-wealth, and made no new parts with the State: the younger sort, and in chiefely as were of Cæso his crew and acquaintance, were kindled the more against the Commons, and abated not their courage: namely, this good thereby was done upon them, that in some measure they temper'd and milled their furious affections and violent outrage. Thet at time after the exile of Cæso, that the law began again to be propoled, they being well appointed, and banded together, backed all with a mighty company of their friends and favorites, set upon the Tribunes: taking the occasion when they charged them to depart out of the hall in such manner, that no one of the moveable fellows was singular, or carried home with him any special price or blame more then another: for the Commons complained that for one Cæso, there were now half a thousand: that the law began again, wherein the Tribunes moved not with their law, none more quiet, none more peacable then themselves. Courteously they would salute and speak unto the Commons, at all other times they would invite them home to their houses and make them good cheer, assist them and be present with them in the common Hall, suffer the Tribunes themselves without any interruption or impeachment to keep their counts and hold their assemblies whatsoever: shewing themselves, at no time to any of them either publicly or privately fierce and cruel, but only when they went in hand with the law, for otherwise the young Gentlemen were popular enough. And not only in other causes made the Tribunes good dispatch, and went quietly through all their future business, also the same men were chosen again for the next year following without any tumult and words: so far were they from being offered any forcible violence: and thus they lost handling and gentle dealing, they had now by little and little won the Commons, and made them as it were contented. And so by these fine fetches and devices, for one who yearly the law was fluted off, and E prettily avoided. The City being now in more quiet state, C. Claudius the son of Appius and P. Valerius Poplicola, came to be Consuls. And no news this new year: for the same year neither about peccing or admitting the law, held the City occupied. As much as the young Nobles imagined themselves more into the favour and familiarity of the Commons: for many a more eagerly again on the other side, did the Tribunes labour and endeavor with complaints and handers, to bring them into suspicion and jealousy with the Commons: saying, that there was a conspiracy intended and contrived: that Cæso was in Rome: that there were plots laid to murder the Tribunes, and to massacre the Commons: that they were let on work by some cats on, even the Ancestors of the Nobles, utterly to abolish the Tribunes authority out of the C. V. and to bring and lead the City to the same pals again, as it had been before the taking and keeping hold in the Mount Sacra. Besides all this, war was feared from the Volscians and Equians: so contrary it was, and so only once every year it came about, yet and with all, and yet their ready rings and unlooked for.

A rabble of dishonest persons, Outlaws and Bondslaves, to the number of persons having to their Captain one Appius a Sabin, surprised in the night the Capitol and Cæle, and were masterful by the force thereof, who immediately killed in the cattle as many as would not be of their conspiracy. And they took arms with them. The rabble and this hubbly rather being on down to the Forum, and placed a fear. The alarm was given on all hands: and no cry heard but Liberty, Liberty, Liberty. The Commons were afraid to put the Commons in arms, and they doubting also to let them be unarm'd, not knowing what sudden occurrence this shoud be, they were hindred and hindered the city: whether it were foreign or domesticall, arising from the malice and hatred of the people, or from the treachery and faithlessness of their servants: Yet they devi'd to speak the up roar: and as they were hindred to repress it, the more other while they fired up new: so the frightened and amled multitude, could not be ordered by any commandment. Howbeit at length they resolv'd to suffer them to take arms, and in all ingeneral, but only (not that they knew not what their enemies were) to have a sufficient and trusty guard about them, ready at all stages and dangers whatsoever. In this careful silence and doubt, who were their enemies, and what their their number was, they pass'd the rest of the night, disposing along watch and ward in all meet H and convenient places of the City. But the day light disclosed the war and the Captain there of Appo Herodotus from out of the Capitol proclaimed freedom to all bondmen that would come and follow him: taking upon him to uphold to defend the cause of most miserable captives:

namely, to restore home again into their native country all such exiled persons, as had been unjustly expelled, and also to take away the heavy yoke of slavery and bondage. Which thing he could wish it might be effected and brought about with the good will and helping hand of the people of Rome. But in case there were no hope & comfort there, then he would allay the Volsians and Aequians yet, and procure what means he could, by all hard courtes and extremities whatsoever. Now the Nobles and Coss, began to be more into the matter: and besides those dangers that were in view, and presently threaten'd many enemies in the City, the legions the Veientians or the Sabines: and left, there being already too many enemies in the City, the legions and *Tuscan*s should combine together, and come upon at once, not, as aforetime, invade enemies and perpetual, the Volsians and Aequians should now at once, not, as aforetime, invade their borders and drive booties, but give an attempt upon the very City, which was already in some part, taken and possessed by enemies. Many and sundry were their fears. But of all other the dread and jealousy of their own bondslaves presented unto them most imminent and present danger: for fear, lest every man harboured his enemy at home in his own house, whom neither he could trust securely, nor yet mistrust without some jeopardy: fearing lest being once disredited, he might prove more malicious and bent to do a mischief. And to such thoughts they were driven, that with all their concord and agreement, they hardly were able to remedy the matter, and to stop the extremity. So greatly the future troubles like to ensue, exceeded those that presently appeared and were in sight, that no man feared either Tribuns and Commons,

And yet, that was the only thing in manner that lay hardest upon them, ready to bear down to the ground their state, which they now began already to shrink and reel. For so seriously and madly were the Tribuns bent, that they thought they would stand to it, and bear men in hand, that it was for no war, but a vain illusion and colour of war, and no other, that had seized on the Capitol; for gathered together, who if they might once perceive that the Law were passed, and that all the they had made, took no effect, would slip away soon and be gone, in more silence I say, than they thither came. Whereupon they called the people away from their armor and weapons, and summoned them to an assembly, to go through with their Law and Enact it now or never. In the mean time the Coss, held Council fearing a greater mischief like to ensue from the Tribuns than the enemies had wrought in the night season. And when word was brought that arms were laid away, and that the people had abandoned their quarters wherthey were left in guard, then the leaving his colleague to keep the Senat together, departed hastily out of the Court & went straight into the Temple to the Tribuns, What work is here my Masters (quoth he) you hath are Tribunes Herdonius*): command hardly, and spare not, to arm against P. Valerius the Consul: It should be well seen that he by the K.K. A great host was toward, and no other like, but that they would have gone together by the ears, and that the mutiny of the Romans, would have been a goodly spectacle to the enemies for to behold. But all this while, neither could the law be preferred, nor the Consul go up into the Capitol. The night at length itayed these brails begun, and hinfilt all. The Tribuns fearing the armed forces of the Consuls, yielded to the darkness of the night, and gave over. Now

B When the principal Authors of the discord were once gone out of the way, The Nobles went a-ghost: where they would enter into talk and discord with them, according to the present occasions and the time, amending them to take heed into what danger they brought the State. Forasmuch as now (quoth they) it is not a matter of debate between the Senators and Commons: but both Senate and Commons, the Cattle and strongest hold of the City the Temples. Whiles these things were a practising in the common place, for to appeale the diffention: the Consuls for fear, left the Sabins or the Veientians, enemies both, should trife and rife: were gone to the gates, and all about the walls. The same night came tidings also to Tufcanus of the taking of the Cattle, the furling of the Capitol, and likewise of the troublesome State wherein the City stood. At that time was L. Manlius, Dictator of Tufcanus: he forthwith called a Senate together, brought in his Messengers of the related news, and thought it very expedient and needfull not to wait until there came Embassadors from Rome to crave their aid: for that the present peril it self alone, the urgent necessity, their focal Gods, and the faithful bond of league, required no lets at their hands, than to lend succour: adding moreover, that the Gods would never give them the like occasion and opportunity again, to gratify the Romans: to bind and oblige unto them by a sound benefit and pleasuredone, to mighty a City, and to near a neighbour. Whereupon it was decreed, to succure them with all speed. The able men of service were taken up and enrolled, munition and armor given them in their hands: who advancing toward

D Rome by break of day, seemed a far off to be enemies, and were taken for the Aequins or Volscians. But afterwards, when this foolish fear was overblown, they were received into the City: and marched down in order of battell to the marketplace. Where, at the very same time Publ. Valerius having left his fellow Consul to guard and fortify the gates, was letting his men in array. The authority of the man had prevailed with the people, for he promised and assured them, that if the Capitol were once recovered, and the City set in quiet, if they would suffer him to be informed what frauds and secret mischief was undertaken and practised by the Tribuns under colour of this Law, he would in remembrance of his ancestors, and of his surname (which in regard of the affectionateness he bore the people, by a special care, as it were by inheritance, from his forefathers, was recommended unto him) not hinder and trouble the meetings and assemblies of the Commons, nor cross and thwart their proceedings. They followed him therefore as their march up against the rising of the Capitol Hill. The Tufcan Legion fluck close unto them, and followed after. Citizens and Associates both did their best, and strove who should regain the Capitol first, and have the honor of that day. Each Captain exhorted and encouraged his men, then began the enemies to fear, and with all well what to truft unto, but only the situation of the place. The Romans and their allies feeling their fear, came forward and advanced their standards against them. Now by this time were they broken into the porch of the Temple. Where P. Valerius fighting manfully among the foremost in the vanguard, was slain. P. Valerius a Consul slain, saw him when he fell: who gave his men in charge to cover his body, and let himself into the Consuls room, and fought in his stead. The soldiers for heat and excess of fight, took no regard, and came to no knowledge of this great mischance, but got the victory, they knew that they fought without their Captain. Many of the outlaws were there slain, and polluted the Temple with their blood: Many taken alive Prisoners, and Herdonius himself was slain outright. So the Capitol was again recovered. The captives, as they were either bound or free, were executed every one according to their condition and place. The Tufcans had thanks reported, call'd Quadrans or mites into the Consul his house, that he might with greater pomp and

E When all was appeased and in quiet, the Tribuns were earnest with the Nobles to perform the promise of P. Valerius: they were instant also with Lucius, to allow the foul, and keep it forward. The Consul denied to suffer them to meddle with the law, before he had substituted a fellow in his place. And these contentions held unto the time of the second Election for the Nobles, was L. Quintus Cincinnatus, the father of Cassius, created Consul, and presently to enter into his office. The Commons herewith were much troubled and trucken dead, now that and encamped himself not far, either from the town, or the standing camp of his enemies: where the Volscians seeing no forces yet come unto them from the Æquians, had no heart to fight, but made preparation how they might keep themselves quiet and safe, within their mure and rampire. The morrow after, Fabius made not one entire battell of Allies and citizens mingled together, but three battalions severally by themselves, of three sundry nations, & ranged them along all about the counterscarpe and trench of his enemies. Himself was in the midst with the Roman legions, and gave commandment to observe heedfully and mark the signal: that the Allies also should both begin battell and also retire, when he sounded the retreat. In like sort he placed the horsemen behind the Principia at the back of each battell. Thus in three sundry parts he assailed the camp, and invincibly it round about, and charging lustily hard upon them on every side, he beat the Volscians down from their rampire, for they were not able to endure his violence. And having gotten over all their trenches and fortifications, he drave the fearfull multitude clean out of their hold, that now were retired to a side and corner of the camp. The horsemen might not easily get over the trench, and flood still of purpose to behold the fight, and to mark them when they should flee: but having once gotten them in the open fields, they chased them as they ran away on heaps: and by killing them in their fearfull flight, deserved their part in that victorie. Great was the execution both within the camp, and also without the rampire, as they fled; but greater was the pillage, for that the enemies had much ado to carry their armour away with them, and but that they throwed themselves as they fled in the woods, they had perished every man. During these exploits about Antium, the Æquians having sent before them the tallest and lustiest young men they had, surprised the castle of Tusculum, upon a sudden and at unawares in the night seasons: and with the rest of their power they were encamped not far from the walls of Tusculum, intending to intercept and slay the army of their enemies. Tidings hereof came in post to Rome, and from Rome to the camp before Antium: which troubled the Romans as much as if news had been brought, that the Capitoll was taken. So fresh in remembrance was the late desert of the Tuiculans: and the like jeopardy seeming to challenge and redemand semblable aid and succour. Fabius seeing all other things aside, caused the booty in all haste to be conveyed out of the camp to Antium: where having left an indifferent guard, he hasteneth space in order of battell to Tusculum; by reason whereof, the soldiers could take nothing with them, but their armour, and such baked or boyled meats were at hand ready. The Consul (Cornelius) sent a convey of victuals unto them from Rome. Thus for certain months continued the war at Tusculum. The Consul (Fabius) with one part of his host assailed the camp of the Æquians: for the other part he let the Tuiculans have, to win again their fortress. Against all force it was impregnable, but in the end famine constrained the enemies to abandon it. To which extremity being at length driven, they were by the Tuiculans disarmed and compelled to passenaked under the yoke. Who, as they fled homeward with shame enough, were overtaken of the Roman Consul in Algidum, and put to the sword every one. After this victory, he encamped with the rest of his army at Colanum, for to the place is named. The other Consul likewise, seeing that there was no danger threatening the wals of Rome, now that the enemy was discomfited & repulled, departed himself from the city. So the Consuls entering two waies the borders of their enemies, made sharp war and spoiled the Volscians on the one side, and the Æquians on the other. I find in most writers that the Antium in this year rebelled: and that L. Cornelius the Consul managed that war and won the town. But for as much as there is no mention made of that matter in any ancient writers, I dare not avouch it for a certaine truth.

This war was no sooner brought to an end, but the domestical Tribunes war at home put the Nobles in fear: for the Tribunes cried out that this was cautelous and fraudulent dealing, thus to keep the armies abroad, for nothing els but to disappoint them for publishing the law. Yet nevertheless, since they had begun it, they would not give over, but go through with it and see an end. Howbeit P. Lucretius, president of the city for the time, prevailed thus much with them, that all Tribunitian affairs should hang & be deferred unto the coming of the Consuls. There was besides a new occasion arose of fresh trouble. A. Cornelius and Quintus Servilius * Quæstors, gave summons to M. Volscius to make his answer at a day, who laid to his charge that he without all doubt, had born false witness against Cæso. For by many presumptions and evidences it appeared, that neither Volscius his brother, from the first time that he fell sick and took his bed, was at any time seen openly in the streets, or to much as to have sit up, and mended any whit, but of that disease which held him many months, he languished and consumed away to death: nor at that time, wherein the deponent supposed the deed was done, was Cæso once seen at Rome: it being plainly affirmed and proved by those who served together with him in the wars, that he was ordinarily all the time fighting under his colours as well as they, without any paupor or licence to depart. And to make this good, many there were that of themselves privily challenged Volscius, and offered to traverse the law and to be tried by any indifferent and competent judges. But when as he durst not abide the trial and to be judged, all these things put together and to consequent one to the other, made men doubt no more of the condemnation of Volscius then of Cæso, which was grounded upon the bare testimony of Volscius. The Tribunes were only the stay; who laid plainly they would not suffer the Quæstors to hold any sessions or judicial court, for the trial of the defendant, before they had a solemn assembly about their law. So were both these matters

A matters put off unto the Consuls coming. Who being entered with triumph into the city, with their victorious armie & no words made of the law, many thought the Tribunes were clean dazed and stricken dead. But they (for that the year now was at an end) aspiring to be Tribunes the fourth time, left all their hot contention for the law, and reserved themselves wholly to argue and reason at the assembly for the Election of new Magistrates. And albeit the Consuls had bent all their might and main against the continuity of the Tribunship, as earnestly, as if a law had been promouged, tending to the impinging and abridging of their majesty, yet got the Tribunes the mastery, and had the hand of them in the end. In this year peace was granted upon request and petition, unto the Æquians. And the Sessing, which the year before began, was now finished. B And this was counted the tenth general survey and solemn purging of the citie from the foundation thereof. There were numbered in the Censie-book of citizens 132,119 polles. A glorious and honourable year it was until the Consuls, both at home and in war. For they not only procured peace abroad, but also the citie was, if not in perfect concord and unity, yet in little trouble than at other times. L. Minutius, and T. Nautilus, that there were created Consuls, entered upon the reliques of the two matters begun the former year. And much after one sort, as the Consuls crossed the going forward of the law, so the Tribunes hindered the judicial proceeding against Volscius. But the new Quæstors were men of more power and greater authority. For together with M. Valerius, the son of Valerius, and nephew of Volscius, was T. Quinctius Capitolinus created Quæstor, a man that had been thrice Consul. Forasmuch therefore, as Cæso, the wealthiest gentleman of all other, and the very ornament of the youth of Rome, could not be redressed again, neither to the house of the Quintus, nor the commonweal, he pursued of more pectie, with just & lawful war, and false witness, who would not suffer on anyhand the innocent person to have the liberty to plead in his own defence. And when Volscius, most of all the other Tribunes, was earnest to publish the law, the Consuls had two months secretly given time to consider thereof, and look into it thoroughly: to the end, that when they had advertised the people what secret fraud and inconspicuousness was hidden and lurked therein, they might afterwards suffer them to proceed and assempne, and gather voices accordingly. This space between granted, brought the citie into a good and quiet state.

But the Æquians would not abide, that long it should continue; Who having broken the league, which the year before was made with the Romans, chose Gracchus Clitius for their governor and general, who was in those daies the greatest man among the Æquians. Under the conduct of this Gracchus, they enter first in warlike manner the country of Luvicinus, and from thence into the territories of Tusculum, spoiling and ransacking as they went: and being laden with preys and booties, they pitch their tents in Algidum. Thither repaired from Rome into their camp, Cæso, Fabius P. Valerius, and P. Posthumius as ambassadors to complain of wounds received, and to demand redress and satisfaction according to covenant. The General of the Æquians seemed to grant them audience, and wished them to declare what message and commission they had from the Senate of Rome, unto the cake; for that himself had some other matters to dispatch the while. Now there grew a mighty great Oake hard by the General his pavilion, spreading his boughs even over it, and the shadow thereof served for a cold sitting place. Then one of the Embassadors, as he went his way, "Let both the sacred Oake (quoth he) and what divine power forever is seated in this place, heare and know, that by your fault the league is broken, who nevertheless gave our present complaints, and shortly assist our valiant armies, when we shall prosecute and revenge at once the disloyall breach, both of Gods laws and mans. So soon as the Embassadors were returned to Rome, the Senat gave direction, that one of the Consuls should lead forth an armie against Gracchus, into Algidum, and the other have in commission to wait the borders of the Æquians. The Tribunes, as their manner was, hindered the matter and peradventure had staid it altogether, but for a new fearful accident that suddenly came in the neck of the other. For a mighty power of Sabines were approached well neere to the wals of the citie, robbing, spoiling and destroying all a fore them with sword and fire. The territory was pitifully roud about laid desolat, and the citie therewith sore terrified. Then the Commons themselves came down and gently they took weapons in hand: and (say what the Tribunes would against it) two great armies were enrolled. Nautilus had the leading of the one against the Sabines: and being encamped at Ereuntum, with rides and incursions, and thole for the most part by night, made such foul work and waile in the Sabines country, that in comparison thereof, the lands about Rome, seemed as if they had not been once touched. Minutius in his exploits, had neither like good success, nor yet equal courage and valour of heart. For having pitched his tents not far from the enemy, and received no great foile and losse at his hands to speak of, yet he kept himself for fear within the camp. Which when the enemies perceived, they grew more bold (as commonly the cowardice of one increaseth the courage of another) and assailed the camp in the night season: but seeing that plain force little prevailed, the morrow after they raised mounts, and cast trenches round about. But before they had with their countermures and rampires stopped up all passages, five horsemen being even amongst the guards of the enemies, brought news to Rome, that the Consul with his armie was besieged. Nothing could there have hapned to little thought of, and unlooked for, whereupon there was such fear, trembling, and quaking, as if the enemies had besieged not the camp, but the very citie, Nautilus the Consul they sent for, and because they thought him like to doe but small good, they agreed therefore to create a Dictator, who might

hands,

might restore again the distressed state of the C. W. And Quintius Cincinnatus by content of all men was nominated. Now a world and wonder it is to hear them speak, that in regard of riches despite all things else, and suppose there can be no great honour and virtue, but where wealth and riches do flow in, excellently. This L. Quintius, the only hope of the Romans, the man who was to let upright their Empire now distressed, occupied then a piece of ground, to the quantity of four acres, called at this day Quintia prata, Quintius his addow, on the other side of Tyber, ever against that very place, where now the Ardenal and Shipdocks are, and there was he found digging a ditch, and bearing hard on his spade, or else a plowing the ground, I wot not whether, but huffe and earnest about some useful work, no doubt he was: and after salutations passed on both sides, between him and the Embassadors that were sent, he was requested by them, that he would put on his best gown, and (that which might turn to the good of himself and the commonwealth) hear a message from the Senat. First, he marvelled what the matter should be & very often asking of them if all were well; the willeth his wife Racilia to bring him forth his Senators robe straightway, out of his torie cottages which he put on his back (but first he brushed off the dust, and wiped away his sweat, and made himself somewhat mannerly) and then came forth unto them, who in joyous manner, by way of congratulation, stiled him by the name of Dictator: calling hard upon him to repair unto the city, and declaring in how doubtfull termes the arrieve flood. Then was there barge provided ready for Quintius, at the cities cost: and being ferried over the river, his three ions met him and received him first, then others of his kinsfolk and friends, and after them the more part of the Senators. Thus attended with this frequent company, and with the K Sergeants going before, was he brought to his house. Great concourse there was also of the Commons: but nothing to joyous were they, to see Quintius, supposing that government of his over great and absolute, and himself a man in time of his rule, too imperious. And for that night verily, nothing was done, but a good standing watch kept in the city. The morrow after, the Dictator being come into the common place of assembly before day-light, appointed Generall of the horse, L. Targuinius, of Noble blood descended: a man who for mere poverty had ever served on foot, but of all the flower of Rome was reputed and taken to be a brave servitor, and an excellent fouldier. Then Quintius with the Generall of horsemen, mounteth into the pulpit aloft: proclaimeth a publicke vacation or Lawfeed: commandeth all shop windows through the city to be shut, and chargeth that no man should follow any private businesse of his own. Then as many as were of age to fight, were willed to shew them selves in their armour, before the sun set in Mars field, every one with victuals dressed for five daies, and with twelve forked staves a peece for to pitch in the rampart. And that whosoever were above that age, and were unwey, and not meet for service should dresse and provide victuals for the next fouldier unto him, whereas himself made ready his armour, and sought for staves aforesaid. Thus ran the young able men to and fro, to furnish themselves with staves, and took whatsoever they could find, and whatsoever was next hand: no man was forbidden, and so they were all ready with heart and good will, according to the Dictator his proclamation. Then went the Dictator forth with the legions of footmen, the Master of the horse likewise with his men of arms, in such good order and away, as might not only serve for a speedy march to rid ground, but also for a set battell if occasion served. "In M" both regiments they spared not to encourage and exhort their fouldiers, according as the present time required: willing them to set foot forward, to mend their pace and make speed, that by night time they might reach to their enemies: & not (say they, before there was great need, for that the Roman Consul and army were besieged, and had now three daies already been pent up fast inclosed: and what might happen in one day or one night, no man knew: for often times in the twinkling of an eye, and in the very turning of an hand, here fall out accidents of right great moment and importance. On aforesaid, Ensigne which one follow fouldier another. Thus went they also lustily forward, and all to pleasure and gaudie then captains. So that by midnight they were come into Algidum: and so soon as they perceived their enemies to be near at hand, they pitched down their ensignes. Then the Dictator rode about as far forth as he could see in the dark, and having viewed well the situation, coaling and allision of the camp, commanded the Marshalls and Colonels to give direction, that all the carriage and baggage, should be laid up together in one place, and that the fouldiers with their armour and staves only, should come again unto their ranks. What he commanded was soon done. Then in the same order that he marched, he dreweth out his host in length, and compacteth the camp of his enemies, and commandeth them all, (upon a signall or watchword given) to set up a shout, and presently upon the shout to call a trench, & every man stuck down his pale in the rampier. Having given this charge, straightwayes the signall followed. The fouldiers do that which they were bidden: the shout was heard over all the camp of the enemies, yea, and into the Consul his camp: causing in the one great fear, in the other exceeding joy. The Romans rejoicing one with another to hear the shout of their fellow-citizens and countreymen, with a conceit of their coming to release, begin of themselves from their sentinels and Campi de grand, to threaten and terrifie their enemies. The Consul let them forward and said, there was now no staying for the matter, nor delays to be made: for that it appeared by that alarm, that not only their friends were come with succours, but also had begun to skirmish: and that it was all to nothing, that their enemies camp was already on the outward side assaulted. Whereupon, he commanded his fouldiers to arm, and to follow hard after him. Thus in the night began the skirmish,

A and the legions of a Dictator by their outcry and shouting made signification that the enemies on that side also were driven to their shifts and in great hazard. By this time the Agrius had addressed themselves to impesch them in their trenching and making of their rampire: to the end that they might not be compassed about: but the alarm was given and the Romans already begun by their enemies within: fearing therefore, lest they would break through the midst of their camp, they turned from the piones and workmen without, to them that fought within, and thereby gave the other leave to ply their work and labour all the night long at their pleasure: and to they maintained skirmish with the Consul untill day-light. Now by the break of day they were entrenched on every side by the Dictator, and were scarce able to hold out battell with one of the armies. Then the host of Quintius, which presently upon the finishing of the trench returned to their weapons, entering of the mines and rampires of the enemies. Here began a fresh conflict again, and yet the former nothing altered. The enemies then seeing themselves thus distressed and to hardly driven on every side, left fighting and fell to intreating: they besought the Consul on one side and the Dictator on the other, that they would not get the victory by effusion of blood and cruel massacre, but would permit them to go their waies naked without their weapons. The Consul he posted them off to the Dictator: who being in great wrath and displeasure, would not be content without their shame and ignominy besides. But commanded that Cicilius their generall with other Colonels and Captains should be brought bound unto him. Item, he enjoyed them to abandon & quit the town of Corbio: as for the Agrius blood, he sought neither it, he had no need thereof: they might depart with their lives. However, because he would have it now at length, manage their heads, confessed, that the nation was vanquished and subdued this will and pleasure was, they should pale all under the yoke or gallows: the manner whereof is this. They took three spears or javelins, and set two of them pitched in the ground endlong, and their overthwart fastned unto the other. Under this kind of gallows the Dictator compelled the Agrius to go. Thus having goter the tents of the enemies full of all kind of store (for asked he lent them under the yoke) & the whole pillage he bestowed upon his own fouldiers only: and rebuking sharply the Comus army and the Cicilius, yet that (quoth he) fouldiers go without your part of booty? "won" of the enemies, whose booty ye had like you selves to have been. And as for these, O L. M. Cincinnatus, until thou begin to have the heart and courage beleeving a Consul, thou shalt be a Lieutenant only over such legions. So Cicilius being discharged of the Consulship, remained still D as he was commanded, with the army. But to well were men content in those daies, willingly to yield obedience: to them that better could command, that this army in remembrance hereof as of a favour received, rather than of a disgrace offered, both ordained for the Dictator a coronet of gold of one pound weight: and also when he went homeward, saluted him by the name of their Patron. At Rome the Senat being assembled together by Q. Fabius Provost of the cities, decreed that Quintius should enter the city in triumph with his army marching in battall array, as he came. Before his chariot was led the commanders of his enemies: the engines are carried aforesaid, then followed the army laden with spoil and pillage. Great cheer and banquet were let out, men lay upon tables at every mans door. Thus making merry, they followed the chariot with songs of triumph, with sports and merry conceits, as they are wont to do at their great and solemn feasts. The same day L. Mamilius the Tuscan, with the approbation and good liking of all men, was enfranchised citizen of Rome. And forthwith would the Dictator have resigned up his office, but that the Consul, held for the trial of M. Volscius, indicted of bearing false witness, staid him: and in truth, the Tribunes would have hindered the judicial proceeding against him, if they had not stood in awe of the Dictator. But Volscius was convicted and had sentence, and departed to Lavinium in exile. And Quintius having taken the Dictatorship for six months, gave over the sixteenth day after he entered into it. About the same time the Consul Nautius fought valiantly with the Sabinus at Fretrum: who besides the walling of the fields, had an overthrow in fight. Fabius was let into Algidum, to proceed in the roome of Mamilius. In the end of the year, the Tribunes presented their law: but because the two armies were absent, the Senator prevailed so much, that no bills were propounded unto the people. The Commons likewise obtained, that they might create the self-same Tribunes, now the fifth time. The report goeth, that there were seen in the Capitol, wolves chased away by hounds: for which strange sight, the Capitol was purged. And these were the acts of that year. Then followed Consuls Q. Minucius & M. Horatius Pulvillus.

In the beginning of which year, whilst all was quiet abroad, the same Tribunes and the same law ended contention and feare on at home: which would have grown to a further mischief, if such had been brought, as it were of set purpose, that the legation at Corbio had arrived to the night by the Agrius and put to the sword: whereupon the Consul G called the Senate together: and order was given, that they should lead a Subitary army and to the same camp invade Algidum. Then was the line about the law laid aside clean, and away contention arose about the matters. But the Consuls with all their auctorities were overthrown by the heep and assistance of the Tribunes. At what time anew trouble and contention came, that a power of Sabinus were come down directly into the territories of Rome to fetch bodies and make spoil: and from thence advance against the city. Upon which hear, the Tribunes were content that fouldiers should be sent, yet not without this caveat and intendment: that for as much as they had now themselves three five years been ruled off and deluded, & that this proferorship of theirs stood the Commons in little stead, in regard of their small numbers, therefore, there should from thenceforth be ten created Tribunes of the Commonalty. The Nobles were to now driven and to such straits, that will they, will they, yield they must thereto: with this proviso, that they should never after Elect the same men Tribunes twice. And for fear that this act should after the war was once past turn to nothing, like as others had done before, they went in hand immediately to call a court for the Election of the Tribunes. So in the 36. year from the first Tribunes of the Commons chosen, there were ten created: out of every Classis, two. And by an act it was provided, that in such sort they should be created ever after. The multitudes then being taken and soldiers enrolled, Minutius went with a power against the Sabines, but found not the enemy. And Horatius, because the Equians after they had put the garison at Corbio to the sword, and won Horatiana besides, fought with them in Algidum. Many a man there he slew, and drove his enemies not only out of Algidum, but also out of Corbio and Horatiana. As for Corbio he utterly raised it, for betraying the garison there. After this, were M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius made Consuls. At quiet they were both at home and abroad. But great scarcity there was of corn, by reason of the untemperat and unreasonable rain that fell. A bill there was preferred, that the mount Aventine should be turned to Commons. And the same Tribunes were made again: who, all the year following, when T. Romulus and C. Veturius were Consuls, in all their Halls and assemblies, still published the law: saying, it was a shame, that their number was thus increased to no purpose, in case their affairs should lie dead in their two years, as they had done in the whole 5. years past. Whiles they were earnestly debating these things, fearful messengers came in from Tusculum, with news, that the Equians were in the territory of Tusculum. The in all haste of that nation would not suffer the Romans to defer their helping hand. Whereupon both Consuls were sent with an army, and met with the enemies in Algidum in their wonted haunt and accustomed place, where they encountered and struck a battell: in which were slain about 7000. enemies. The rest were put to flight. A huge booty there was gotten, which the Consuls sold out-right, by reason of the want of money in their common treasury. But this caused the soldiers to repine and grudge, and in the end ministered matter to the Tribunes, to accuse the Consuls unto the Commons. As soon therefore as they were out of their office, when Sp. Tarpeius and A. Eternus were Consuls, Romulus was arrested and put in suit by C. Claudius Cicerio, Tribune of the Commons. And Veturius was likewise troubled by L. Halerius an Edile, or L. Warden of the Commons, who were both the one and the other, to the great indignation of the Nobles. Romulus was fined at 10000 Asces. Veturius in 15000. But for all this hard hap and calamity that befell to those former Consuls, the new were never a jot more remissive and cool in the quarters: saying, Well may we also be calt and condemned, and both Commons and Tribunes never the nearer to compass and enact their law. Then the Tribunes giving over the law, which now by propounding only to oft, was waxen stale and old, began more gently to deal with the Senators, praying them to make an end once of all strife and contention. And in case that the laws of the Commons so disliked and displeased them, they requested them to suffer certain Law-makers to be created indifferently out of the Commonalty; as well as of the Nobility, who might devise such commodious & profitable, to both parts and of the equal liberty and freedom of all. As for the substance in itself of this motion, the Senators refused not: but they finally said, that none but of the Nobility should have the making of those laws. Seeing then they agreed thus about the laws, & differed only and quarrelled about the law-giver, there were Embassadors sent to Athens, Sp. Postumius Albinus, A. Manlius, and P. Sulpicius Camerinus: who were commanded to exemplify and copy out the famous and worthy laws of Solon: to search out and learn the ordinances, customs, and rites of other Cities in Greece. For any outward wars, this year was quiet, and the year following more quiet, when P. Crassius, and Sext. Quinctilius were Consuls, by reason of the continual silence of the Tribunes: which as the expectation of the Embassadors that were gone to Athens, and of strange and human laws, first and principally procured: to two mighty great calamities that rofe both at once, to wit, famine and pestilence, noisome and loathsome both to man and beast, afterwards continued. By means whereof, the fields lay waste and desolate, the city dispeopled with continual burials: many right worshipful and honourable houses thereby mourned. Sergius Cornelius, the Flamin of Quirinus dyed thereof. C. Horatius Pulvillus the Augur went off likewise: in whose room the Augurs (his Associates) chose C. Veturius: and the rather, because he had been condemned by the people. Quinctilius the Consul departed also this life, and four Tribunes of the Commons, so that this was a year, with manifold losses and calamities sorely distressed. But for enemies all was quiet. After this were C. Menenius, and P. Sestius Capitolinus made Consuls. In which year likewise returned with the Athenian laws. And therefore the Tribunes were so much the more exact and urgent, that once at length they would set on, to deliberate and put down those laws. And agreed it was, that there should be created Decemvirs above all appeal: & for the year ensuing that should order Officers and Magistrats in place. Now, whether any of them might be of the Commons or no, that was a question: and hereupon some debate and controversy continued for a good while. At the last, the Nobles went away with this, that the preeminence, upon this condition, that neither the law Leius, concerning the Aventine mount, nor other sacred laws should be repealed. Thus in the 30. year after that Rome was built, was the form of the new government changed the second time, and to the Consuls from the Decemvirs, was the sovereign rule transferred, like as before, from the kings to the Consuls. Ten Magistrats

instituted by the commons
in the 30. year after the foundation of Rome.

- A This change was lesse notable, in that it long continued not. The beginning of this Magistracie was fair and goodly to see to, but grew too rank, and exceeded in overmuch licentiousness. The sooner therefore it faded and fell away, and the former government was taken up again, and both the name and jurisdiction of Consuls returned, and was conserced upon again. The Decemvirs created were these: Ap. Claudius, T. Genucius, P. Sestius, L. Veturius, C. Julius, A. Manlius, P. Sulpicius, P. Crassius, T. Romulus, Sp. Postumius, C. Claudius and Genucius, because they had been Consuls elect for that year, had this dignity bestowed upon them in lieu of the other. And Sestius one of the Consuls the year before, because he had preferred this matter unto the Senators, against his fellow Consuls will. Next to these were chosen the three Embassadors that went to Athens, both for that they should be rewarded with this honourable dignity, for their embassy into so far & remote a country, & also because men were persuaded that by reason of their insight and skill in foreign ordinances of strange nations, they might be well employed in setting down, and making of new; The rest made up the number. They say, that in the last licentiousness and licentiousness at this Election, choice was made of those that were more aged, and farther spent in years, to the end they might not so fiercely and stoutly gain say and crosse the opinions and constitutions of the other. In this new state of government, Appius was the man that bare the greatest broke, he ruled the royl and swayed all the rest, so highly stood he in grace and favour with the people. He had altered his nature, and became such a new man, that all on a sudden, of a cruel and terrible persecutor of the Commons, he proved a very Publicola, and courier of the Commonalty, and one that lay for to get every gale of popular love and favour that might be had. Every one far his tenth day in place of judgement, and ministered justice in their severall turnes unto the people. On which day, the twelve knights of Equos were chosen by the Licitors before the sovereign judge: as for his nine brethren, they had each of them one fellow to give a sentence. In this agreement among themselves, which secured otherwhiles when they were private persons, had been hurtful unto them, redressed only and wholly the greatest equity towards others. A proof and argument of this their moderation, it shall be sufficient to observe now in the example and instance of one only matter: for whereas they were created absolute, and put all appeal, it turned, that in the house of P. Sestius, a Nobleman, there was a dead body found buried, and brought forth openly into the publicke assembly of the people. The thing being no lesse apparent in view, than heinous and horrible in fact, C. Julius a Decemvir, brought Sestius in question therefore, put him in suit to answer at a certain day, and became plaintiff unto the people, and accus'd that delinquent, whose competent judge he was by order of law. And so he yielded of his own right, adding to much to the freedom of the people, as was taken from the power of his own jurisdiction and government. When as now both high and low gave out, that this authority was found and uncovered, & far as it was set for to rise, and went about the making and giving of laws, and with great exactionment of men, they set out Tables, and calld the people to a general assembly, commanding them in a good hour, and in the name of God to go & that which might turn to the good of the bench, and happiness of the Commonwealth, themselves their children & posterity to read the law there published: protesting that so far as ten men could with all their wisdom foresee & provide for had devised indifferent laws, and equal for all sorts of callings, as well the best as the meanest. But for as much as the wits and heads of many men, were of deeper reach to see farther into things, they gave them good leave to call in their minds, and ponder with themselves each particular year, and to reason together from point to point, and thereof to deliver their opinion openly, what was short and wanting, or what was superfluous, in every article, and look what laws the content of all men seemed to bring in doubt should the people accept and none other, that it might appear they were not so much to approve of them and give their assent after they were proposed, as to propose and prefer them to their own views. And when as they were thus far industriously corrected, according to the speeches of men, and as every one spake to the severall titles and chapters of the laws, as they were set forth: then in the high court of Parliament, assembled of all the Consuls & degrees of men, the names of ten Tables were named and established. Which even at this day, among that infinite number of Statutes, heaped and huddled one upon another, are the very well-spring and fountain of all justice both publick and private. After this, there ran a rumour abroad, that two tables were yet wanting, which if they were put unto the rest, they might the complete body of what were of the whole Roman law be finished and made perfect. The expectation thereof, now that the great task was almost at an end for the Election, made men very desirous to create Decemvirs again the second time. Now the Commons abroad, besides that they hated the very name of Consuls, as well as of Kings, thought not greatly for the protection of the first ones, seeing that the Decemvirs one after another, yielded in their prerogative, and admitted in some sort the appeal.
- B But after that the means allyably for the choosing of Decemvirs, was abolished against the first dignity, yet more than the very children, and principally by reason of the City (so scarce, & therefore, left the possibility of to great a government, in case they were not well settled themselves in the place, to make one unto some unmet and unworthy persons, even as our and made out to every man in noble manner to those very commons, with whom they had been at strife & variance, for that honour and dignity, which they themselves had with all their power and might impugned. through such offices, being now come in question, and submitted to the choice and judgement of others, pricked on Ap. Claudius, and let him forwards. So as a man could hardly know whether to reckon him among the Decemvirs, or those that stood by the Decemvirs again. For otherwhiles he was more like one that sued for an office, than him that presently bare office: blaming persons of best quality in the City, and laying hard to their charge; but extolling the vainest & basest of the Competitors. Himself in person sorting among the Dulj and Lej, and such like as favoured the Tribunes, went swarming and squaring in the common place, using them as instruments to vendicate himself to the common people. So long, as at length his very brethren in office, who until that time had been regularly addicted and affectionated unto him, cast their eyes upon him, and began to mark, & marvel much what his meaning was reasoning thus among themselves: I Surely there is no soundness nor goodness herein, but all meer dissimulation and hypocrite. Certainly, it is not for nought, that in such pride of his, there should appear so much courtesy. What? to force his own nature too much within compass: to debate himself, and suffer privily what to be his fellows, was a signe of one, that made not too much haste to forgo a dignity and promotion, as sought means to keep it still. Openly they durst not presume to check and withstand his ambitious desire, but assayed by pleasing and soothing him up, to repress and bridle his foolish affection. And seeing he was the younger of his company, they all with one accord laid upon him the charge, to hold the high court for the Election of Decemvirs. Their drift and policy was, that he should not Elect his own self a thing, which unless it were the Tribunes again, and that was a most dangerous precedent and example) no man ever had done before. And he with all his heart accepting thereof, made profession that he would be president of that honourable Court and Session, and prayed to the gods that he might perform it for the benefit of the well-publick. And to took the vantage of that opportunity, to let forward his own design, which they meant should have stopped and crossed the same. And after he had by secret packing and consaving with the other competitors, and given the repulse unto the two Quintus Caputinus, and Cincinatus (and put beside the Cushion his own Uncle by the fathers side (C. Claudius, a most stout & resolute champion of the Nobility) with other citizens of like mark and quality: he cleaveth Decemvirs, such as were not for worth, port, and behaviour, to them comparable and his own sweet self with the first. Which as there was no man thought the ever would have done, to all good men misliked when it was done. With him were elected M. Cornelius Maluginensis, M. Sergius, L. Minucius, Q. Fabius Pictor, Q. Postumius, T. Antonius Merenda, C. Duilius, S. P. Oppius Cornicen, M. Rabellius. And there's an end of Appius playing another mans part. Off went his mask and visage now, and so from thenceforth, he began to shew himself in his own likeness, and to live in his kind: yes, and to frame his companions to the bent of his bow, even before they were entered into office. Day by day had they their secret meetings by themselves apart from all other: and being once hereby furnished with ingratiations and proud designments, which they had closely compassed together, they could no longer hold & dissemble their pride. Few might have access unto them: seldom would they be spoken with, shewing themselves strange, surly, & churlish to those that came unto them. Thus drew they the time on, unto the 15. day of May, which was the usual and iolemn day then of entering into offices of government. In the very beginning whereof they made the first day of their magistracie noted by an intimation and evident shew of exceeding terror. For whereas the Decemvirs their predecessors had observed this order, That one alone should have the rods of State born before him, and that this regal ornaments should passe round through them all in course one after another: Behold, there came all of them abroad, and each of them had his xij. bundles of rods carried before him. So that these Lictors, 120 in number, with their rods and axes too, falned within the way: they were created solitaires, or their commission ran without all appeal, and thus was there a shew & representation of ten K.K. And this terror grew more and more, not with the meanness and baseness of the Patricians: supposing that they fought to pick a quarrell, and minister occasion and overture to some massacre: that if any man should offer either in the Senate or among the people to speak one word concerning liberty, forthwith there should be no remedy and incour to be had, by reason that the appeal unto them was quite disannulled and taken away: the Decemvirs themselves drew to all in one line together and were so combined and linked, that there was no hope at all, that one would thwart and cross that which another did: whereas the former Decemvirs could well abide, that their judgements and sentences should be confuted and corrected, by the appella lions or appeal to one of their brethren in commission: yes, and in some cases put off some matters from themselves to be decided by the people, which seemed properly to belong unto their own jurisdiction. For a while, the fear was to all indifferent: but by little and little the Commons only began to feel the smart. The Nobles were forborn and escaped clear and leaveth: the meaner persons went to the walls, and with them they dealt according to their lust and pleasure right cruelly. The person wholly they regarded, and never respected the cause, as with whom favour and friendship prevailed as much as equity and right should have done. At home in their houses, they determined of matters how they should pass: and in open place they pronounced sentence accordingly. If a man had appealed to one of their bench, from him unto unto

A into whom he fled for relief, he went his waies again by weeping crosses, repenting that he stood not to the order and injunction awarded by the former. It was thought and spoken also abroad, but the first author would not be known. That they had conspired together, not for the present time only to do wrong and injurie, but also were confederate between themselves privily, and had bound it with an oath, to call no assembly at all for the electing of new magistrates: but being now once involved in the towne sign, to hold the possition of the Decemvirs for ever. The Commons then began to look about them, to behold and advise well the counterances of the Nobles, to see if they could from them catch some good sale of wind, some hope again of liberty, at whole hands they bearing bondage, had brought the common weale to this desperate. B The L.L. of the Senat hated the Decemvirs, they hated also the Commons. They liked not of things as they went, and yet were periwaded that the Commons were well enough favored, and deserved no better: who gaping greedily after liberty were now fallen and plunged into servitude and thralldome. Help they would not with the least of their fingers, but rather heap more wrongs upon them: that having a wearisome and tedious loathing of the present state, they might fall to a longing desire after two Contuls, and with the old would were come again. By this time now was the better part of the year gone and past: and the two tables of laws were annexed to the other ten of the former year: which if they might be once affirmed and ratified by a Parliament of the Centuries, they retained nothing behind, for which the common weale should need their magistrates: but expected it was certainly, that the assembly for Election of Contuls should come of hand be published and proclaimed. Marry, there was one thing hammered to the Commons heads, by what means they might revive again the Tribunes authority: the very grand linkwork of their freedom, and the thing that now had discomfited and benighted. But all this while there was not a word of the new Election. And the Decemvirs, who at the full presented usually unto the Commons fight, a crew of those that favoured the Tribunes, to attend upon their persons (a thing right plausible and pleasing unto the people) were galled now, with certain tall positions of their Nobility: whole troops of them stood out their Tribunal seats and places of judgement. There made havoc and spoil of the Commons and their goods: and so to what the mind of a mighty man should unto and lusted after, was his hap to have it whatsoever. Nay, there was no spare now made of their backs and sides: some were scourged with rods, some lost their heads by the ax. And because this cruelty should not go unwarded, lightly there was none executed, if he were worth any thing, but his goods went after and were begged or given away. The youth of the Nobility, by this kind of hire well belted: not only spoiled not themselves to withstand these wrongful dealings & hard confusions, but carried it before them, openly protesting & avowing that they wished rather their own licentiousness, than the liberty of all. Thus of May were now come about, and no new magistrates elected in the other toome. Forth came the Decemvirs, (who to say a truth and to give them their right, were no other than private persons, not their with minds abated for the exercising of their imperious rule, nor with fewer regal confusions to set out and shew their honour & dignity. When the people saw that they made no other reckoning but this was plain usurping of the kings government, and no better: And now farwel freedom for ever and a day. For neither had they presently, or hereafter were they like to have any more to recover it again. So that now, not they only lost their hearts and were discouraged in themselves, but also grew to be contemptible in the eyes of their neighbour nations who esteemed lightly, that they should have sovereignty of rule who were not free themselves, nor enjoy their own liberty. For the Sabines with a strong power invaded the Territories of Rome: and when they had foraged far and near, and driven away the flocks both of people and of cattle, with out imp-achment, they gather their army together again, that had hanged here and there up and down, and entered into Eretum, where they encamp themselves, laying this for a promise, and building their hope upon their discord at Rome, that it would stay their murthering. Not only the news that came hereof, but the flying of the country peasants, put the whole city to great fear. F The Decemvirs fall to consulting what were best to do, And whilst they were to seek what to do to disengage between the hands of the Nobles and the Commons utterly forlorn and distressed, they had also another fearful trouble in the tail of the tomes. The Achaians from an other side were encamped in Argilus. And from Tifetum Embassadors brought this news, that their country was vexed with excurions from the thence, whereupon they desired their help and aid. These fearful occasions so troubled and perplexed the Decemvirs, that considering the city was now beset at once with wars from two places, their itemacks were come down to consult with the Senat. They came indeed therefore the Senators to be summoned, to the Curia. And with they went, with a great ire and storm of anger, displeasure and blame was towards them, much that they would smother them. As to their charge, how they were the only cause both of their country walled already, and G of the pains they presently to endure: looking for no other, but that there would be given an attempt at this end path, to abolish utterly their government, and which they stuck closely together to, and by extending their authority fluxily upon some few of the itonally, quail and crush the attempts of others. After the voice of the Bell was heard in the Forum or common place, citing the Senators to repair into the Comitiasthose to the Decemvirs thenoverly and arrogantly: then they had laid down for a long time the manner of calling them to Comitiasthose) caused the Commons to marvel and mune what was betwixt them, that they should after such discontinuance, take up a thing so odious and out of use. And thus they conceived oft,

They could not be so bold as to do so much.

They could not be so bold as to do so much.

speech to App.
Clandius.*

Appius had passed an order and decree already, and put Leilius back: who cried out aloud, (for so it manifest and horrible a wrong had been enough to have moved a very Saint, and set on fire a right mild natured person.) "Nay, Appius (quoth he) thou hadst more need to let me back with thee, for 'tis of arms, if thou wouldst go clear away, and not be spoken to, for that which, thou wouldst do in hither mucker. This maid, I tell thee, I mean that go with me: I purpose to have her to my self, an honest and pure virgin, and enjoy her lawfull marriage, as my wedded wife: call therefore unto thee all the Licitors besides (thou were best) that belong unto thy company: once: caule both rods and axes to be made ready: I tell thee, Leilius his eponied wife, shall not abide in any place without her fathers house. What? although ye have taken from the Commons of Rome the Tribuns assistance and protection and the privilege of Appeal, yet principal I bulwarks of defence of their liberty: ye are not therefore allowed to rule and tyrannize, and to fulfill your lust upon our children and wives too. Exercise your rigour and cruelty and spare not, upon our backs and sides in scourging us, yea, upon our necks and heads also, in striking them from our shoulders: so ye forbear to assault our chastity and honesty. Whereunto, if any violence shall be offered, I will for my part, call for the help of the Quirites here present, in the behalf of my spouse: and Virginius for himself will call to the soldiers, in regard of his only daughter: we will try for help of God and man: and call it shall our lives before thou go away with this decree, and put it in execution. I require and charge thee, O Appius therefore, to be well advised, and look how far thou dost proceed. Let Virginius when he is come, let to his daughter, how he dealeth about her: and let him know thus much for certain, that if he give place to this plaintiffs assertion, and forgo the present possession of her, he shall go free his estate and propriety that he hath in his daughter. As for me, in this quarrel of maintaining the freedom of my spouse, I will lose my life, before I fail in my faithful promise to her made. Hereat the whole multitude was moved, and like it was, that some mutiny and fray would presently have ensued. For the Licitors had hemmed in Leilius on every side. Howbeit they proceeded no farther then to big words and high threats: whiles Appius laid hard to Leilius, "That he did not thus to much in the behalf and defence of Virginius, as, (being himself an unruly person and even already breathing forth a Tribuns spirit) sought means, and picked occasion of an uproar and sedition. Howbeit for his part he would not that day minister unto him any matter thereof, And that he might now well know, that he did not this to feed his malapert fancie, but in regard of the absence of Virginius, and for the name of a father, and the tender respect of freedom, he would not that day fit to hear and determine the matter, nor award a definitive judgment in that case: but would request Marcus Clandius, to suspend his action, and to forbear and yield to much of his own right, as to suffer the maid to be bailed and go under sureties, and to be at her liberty until the next day. But in case her father appeared not in Court the morrow after, he gave Leilius, and such as he was, to wit and understand, that neither the law should want the patronage of the maker, nor the Decemvir fail in courage and resolution: neither would he call together his fellow officers and sergeants, for to keep under such seditious and turbulent spirits as he was: but would content himself with his own Licitors, and do well enough. The time now of effecting this injury, being thus deferred, and the maids Advocates gone aside, they agreed first of all upon this point, that a brother of Leilius, and a son of Numerius, two lusty and nimble young men, should be dispatched straight from thence to the gate: and that with all speed possible Virginius should be sent for home from the camp: for that it stood the maid upon as much as her whole estate and life was worth: that he would be present and ready in due time the day following, to preserve her from this hard course, and wrongful proceeding. According as they were bidden, they set forward, and spared no horseflesh, until they brought tidings hereof to her father. All this while the plaintiff that made challenge to the maid, was very impatient with Leilius to bail her, and put in sureties. And he again made answer, That he went about it as fast as he could, and did nothing else: but indeed trilling out the time on purpose; until the messengers that were sent to the camp were got afore wel onward on their way. Then the whole multitude on all sides held up their hands, in token that they offered themselves every one unto Leilius, ready to become bound. Whereupon, he burst out into tears for tender heart. Gramercy (quoth he) my masters ill, to morrow I will use your helping hand: for this time I am sped of sureties enough. So was Virginius set at liberty, and bailed by the suretyship of her kinsfolk. Then Appius, after he had stayed a while, because he would not seem to have fat for that matter alone, when he saw all other suits and canes omitted, in regard they had to it, and no man coming to him for justice, he arose, got him home to his house, and wrote unto his brethren De envoirs into the camp, that they should not give Virginius his passport, but keep him fast in durance, and in ward. This wicked practice (as God would have it) came short. For Virginius already had got his discharge, and was departed forward on his journey, in the evening by the setting of the first watch. And very early in the morning came the letters for to fray him, but all in vain. For Virginius by break of day was arrived: by which time the whole City resorted into the common place, standing and waiting earnestly for his coming. And thither he himself being in soiled and simple array brought his dearest in her old worn cloaths, accompanied with certain Wives, and a great number of Adversaries and friends. Then and there began he to go from one man to another, and to labour them hard: and not only besought their assistance by way of intreaty and prayer, but also required it as due and delivered: saying, that he stood daily in field ready to fight in defence of their wives

A wives and children: neither could there be reported of any man more hardy efforts and valiant pieces of service in war, then of him self. But which brother or sister all this (quoth he) to have the City from enemies, in case our children be forced to abide the utmost extremities, that befall unto Cities taken by the enemies? thus went he about preaching, as it were from one man to another. Likewise Leilius cast forth and rebuked like pieces of justice, and spared not. But the train of women, with their still and silent weeping, moved men more then any words uttered. All this notwithstanding, Appius in his obstinate mind (so disquieted was he and wholly possessed with a horrible spirit of humorous madnes rather then of honourous passion) that ended up into the trait' un. Where, as the plaintiff first of himself was railing some of their complaint, that by reason of partial favour and making of great friends, he could not have law and justice: the day past, before that either he had made an end of his demand, or given leave to Virginius for to put in his answer accordingly: Appius interrupted the speech, and began himself. What preamble it was that he made before his decree, peradventure some ancient writers have for truth recorded. But for as much as I cannot any where find, in so shameful a decree, that will be carried but a shadow and foundered like a truth: therefore, that only which is of all agreed upon, I thought best to see down, even the sentence barely without any preface at all: namely, That he judged by the half of the Plaintiffs to be his bond-servant. First, all men there, wondered at this unworthy and foul act: and being then taken therewith attuned, for a good while after, stood still and held their peace. But afterward, when as Marcus Clandius went to lay hand on the maid, among the dames that stood about her, and was received with a piteous lamentation, and cry of the women: Then Virginius, beckning with his hands and shaking them at Appius: To Leilius (quoth he) have I betrothed my daughter, and not to thee O Appius: brought her up I have to love and cherish: and shall wedlock is not for uncleanness and filthy whordom: to be a wile another day, and not an harlot. Is this the manner of it, like brute and wild beasts without all regard, to leap and run upon you, are not whom and to fill your fleshly lust? How in that that before will suffer such pranks, I know not: but they that are in camp with sword in hand, I hope, will never put them up. Now when as he that, challenged the maid was by a knot of Women and Advocates that stood about her repelled back, then proclaimed the Bed and commanded silence. And the Decemvir having his head intoxicated, and altogether carried away with unbridled lust, brack forth and said, That he had certain intelligence and was informed of a truth, by manifest and abused evidences (and not induced and led thereto by the reviling taunts of Leilius yesterday) and the violent proceedings of Virginius, whereof he had the people of some to bear witness, and which might give some light and preimptions. That the night past, there were meetings and commotions in the City, and all to raise a mutiny and insurrection: and therefore he being ignorant of such a broil and riot toward, was come down into the common place with a guard of armed men: not minding to hurt any one that would keep the peace, but only by virtue of the necessity of government and authority, to repress his troubled the peace-fick state of the City: therefore it were best for them to be still and quiet. So Sergeant (quoth he) cause the people to avoid the place, and make room for the matter to be by hand upon his bond-servant: for what shall I do but these words full of ire and wrath, the multitude of themselves gave back and made way to the poor wily, wench to hold all to order and let as a prey to their impurities, shut his. Then Virginius seeing all past help and no other remedy: Well Appius (quoth he) pardon me, if I do catch thee in upon a fatherly affection and love of heart: I have let tell some of my friends and kinsmen against thee more then was becoming: Then give me leave here before the judges to enquire or hear more the truth of this matter: that if I have fathered her untruly, I may go hence better pleased and satisfied in my mind. Leave being granted, he led his daughter and the wile apart from the rest, near to the Church of Veius Cloacina, hard at the shops, called at this day Veius Cloacina, i.e. the new shops or standings: and there having caught a knife from about her, he spake: My sweet daughter, no other means have I but this only to let thee free, and to be true to the damsel to the heart: and looking presently to the judgement seat. Here with the blood of his own blood he cut the throat of the Devil. Appius with the cry that proceeded so horrible a fact, being much troubled, commanded Virginius to be apprehended: that he with some of his men, made way where he went, until with a number that followed him came to be in his company, he recovered the gate. Titus and Numitorius took up the bloodied corps and held it aloft to the people, blaming, and cursing the wickedness of Appius: pitying the misdeed and untimely cut of the damsel: and bewailing the hard exigent and extremity of the father. The Mothers followed after and cried: Is this the condition and fortune allotted unto parents for getting and bearing children? Is this the hire and reward of chastity and virginity: with other like speeches which in such a case, women in their great disdain me to utter: while to morrow as it is common to see, proceeding from weak and tender hearts, to it yield and afterwards in some pitiful and lamentable words, as they make their plaints and dolours, as moans. But the men and Leilius above the rest had no other talk but of the Tribunes authority, and the appeal unto the bos of the people, how they were taken away from them, and of other public kindred and common discontent. The whole multitude partly upon the humours of this wicked act, and partly upon hope by this occasion to recover again their liberties, we all up on a man and upon a man, while commanded Leilius to be called, another while for his disobedience, and some more to be attached and converted before him. At the length, seeing no way made unto the Apollos, he and none to be seen in the public place, besides a few of aged men: and when the Senators were called into the Senate house, the common place appeared empty, naked and forlorn: then there were more besides Horatius and Valerius that cried out and said, What look you for fill my LL of the Council? What? and if the Decemvirs will make no end of their perverseness for wardens, will ye let things run at six and seven, until all come tumbling down, or be of a light fire? And what goodly dominion is this, that you embrace to in your arms, that you clip and hold too fast? Will ye minister justice and give laws to empty houses and bare walls? Are ye not ashamed and ashamed, that there should be seen in the Place, a greater number well near of your Lictors, and officers, then of governed Citizens, and of all other men whatsoever? How and if the enemies should come against the City, what would ye do? Nay, what if shortly the Commons should march in arms, seeing we weigh their infurrection and departure too lightly? Will ye, together with the ruin and downfall of the City and your rule, and not afore? Well, to be plain, ye must either have no Commons at all, or else allow them to have their Tribuns again: there is no mean, there is no other remedy. Sooner shall we want our Magistrates of the Nobility, than they will be without their Patrons and Officers of the Commonalty. They wroing and wretted from our torchbearers that power and authority fire new, and whereof they had as then, no proof and experience: how think ye then, that having tasted now the fierceness of it, they will endure the want thereof? especially seeing, that we our own selves are not of so temperate carriage in our government and command over them, but that they have need of some place of court and relief. And when these and such like reasons were on all hands, often alleged and laid abroad, the Decemvirs overweighed with the general content and unity of the house, promised: That seeing it was so thought good, they would be wholly ordered and ruled by the Senators. This only they besought at their hands, and admonished them of, by way of a proviso, that they would take order for the safety and security of their persons: and not by shedding their blood, to flesh the Commons, and to train them up, and acquaint them with exercising cruelty upon the Nobles and Senators. Then were Valerius and Horatius lent with commission to reclaim and call home the Commons, upon such conditions and capitulations, as they should think convenient: yea, and to let all things ingoed order and make a final composition, with a special charge to provide for the safeguard of the Decemvirs, against the raging ire and violence of the multitude. These mediators took their journey, and were received into the camp with exceeding joy of the Commons, as being doubters, their very favours and redemptions, approved both in the beginning of their troubles, and now also at the very end and upshot of all. In regard whereof, they were welcomed with thanksgiving, Julius was the mouth of the multitude and their prolocutor. Who when they came to debate and reason about the articles of covenants, and that the Delegates and Committees, required of the Commons, What the demands and points were that they stood upon? Being already provided beforehand of purpose what to say, demanded such conditions, as it was well seen, that they repelled more hope, and relied themselves rather in equity, and indifference, than in force of arms. For they require, Imprimis, to have the Tribuns power on foot again, and the appealing unto the people revived: which before the creation of the Decemvirs had been the only help and succour of the Commons. Item, that no man should be called in question, nor any way touched in line limb, or goods for gathering the soldiers of Commons together by way of commotion, for recovering again their liberties and franchises. Only, their demand concerning the punishment to be inflicted upon the Decemvirs, favoured of cruelty. For they deemed it meet and reason, that they should be yielded into their hands, and then they threatened to burn them quick with fire. To these Articles the Committees spake in this wise, As for those capitulations, which upon counsel and deliberate advice ye have articulated, they are so reasonable and indifferent, that without your fault, they ought to have been offered unto you frankly and freely: for ye request to enjoy such things as concern the defence of your liberty and freedom, and maintain not your liberties, to the offence and hurt of others, but as to your ire and wrath, it is to be pardoned, rather than to be followed and yielded unto: as who, under colour of N hatred and detestation of cruelty, run headlong into cruelty, and before, in a manner, that ye let free your selves, ye will be Rulers and Lords over your Adversaries. Alas the while, and will our City never be at rest, and cease from punishing: but that either the Nobles will scourge the Commons of Rome, or the Commons whip the Nobles? As for you ye had more need of a shield than a sword. Humbled he is enough and too much, he humbled, who lived in a City on every hand, and equal with others, under the same laws, neither doing nor taking wrong. And if ever at any time you mean to shew your selves dread and to be feared, when you have once received your Magistrates and Ordinances again, when ye have the law in your own hands, to censure and judge according to your own discretion, then may ye give your doom of our lives and goods, as each can require. Now for this time it sufficeth, that ye claim and have your freedom again. Hereupon they all submitted themselves to the deputed Delegates, permitting them to do what they would. Who seeing they had brought all matters to good a conclusion, promised to return with all speed. So they took their leave. And when they had declared to the Senators the demands of the Commons, all the rest of the Decemvirs, perceiving no mention at all made of their punishment (a thing more than they looked or hoped for) deemed no one point thereof, but Appius, a man of a fell and cruel nature, and who above all the other was most odious, lay open to the malice of the people, and measuring the hatred of others toward himself,

The demands of the Commons in mount Sacer.

The answer of Valerius and Horatius to the Commons.

A self, by his own spleen that he bare against other men: "I wot well (quoth he) what it became will betwix me shortly: and I see plainly, that our adversaries hold out to wrangle and contend with us no longer than until they have weapons given in their hands. To falsify this their make and hatred, we must part with our blood: nothing else will content them, for mine own part to renounce my Decemvirship I weigh not: neither pass I how soon I do it. Then was an Act made by the Senat, that the Decemvirs out of hand should surrender their place: and that Quintus the Arch-Bishop or High Priest, should create Tribuns of the Commons: provided always expressly, that the mutiny of the soldiers, and infurrection of the Commons should find no man to discipline and harm. These Acts being passed, and the Com. Election, the Decemvirs came abroad into the open place of assemblies, and there to the exceeding joy of all men, they resigned up all their power and authority. Tidings hereof were aried to the common, by the mediators abroad: and look what people forever remained behind in the City, went now forth to accompany them. As this multitude passed along forward they were encountered upon the way with another joyful company from out of the camp. Who rejoiced mutually one in the behalf of the other, that both freedom and concord were restored to the City again. Then the mediators in the general assembly of them all spake and said: "To the great good, happiness and felicity of you and of the C. W. be it spoken, Return in Gods name into your own country, to your houses, wives and children: but see that as ye have demeaned your selves modestly in your way hither, hurting and spoiling no mans lands and possessions, notwithstanding the many ye were driven into: of to many things: so ye carry the same moderation and stay of your selves hencward into the City. Go into the Aventum from whence ye came: and there for good luck take, where ye laid the first foundation & ground-work of your liberty: create ye that your Tribuns of the commons, There, will the high Priest be ready and give attendance, to call an assembly for the grand Election. Great was the accord, alacrity and cheerfulness, that they shewed in approving all that was propounded. So from thence they turn their standards and ensigns, and as they moved to Rome, they strove with all they met on the way, who could then most joy and gladness: they pass on through the City armed as they were, yet peaceably and without noise, until they came into the Aventum. Where the chief Priest immediately held the Comices, in which they created for Tribuns of the C. first and foremost L. Virginius, next after him, L. Julius, and P. Numerius. The latter by the mothers side of Virginius: all authors of their inurrection and depuration: that C. Sicinius descended from him in right line who was the first Trib. of Comiti, created in manner Sicinius (as we find in records) and M. Duilius, who before the chiding of Decemvirs, had right worthily and notably born the Tribuneship, and in all combats and commotions with the Decemvirs, stuck close to the Commonalty and never failed them. After these were elected, moreover hope then any former deler, M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, Ap. Julius, C. Oppius. Then C. Julius immediately in the very entrance into the Tribuneship, presented a bill unto the Commons, and the Commons enacted it. That the depuration and inurrection of the common people against the Decemvirs, should not be laid to any mans charge, nor bring him into trouble. Then a wisdom farther delay M. Duilius went through with an act of his own to wit, That there, then the Comices created, with relevation of liberty to appeal unto the people. All the thing, passed in the Comices of Commons, assembled in the meadows named Flaminia, which now they call Forum Flaminium.

Then, by an Inter-regent were Consuls created, L. Valerius and M. Horatius, who presently began their government. Whole popular Consulship, as it was without wrong doing to the Senators and Nobles, so it was without offence committed of their part: For what ever was provided for the liberties of the Commons, they supposed it abolished somewhat of their power and authority. And first and foremost, whereas it was a question and controversy, well cleared in law, Whether the Nobles were bound to stand to the Acts of the Commons: they made a law now in a general Session by the suffrages of the Centuries. That what ordinance the Commons (being parted by Tribes) had by their voices granted, it should compute and bind the whole body of the people. By which law, the Tribunes acts were armed with a most sharp and keen weapon to strike withal. Moreover, The other Conular law concerning Appius, the on y fort and strength of liberty (which by the Decemvirs absolute power had been so wronged, they not only revive again, but also fortify the same for the time to come, by making a new law, forbidding expressly that no man should create any magistrate, abolish any without the liberty of appealing: and whosoever should create any such, he might rightfully and lawfully be killed, and that murder should not be counted a capital crime. And when they had industrially strengthened the Commons on the one side with the benefit of appealing, and on the other side with the Tribunes power in favour of the Tribunes themselves, that they might seem to be comforted and insolated: they then now almost grown out of remembrance, they renewed that high privilege, with certain solemn ceremonies which having been of long time laid aside & neglected, were now brought up again and put in use. And they ordained them to be inviolate as well in a reversion of religion and a ripple of confidence as also by a special law in that behalf provided: namely, that whosoever hurt either Tribuns of the Commons: Adversaries Judges or Decemvirs, should be cursed and decreed to Interitus and his family sold in port to be at the Church of Ceres & Liber. By virtue of this Act, the great Expositors of the law deny that any man is a saint or inviolable: but (say they) it is enacted only, That whosoever hurt any of them, shall be accursed.

Decemvirs resign up their government.

Tribuns of the Commons created again. A general assembly for election of Magistrates.

Consuls elected.

The day of the consulship.

And therefore an Edile may be attached and led away to prison by superior Magistrates, Which if although it be not warranted by law (for he is hurt, who by this law ought not to be hurt) yet it is a good argument to prove, that an Edile is not inviolable. Marry, as for the Tribunes, they were indeed by virtue of an ancient oath of the Commons, at what time as they first created that power and authority inviolable: as they would seem to expound and make construction of the law. Other: have been that this ought to interpret the law. That in this last Act of Horatius, the Consuls also, and Pretors too, (because they are created by the same aspici or bird-signs that the Consuls be,) were comprised, and had the benefit thereof. For a Consul is called by the name of a Judge, but that exposition is confused, for that in those days it was not the manner to commit the Consul a Judge, but the Pretor only. And thus much concerning the Consular Laws. I

The time Consuls also brought up this order and custom, that all the Acts of the Senat should be brought into the Church of Ceres, and presented unto the Ediles of the Commons: which aforcetime were suppressed and smothered, yea, and corrupted or perverted at the will and pleasure of the Consuls. After all this, M. Duilius a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the Commons a Law, and they let it pass and granted it, That whatsoever should leave the Commons destitute of their Tribunes, or create any Magistrate without Appeal, should be scourged, and lose his head for it. All these Acts, as they passed against the wills and minds of the Nobles: to they went clean without their contradiction: for that, all this while hitherto, there was no rigour and severity that seemed to extend and reach to any one particular person among them, But afterwards, when as both the Tribunes power, and also the Commons freedom, were once well and surely grounded: Then the Tribunes, supposing now it was full time, that they might safely and without peril give the oneperson upon them, severally one by one, made choice of Virginius to be the first accuser or plaintiff; and Appius Claudius the first defendant. And Virginius had not long been arrested Appius to answer at a day, and Appius come down into the Common place, guarded with a company of tall young gentlemen of the Nobility: but presently upon the sight of him and his guard about him, the remembrance of that most cruel and detestable tyranny was refreshed and renewed. Then Virginius: "Speeches (quoth he) and Orations were devised for doubtful

"causes: and therefore will I neither spend time in accusing him before you, from whose cruelty ye have by force of arms delivered your selves: nor suffer this wretch, over and besides his other wicked pranks, to shew in the defence of himself his audacious impudence. Therefore, as touching all other lawful parts of thine and wicked designments, O Appius, which thou hast for these two years ungraciously and impudently enterprized and practised one on the neck of another, I will do thee some favour, and pardon thee: but for one crime only, unless thou canst acquit thy selfe the better, namely, that thou being the Judge, against all order of Law, didst not grant unto the party defendant, the benefit of liberty to go at large, during the time of the suit depending, until she might bring proofs of her freedom: for this, I say, I command thee to prison. Now had Appius no hope at all, either in the Tribunes helping hand, or in the doom and judgement of the people. Howbeit he both called upon the Tribunes for succour: and also seeing himself tugged and baled away by the officer, and no man to stay his hand: I appeal (quoth he) unto the people. This one word in maintenance of freedom being heard to come out of that mouth, that lately had given sentence on his side that impeached the freedom of one, and challenged the party for bonds, caused silence. And when every man to himself secretly muttered in this wise: "How well (when all is done) there are Gods in Heaven, and such Gods as neglect not the affairs of mortall men, Pride and cruelty (although it be long first) at length will surely have a fall, and thoroughly be punished. Lo, how he is now faine to appeal, who aforcetime abolished and took away all appeal: he humbly craveth relief of the people, who heretofore trod under foot all rights and franchises of the people: and see how he is carried to prison, destitute and deprived of the benefit of liberty, who awarded and adjudged a free body to bondage and servitude. Amidst these words I say, that might be overheard in that confused humming of the assembly, Appius also was perceived to call unto the people of Rome for relief and mercy. He reckoned upon what, the defects of his ancestors in the behalf of the C. W. both at home in the City, and abroad in the wars: he alleged his own unhappy affection (when time was) to the Communion of Rome, and partaking with them: and namely how with the exceeding displeasure of the Nobility he resigned up his Consulship, and all for to bring in and establish equal and indifferent laws to both parties. He rehearsed moreover his own laws which notwithstanding they remained still in force and strength, he the law-giver himself, was going to prison. But concerning his own proper parts and dejects good or bad, he would then make trial thereof (he said) when he should be permitted judicially to make his defence: as for the present time, he pleaded the common benefit of the City, to wit, that being a Citizen, he might at the appointed day, speak for himself, and stand to the doom of the people: neither feared he the hatred & malice of men so much as to repose no hope at all in the equity and mercy of his neighbors and fellow Citizens. But and if he were cast into prison and not suffered to come unto his answer, then he would once again call upon the Tribunes of the Commons for their help, and admonish them, not to follow and imitate them, whom they would seem to hate. And in case the Tribunes will be known and avow that they are linked in the same bond and covenant to avouch and take away the benefit of calling unto any one of them by way of mediation against which they have charged & blamed the Decemvirs for plotting & agreeing together: then he said, that he appealed unto the people,

A "and had recourse for succour unto the laws concerning appeal, made as well by Consuls as Tribunes, that present year and no longer ago. For who may ever hereafter (quoth he) have benefit of appeal, if it be not lawful for me, who stand yet not condemned nor attained, and have not pleaded for my self? what Commoner, what mean person may find relief by those laws, if Appius Claudius may not? It will be seen in me, and my example shall be a precedent and proof to others, Whether by these new statutes, lordly rule or equal liberty be established: whether the calling for help by way of mediation & intercession, or by plain appealing against the wrongful proceedings of Magistrates, be granted in every deed, or but oncey pretended in bare show, under vain colourable pretences and trifling Letters Patents. Against all this, Virginius made his

B rejoinder and said, That Appius was the man alone exempt out of all benefit of laws, and excluded from all civil and humane society. "Let men but look back toward the tribunal seat the veddy well-head, as it were, and respectacle, the tortures and hold of all wickedness: whereon that perpetual Decemvir practising his cruelty upon the goods, the bodies and lives of free citizens, menacing whipping and executing hangmans work unto all persons: a contemner both of God and man, guarded with a crew of executioners and butchery tormentors rather then sergeants, proceeding on from spoil and bloodshed to pierce his hart on leachery & carnal lust: led a maid by birth free, from out of the very arms of her father, as if he had been taken captive in war: and that, in the sight of the people of Rome, and gave her away to one of his followers even to a groom of his bed-chamber. Where, by a cruel decree of his, and detestable sentence, adjudging her bond, he caused the father to lay violent hands upon his own daughter: where he commanded, the espoused husband and the wife of the Virgin (that took up her body halldred, to be had away to the Gaol, as being more displeased with them, for disappointing and putting him beside his purpose of abusing and spoiling her, then for the murder, upon her by them committed. "Adding moreover and besides, That and therefore, pleaded he ever and anon, and on and dwelling house of the Commons of Rome, And therein, he pleaded he ever and anon, and as oft as he will his appeal. I will not give over (quoth Virginius) but as oft tender a judge between, and be able to prove, that he gave not sentence, & pronounced her free, but bought: but in case he will not abide to be censured by a competent judge, then I command him to be carried to prison, as attaint and convicted. Thus was he committed to ward: and as there was no milk of this proceeding, so every man was greatly troubled in spirit to see to great D "a personage punished, and the very Commons themselves thought their liberty too large & excessive. The Tribunes let him down a day (before hand) to plead for himself and make his answer. Amidst these affairs, there came to Rome Embassadors from the Latins and Hemicks, to congratulate, and to shew their joy and great contentment, for the unity and concord between the Nobles and the Commons: in token whereof, they brought as a present unto Jap. Opt. Max. a crown of gold, not very massive in weight, but according to their ability, which was not much, yet unvaluable to their devotion: which men performed rather with religion and zeal in those days, than in portly shew and magnificence. By relation and intelligence from them they were certified also that the Aequians and Volscians prepared war with all the power they could make.

E Whereupon, the Consuls were commanded to part their provinces between them, To Plautius the Sabines, and to Alernus the Aequians and Volscians. And when they had proclaimed matters against these wars, such was the forward affection and favour of the Commons, that not only the younger folk, but also a great sort of these that by law were denied penic with, and discharged from warfare, and lived of their penions, offered their voluntary service, and were ready to enter their names into the muster: Matters took: whereby the army was not only in number greater, but also for the goodness of men, more puissant, as having the old, beaten, and experienced soldiers among them. But before they went out of the City, the Decemviral laws (which now are known by the name of the twelve Tables,) they set up openly to be seen, engraven in brass.

Some writers have delivered, that the Ediles performed this office, as they had in charge from the Tribunes, C. Claudius, who upon a declaration and deep hatred of the Decemviral laws, and wicked enormities, but especially above all others, of the insolent pride of his brethren, which he could no longer abide, had removed and departed to Regillus, his old native country. He being now a very aged man, returned to line and intreat for his deliverance out of danger, whose vices he abhorred: and in fulfilled weed and poor attire, accompanied with those of his lineage, and other his followers and vassals, went through the common places, and laboured every man one by one, "Receiving them not to let that breed of iniquity, and bring such a stain upon the house and name of the Claudii, as that they should be thought worthy of imprisonment and irons: nor suffer a man of most honourable quality, a singular pattern of Nobility to try to his posterity in time to come, the Law-maker and founder of the Roman laws, to lie in chains among fellows, night-thieves and robbers: by a one regard and consideration of matters minds a while from anger and wrath, and incline to a more regard and consideration of matters: and rather at the suit and earnest petitions of so many of so many suppliants, As for himself, he professed that he did this much for kindred and names sake. Neither was he reconciled unto him and they made friends again: yet could he wish, that his adversity fortune and poor condition were relieved, considering with this in the end, that as their liberty was recovered again, by virtue & proofs, so the concord of all degrees & estates might be established sure by clemency.

Some there were whom he moved, more in regard of his own kindness and love, than in any respect of him for whom he spoke. But Virginius prayed them, "To take pity and compassion rather, of him and his daughter, and to give ear to the prayers and supplications, not of the Clau- dis, who have had the day, and tyrannized over the Commons but to the merest friends of Vir-

 themselves implore and beseech the help and assistance of the Commons. And verily these tears were thought more reasonable, and like to speed. Thus when Appius law all means of hope cut off, before the foretold day appointed was come, killed his own self. Soon after this, Sp. Oppius, of all the rest next unto Appius, was most hated: for that he was in the City at the very time when this unjust doom and sentence of his Colleage hapned to be pronounced, was attached by P. Numitorius. But Oppius was the worse thought of and more prejudiced, by occasion of an injury by himself done, then for stopping the wrong intended by Appius to Virginius. For a wretchedness was produced to depose against him, one, who having served in the wars even and twenty years, had been rewarded and honoured extraordinarily eight times. This valiant servitor, thus adorned with those gifts and marks of valour, in the view and sight of the people of Rome rent his garments, and shewed his back and sides, and the skin all broken with scourging: beseeching no other favour, but if Oppius the party accused, could justly charge him with any trespass and offence by him committed, he should not spare him, but now a private person as he was, exercise and redouble his cruelty upon him once again. Well, Oppius likewise was had to prison: and there before the law day, ended his life. The goods of Appius and Oppius both, the Tribunes did confiscate. Their com-partners and fellow Decemvirs fled their country and were banished, and all their goods also were forfeit and confiscated. And not so much as M. Claudius the party that laid claim unto Virginius escaped, but he was arrested to answer at a certain day, and was condemned. However Virginius of himself related him his life, and would not take the extremity, so he was sent away and confined to Tibur, as it were into banishment. Thus the poor spirit and ghost of Virginius more happy after her death, than fortunate during her life, having wandered abroad, and haunted for many houres for due revenge of her adventures: at last, when there was not one guilty person of them left unpunished, gave over her walking and rested quiet.

Now were the nobles in exceeding fear, beholding the same countenance already in the Tribunes, which they had observed in the Decemvirs. But then M. Duilius, a Tribune of the Commons, wisely and politically refraining and keeping within a mean this excessive power of theirs: "We have enough (quoth he) both of our own liberty, and also of revenge of our enemies: and therefore I will not suffer for this year, any man more to be arrested or imprisoned. For I do not like that old faults done and past, and now as it were cancelled and raised out, should be revived again, and brought in question, since that by the punishment of the Decemvirs, satisfaction hath been made for the new and the continual care and diligence of the Consuls both twain, for the maintenance of your freedom assure me, that nothing will be committed hereafter, that may require and need the power of the Tribunes. This moderation at the first hand of the Tribunes, put the Nobles out of their fear: but made the Consuls to be thought the worse of, (for that they had been so addicted wholly to the commonality in that a Magistrate of the Commons had more regard of the safety and liberty of the Nobles, than the proper Magistrate of the Nobility: and because the adverse part had their rule of revenge and punishment of the Nobility: and because that the Consuls would on them to stop the course and torrent of their licentiousness, and many there were who gave it out, that the Consuls bare themselves too remiss and slack in the matter, and little respected the good and credit of the Nobles, in that they had approved and confirmed the Acts that were propounded by the Tribunes. And no question, troubled as the state was then of the C. W. they were forced to give place, and do according to the necessity of the time.

When the Consuls had set all things in good order within the City, and fully grounded the state of the Commonality, they went either of them into their own Province. Faleria against the armies of the Æquians and Volscians, which now had joined together in Algidum: where full politically he led off, and stood upon his defence only: for if out of hand he had put it to the hazard of a battle, cannot tell, but I greatly doubt, considering how the hearts of Romans and enemies both, were affected presently upon the infamous conduct of the Decemvirs, it would have turned to their great loss and cost: them an overthrow. The enemies ranged in battle array took up the whole ground between both camps, and when they made bravado's, and challenged them to come forth and fight, not one Roman would answer them again. At length the Volscians and Æquians, weary with long standing still, and in vain expecting battle, thinking verily that the honor was in manner yielded unto them, departed: foment into the country of the Hernicks, other some to the territories of the Latins, for to raise booties and make spoil: leaving behind them rather a competent guard to defence of the camp, than a sufficient power to maintain a field fight. Which when the Consul perceived, he paid them again with the like measure of fear, as they before had from them received: and with his army ready embattled, hid them behind: who being privy to themselves what forces were wanting, forbore to fight: whereupon the Romans presently took a better heart unto them, and made account that their enemies were overcome, being in such a fear within their rampart. When they had stood thus a whole day ready to fight, they retired back in the evening and gave place to the night. And the Romans full of good hope, refreshed their

A their bodies and made much of themselves, but the enemies nothing to hearty and courageous, send out messengers every way in fearful haste, to call again the forrager. Such as were near at hand came running back into the camp: those that were farther off, could not be found nor met withal: Now when it was once day night, the Romans issue forth of the camp, intending to give an assault upon the Rampart, unless they would come forth and fight. But when it was far forth day and the enemies stirred not at all, the Consul commanded to advance with their engines, The Æquians and Volscians seeing their battle coming forward, began to chafe and take foul dislike, for very shame that their rampart and trench should protect victorious armies within this camp, rather than their weapons and valour defend them in plain and open field: and were earnest likewise themselves with their Generals for the signal of battell, and at length after much importunity obtained it. Now were some of them lifted out at the gates already: and other followed hard after at their heels, keeping their array, and every man coming orderly into his file and rank. By which time, the Roman Host, before the battell of the enemies stood fully furnished with their full strength, came on full and gave the onset: charged them before they were all come forth, yea, and ere they were well marshalled that came abroad, being a multitude, waving (as it were) to and fro every way for fear, and looking about themselves, and to their fellows: and to amaze their troubled heads the more, he assails them with a great shout and main violence. At first the enemies gave back: but after they had gathered their spirits together, and were come again to themselves, and that their Captains on every side rased them, and asked them whether they would yield unto them, whom before they had over come, the fight began again to be renewed. The Consul on the other part, wiled the Romans to remember, that this was the first day, wherein they being newly set free, were to fight likewise for the freed City of Rome: and therefore they were to win a victory for themselves, and not after victory gotten, to be a prize for any more Decemvirs to prey upon. For they fought not now under the conduct and command of Appius but of the Consul Falerius: who as he was descended from the deliverers of the people of Rome, so he was one of them himself: exhorting them to shew now, that in former battells of late dayes, it was long of the leaders and not of the fonderers, that they achieved no victories: saying, it were a foul shame for them, to have had more stomack against their own neighbours and citizens, than heart against their enemies: and to have stood more in fear of servitude at home, than of bondage abroad. As for Virginius, he was but one whole honesty and chastity was in time of peace hazarded: and Appius it was only, and none but he, that in regard of his unbidded and dissolute lust, was the dangerous citizen. But if the fortune of war should fail on our side, and go against us, then shall our children all be in jeopardy, to be abused and spoiled at the hands of many thousands of enemies. Unwilling I say (quoth he) to prelude in his milities and to prognosticate to the City those calamities, which both Appius and our flock-father Marius forbid and hinder to light upon it, founded upon to lucky signs and happy foretokens, at the first beginning: I put you in mind rather of the Æneas Vile, and Mount Sacer: that where within these few months you recovered your freedom, thither you may carry back again your Empire, life and soul, unincensed and unviled, that all the World may see that Roman soldiers are as forward and nobly minded after the banishing of the Decemvirs: as they were before their creation: and that by the bringing in of equat and indifferent Laws, the manhood and prowess of the people of Rome, is no whit decayed nor diminished. Having uttered these words among the engines of the footmen, he made speed to the corners of the Horsemens, Go to, brave gallants (quoth he) exult the footmen in valour and chivalry, like as ye exulted them in honor and degree. At the very first shock and encounter, the footmen forced the enemy to retreat: and being now retired to your hands, let spurs to, gallop after them apace, and chase them out of the plain field: they will never abide your violent charge: for even already they are at a bay, and hand rather at a stay, than make any resistance. Hereupon they gird out lustily, and run their horses among the enemies, disorderly ordered, and in disarray by the service of the footmen. And having broken through their ranks, and passed forth even to the rearward: certain of them cast about in the void and open ground, and when the enemies were about on all sides to fly, they turned most of them away from their camp, and overriding them, they got between them and home, and forced them wholly from thence. The footmen and the Consul himself, with the whole strength of the main battell, made forward to the camp, assailed the tents with them, and besides a great slaughter, obtained a booty far greater.

When news of this battell was brought, not only into the City, but also to the other army into the Sabins country, it was received in the City with joy only and totemicity: but in the camp it set the soldiers hearts on edge, and enkindled them with desire for the like honor and reward. Now had Hernicus already partly by lending his soldiers forth to make inursions and marches, and partly by training and proving them in light skirmishes, engined and acquainted them to trust to themselves, and have confidence in their own good service, rather than to remember the shameful disgrace and foil received under the leading of the Decemvirs. And even whole multitudes of them had done them much good already: against they should encounter on a field and learned them in assured hope to win the victory. The Sabins again for their part, still sadly upon their growth, since the year before ceased not to provoke and urge their enemies: very often asking them what they meant after the guile of robbers, to run in and out in small companies, to do little more the time, and thus by piece meal to make of one entire battell many petty and small skirmishes? Why rather fought they not one field for all, and without more ado, hazzard all upon a call, and commit the whole to the trial of fortune, to see unto what use the will inclineth. Then the Romans besides that of themselves they had gathered heart and courage enough, were with the indignity of this challenge also set on fire: considering, that when the other army was at the point now, with victory to return into the City, their enemies began to insult and crow over them with reproachful taunts: and if now they were not meet and even with them, when should they ever be able to make their parts good? So soon as the Consul perceived the fondlers thus to mutter and mumble within the camp, he assembled them all together, and thus bespake: "Sirs, (quoth he) what incets hath been, and how the service hath sped in Agrippa. I suppose you have already heard, namely, such as befel the army of Africaine and people. By the policy of my fellow Consul, and the manhood of his soldiers together, achieved is the victory. As for my self, that could will I take, and that resolute mind will I carry, which you my soldiers shall afford unto me, The war may be drawn out in length profitably: it may be also dispatched and ended speedily: If protracted it shall be, look how I have begun already to train you, with the same discipline till I will exercise you and bring to pass, that your hope and prowels will encrease every day more then other. If your hearts now serve you well, and that you like to fight it out, Go on in the name of God, and in token of your willing heart and valorous prowels, now let up such a cry and shout, as you will make when you first join battell, and give the charge. After that they had exceding cheerfulls shouted aloud: God bleis us all (quoth he) I will fulfil your desire, and bring you forth to morrow into the field for to fight. So the rest of that day was bestowed in making their harness and weapons ready. When the morrow was come, the Sabins so soon as they perceived the Romans ranged in battell array, came forth also themselves, as ready and desirous of fight, as they. Here was a battell (frank, such as might becom two armies, that trusted on both sides in their own valour, and made full account of that high honour. The one eager and greedy to recover their ancient glory, wonted evermore to have the upper hand, the other proudly bearing themselves, upon a new victory lately achieved. The Sabins besides, mended their strength with a stratagem, for when they had equally divided their battalions every way, they reserved two thousand drawn out of the rest, extraordinary without the ranks apart. Who in the very time of the conflict, should hotly charge the left point of the Romans: they advancing overthwart with their engines, & flanking them on the one side, pressed surewily upon that one point, and overcharged it, well near environed all about. Then the horsemen of two legions, six, almost in number, alight on foot from their horsebacks, and as their fellows were even now ready to retreat, rush forward with all speed to the forefront: and withal, made head against the enemy. And first, they put life unto them again, for that they centred equally with the footmen into a danger and bare even part thereof: afterwards, for very shame, they gave more boldness and animated them to fight. For abashed they were, that horsemen should be put to double service in both kinds of fight, on horse and on foot: and professed footmen not able to countervail the horsemen, who had taken them to their fier. So they advance forward to the battell, which on their part was abandoned, and make haste to recover the ground which they had lost. And in a trice, at once, not only the fight was renewed, but also a battalion of the Sabins began to shrink. The horsemen closely among the ranks and files of the footmen, gat again to their horses, and from thence red speedily unto the other side reporting to their fellows the victory: and withal, sharply charged the enemies, who now were affrighted, because the stronger wing of their side was discomfited: neither were there any in this battell also, that were seen to perform better service then they. The Consul, as an over-seer, beheld all the manner of it, praising those that stood to it manfully, and rebuking where they fought but faintly. They were not so soon chastised and reprov'd, but presently they bare themselves like hardy men, and did fight good service: and look how much that praise excited some, so much shame stirred up others. Then with a fresh shout and outcry, they bent their whole force on all sides, and compelled the enemies to turn their backs: who were not able after this, to abide the violence of the Romans. The Sabins scattered here and there all over the fields, left their tents for a spoil to their enemies: where the Romans recovered again not the goods of their Allies as before in Algidum, but their very own, which they had lost by the foraging and spoiling of their lands.

For this two-fold victory achieved in two sundry battels, the Senat right sparingly (such was their misery) decreed in the name and behalf of the Consuls, one days thanksgiving and procession, and no more. But the people, the second day likewise, without order and warrant from authority solemnized the same in great numbers. And this popular procession, disorderly as it was, and without formality, was with more good will and better affection of men celebrated, then the other. The Consuls of set purpose (as it was agreed afore) came within the compass of those two days into the City: and summoned the Senat to assemble in Mars field: where, as they were about to make some speech of their exploits and worthy acts, the chief and principal Lords of the Senat, complained and shewed themselves grieved, that the Senat was assembled on purpose, among the soldiers, to strike a terror into them. Whereupon the Consuls, because they would give no occasion of quarrel and fault-finding, called away the Senat from thence into Prata Flaminia, where now the Temple of Apollo stands, a place which even then they called Circus Apollinis: whether they being denied triumph with one voice and general consent of the nobles, L. Julius a Tribune

A Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the people, to know what they thought of the Consuls triumph. And among many that stepped forth to cross and disswade the bill, C. Claudius above all others cried out aloud that the Consul intended to triumph over the Nobles, and not over their enemies: and that they sought a thank by way of recompence for a private favour done to the Tribune, and not for an honorable reward, for any virtue and worthy act. For never (quoth he) aforetime, was there held any treaty of triumph before the people: but evermore it was referred to the Senate, to consider and determine of that honour. Neither had the Kings at any time, impaired the Majesty of that highest Court and degree: what should the Tribunes then meddle to much, and have their hand in all matters by virtue of their authority, as to suffer no publick Council at all to remain in force? For a City can never be counted free nor Laws equal and indifferent, but when each degree and estate retaineth still their own privileges, and hold their proper pre-eminence. When the rest of the principal Senators had spoken much to the same effect all the Tribunes notwithstanding in general, allowed by their suffrages that which the Tribune had propounded. This was the first time that ever any triumph was granted by the voices of the people, without the authority and assent of the Senators. But this victory of the Tribunes and the commonalty had like to have turned to a dangerous mischief of it, untions liberty by reason that the Tribunes conspired together and were fully agreed, to be chosen Tribunes again: and to the end that their own ambition should be less seen above others, they alledged to the Consul, for a sufficient reason (that they likewise should once more still in place of government) the agreement and consent of the Senators: through whose holding together and drawing in one line the liberties of the Commons, to the great disgrace and reproach of the Consuls, were in mingled and undimmed. For what would come of it, say they, if before the late Laws were fully established, the new Consuls with their factions banding, should set upon the new Tribunes: for we must not look to have always such as the Horatii and Valerii, to be Consuls, men that would not regard their own woe before the freedom of the commonalty. As it hapned very well for that time, it fell to M. Duilius his lot especially, to be chief President of the Comices and Election: who like a prudent and wise man, foreseeing the heart-burning and hatred, like presently to ensue upon the continuance of the same Magistracies still in place, said flatly, that of the old Tribunes he would not propound any one: and when his brethren in office laboured earnestly with him, to permit the Tribes to go to a free Election or else yield up the charge to him alotted, of holding the assembly unto his brethren, who would keep the same and manage the matter, according to Law rather than to the will and pleasure of the Nobles: Duilius then, seeing their earnest contention, canied the Consuls to be called into their own pines and seats, and demanded their minds concerning the Election of the Consuls: and when they answered that they would create new, he having once got them to be the authors of a popular sentence, and not popular themselves, went forth together with them into the assembly of the people. Now when the Consuls were brought out into their presence, and were asked the question what they would do, in case the people of Rome should elect them Consuls the second time and that, in remembrance of their liberty received and recovered by their means, and for their good service in war, and worthy acts by them performed: he finding them constant in the same mind still, and nothing altered from their resolution: after he had commended the Consuls, for their steadfast perseverance unto the last (as altogether unlike to the Decemvirs) went presently to the new Election. And when he had created five Tribunes only, seeing there were no other competitors enough to reach unto sufficient voices of the Tribes, in comparison of the other nine Tribunes his colleagues who openly stood to be chosen again: he brake up the assembly, and from that time forward called no more about any Election. For he said, That he had fulfilled the Law in that behalf, which without setting down any precise and definite number of Tribunes, so that there were some left behind, and rooms void, gave authority to those that were created, to chuse and take unto them more colleagues, to make up the number. And therewith he revoked the words of the Law, which run in this form, If I shall propound ten Tribunes of the Commons to be created, and they shall the present day make fewer then ten: they by voice of this Law, shall be accounted Tribunes, whom those elected shall chuse and take unto them for their fellows, and as long as they be held, as those whom this day ye shall create Tribunes of the Commons. Thus when Duilius perswaded still resolute unto the end, saying, That in any case the state might bear five and twenty Tribunes, and having thus conquered the greedy ambition of his colleagues: with great joy and the good liking as well of the Nobility as the Commonalty, he gave up his room. The new Tribunes now in the electing and making choice of their companions, carried favour with the Senators, and framed themselves to their will and pleasure, in chusing to them two of the Nobility, and those that had been Consuls, to wit, Sp. Tarpeius and An. Sulpicius. And Consuls there were created, Sp. Herminius and Titus Virginius Celsinus. Who bearing themselves in a mean between Commons and Nobles, and not greatly inclining to one side or other, had peace as well at home as abroad. Lu. Trebonius a Tribune of the Commons, being highly offended with the Senators and spitefully bent against them, and saying withal, that in the captation of the rest of the Tribunes, he had been cunningly over-raught by them, and betrayed by his colleagues, propounded a Law. That whosoever hereafter propounded unto the Commons any Tribunes to be elected, should not give over, but still propound, until he made up the full number of ten. Thus continued he all his Tribunship in persecuting and molesting the Nobles, never letting them to be quiet: whereupon he was fit named After.

After this, M. Geganus Macrinus, and C. Julius, being created Consuls, appeased the contentions. Orations of the Tribuns, which were begun and raised against the young Gentlemen of the Nobility, so as without any bitter invectives against that authority of the Tribuns, they prevailed (till the sovereign Majesty of the Nobles: and by means of decreeing musters against the wars of the Volscians and Aequians, stayed the Commons, and kept the City from all sedition and discord: saying, That by civil unity, all would be at quiet abroad: whereas through discord of citizens, forrainers took heart, The care likewise of outward peace, was the cause of inward and intestine concord. But evermore the one state disquieted the moderation of the other: for whilst the Commons were still and in good temper, the piny Senators began to offer them wrong, and hard measure. And when the Tribuns would have assuaged the weaker side, at first it booted little, and small good they did: but afterwards they themselves escaped not without abuse and hurt: and especially in their latter months, when as they received injuries, both by reason of the meetings and packing together of the mightier sort, and also for that toward the end of the year, the edge and vigor commonly of all authority waxeth dull and growth feeble and weak. So that now the Commons had little or no confidence at all in the Tribunship, unless they might have such as Isidius to be Tribuns: and as for these two years last past, they had them but in bare name, and not to any effect and purpose. The elders and ancient fathers of the Senate on the other side, as they believed verily that their youth were too forward and lusty: so they were of this mind, That if there needs must be trepasts and excess, they had rather those of their own degree and coat should exceed measure, and have greater stomachs, than their adversaries. So ticklish and dangerous a thing it is to keep a mean in maintenance of liberty: whilst under a colour of withholding and desiring equality, every man advanceth and lifteth up himself, so as that he thrusteth and beareth down another: and in pretending a care and regard that men should not stand in awe and fear of them, they make themselves dread and fearful to others, and so the wrong that we put off and turn from our selves, we impose upon others. As if there were no remedy, but that we must either do, or suffer injury.

Then were made Consuls, T. Quintus Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furinus: who found neither sedition within, nor war without. But yet both the one and the other was near at hand. For now could no longer the diffention of the citizens be held in, but needs it must break out. And both Tribuns and Commons rose against the Nobles. For in all the assemblies and meetings of the people, one or other alwayes of the Nobles and Senators were served with process whereupon grew fresh troubles and new contentions. At the first noise whereof, as if the signal of battel had been given, and the alarm stricken upon, the Aequians and Volscians took arms: and withal, their Leaders and Captains (such as gaped greedily after spoil and pillage) had born them in hand and persuaded them to believe, That for these two years past, they could not go through with their musters proclaimed: for that the Commons refused to obey, and brake their allegiance: which was the only cause that there were no forces sent out against them. Besides say they. The rule and manner of their warfare, is now with their licentious looseness, discontinued and clean decayed: Rome was now no more a common wealth and country to her citizens: For all their anger, quarrels and malice, that they bare aforetime against forreign nations, was now turned upon their own selves: so that at this time they had fit occasion and good opportunity to surprise them, blinded as wolves with mutual rage and fury one against another. Hereupon they joynd their whole power, and first wasted the country of Latium: and afterwards fixing none to encounter them and make defence (to the exceeding joy of those that were the authors of this war) they came foraging and spoiling all the way to the very walls of Rome, even before the gate Esquilina, there braving and vaunting in reproachful and scornful terms before the whole City, telling them how they had laid their fields and territories waste. From whence they retired themselves without revenge and loss, driving their booties afore them, and marched along to Carbia. Quintus the Consul seeing this, assembled the people, and there (as I have heard) he made to them a speech in this wise, "Albeit

"I am not privy to my self, and my confidence accuseth me not of any fault. O Quirites, yet am I exceedingly abashed and ashamed to come forth into this assembly of yours: that ever you should know, or the posterity hereafter understand, how the Aequians & Volscians (who of late dyes were hardly comparable to the Hericks) came when T. Quintus was the fourth Consul, in warlike manner with banner displayed to the walls of the City of Rome, and went their wayes again clear and without any hurt by them received. This shameful dishonor, if I had known it, would have light, so just in this year (and yet for this good while the world hath to grieve, and guilt hath been the course of our life and conversation, that my mind ever gave me there was no goodness toward) I would have avoided this place of dignity, either by banishment or death: if there had been no other way to escape it. And might indeed have Rome been taken in the time of my Consulship, if those weapons which were under our gates had been in the hands of valorous men? Then had I indeed enjoyed sufficient honor already, then had I lived long enough, and a little too long, and might have dyed well when I was but the third time Consul, But who were they? I pray you, whom these most base and cowardly enemies of ours despised and set so lightly by? Were they that are your Consuls, or you (Quirites) the people of Rome? If we were in the fault, take from us as insufficient & unworthy persons our rule and government: and if that be not enough, let us over and besides be well punished, and abide the smart. But if the blame be in you Quirites, let neither God nor man chastise your trepasts and offence, only do you repent

A "your selves, and be fofore therefore. It was not your cowardie that they scorned and despised neither was it their own valour wherein they trusted. For why? they have been too often deceived, and driven out of the camp and the field, lined with forfeiture of Lands, forced to go under the gallows, and brought into servitude, knew very well both themselves and you also. No, no, the variance and discord between our own states and degrees, is the only blame, and nothing else, of this City: the jures and debates, ifay, between the Nobles and the Commons. Whiles neither we have any grace or stay of rule and command, nor you know mean of freedom and liberty: while you are weary of Noble men rulers, and likewise of the Commons' Magistrates, they gave gotten heart, and wax bold. Now, (Gods will) what mean you to do, and what would you have? Tribuns of the Commons yelonged and fought after: for quietness and concord like, B we let you have your longing, Deceivers you had a great mis of, and them you desired: we granted, and permitted them to be created. Weary you were alone, and all too weary of Deceivers: we forced them to forgo their office. And when your anger continued still against them, being become private persons again, we suffered to be put to death, and to be exiled, most noble and right honorable men. When you would needs elect anew your Tribuns of the Commons, you chose them at your pleasure. To create Consuls from out of your own faction, although we knew it hurtful and prejudicial to the Nobles, yet have we seen that dignity proper to Nobility, given away as it were, and made common with the Commonalty. The ambition of Tribuns, the appealing to the people, the Laws and Acts decided by the Commons, to be considered and imposed upon the Nobles, to bind them thereto: and that under the pretence, to censure of Immunis, or equal and indifferent Laws, our own rights and privileges should be overthrown, we have abidden, and do still endure. When wit, there be an end of old order and diffention? Shall we never have one City or City? Shall we never have this to be the common Country of us all? We can be content much better to be at quiet, when we are vanquished than whiles we are victors. And is it not enough for you that you are dread and feared of us? but still you seek for more? Against us it was, that you took the Mount Aventinus, against us it was that you held and kept the Mountain Sacra. For when the gate Esquilina was well-nigh pierced by the enemy and when the Volscians our enemies were ready to climb our trench and banks, and to scale our walls, none of you there was to be seen for to remove and let them further off. Against us ye play the men against us ye can be armed, Well then go to! When ye have here betwixt the Senate-house, taken up the market place and common Hall with soldiers, filled the goal with Noblemen, and those of the theft and best quality, then with like courage and stoutness of heart (till forth of the gate Esquilina, Or if you dare not venture to much behold and view all afore you from the walls dis over your Lands and territories with fire on a sword waited & consumed, your goods and cattle had and driven away as booties and prizes, your farms and houses burning and smoking in every quarter. But all this time the Commonweal only (you think) by this means is in worse plight and poorer case, the villages fired the City besieged and the enemy goeth his way with the honor of the war, And in what taking, I pray you is your own private estate the while? Tidings will come anon to every man particularly from out of his own things and possessions of his proper losses and what have you at home (if a man may ask) to make happily away? Will the Tribuns make you restitution, and amend for all your damages? You shall have words of them your fill. They will not fluck to speak to rail and scold by the river side before you against the heads of the City. Laws upon Laws you shall have heaped thick and thickfold. Assemblies convocations, and seditions investive good store. But from these their attentions, never came there any of you home to his house, richer of one gray gown or single denier nor in better state to live than before. Was there ever any one carried ought from them, except to his wife & children but hatred and malice, displeasure and rancorous grudges and heart-burnings both publick and private: from which at all times ye have been shielded and defended, nold if not with your own vermine and innuency, yet by the help and aid of others. But certainly, when ye served in wars under the conduct of our Consuls, and followed not the leading of your Tribuns, when you served I say in camp and not in the Hall and common place, when inhibited your enemies quaked to hear you shout and not in your assemblies the Romans were in dread of your men, and outcries: then you won prizes, and conquered Lands from your enemies, then you returned home with triumph to your homes, full of riches and wealthy full of honor and renown as well publick as private. Whereas now, you suffer your enemies to depart, triumph and taken with your goods. Sit to your Ward Leets, as if you were nailed and fast pinned to them: dwell still in your Hall and lead your lives continually there: yet must you needs war when all is done, from it as fast as you can. Grieved it you is indeed, and thought you it a trouble and painful thing, to take an expedition so far as into the Volscians and Aequians country: For the war is come even unto your gates: it be not put from thence, it will anon be within the walls, it will take the Castle and Capitol it will follow you, even into your houses. Two years ago the Senate gave order and commanded that there should be soldiers mustered and an army conducted into Adriaticum. But we sit still at home & do nothing, but hide & God, as it were, one at another like, until and shrewd women contenting our selves and joying in a present peace: and little fearing that there shall more will come sundry wars again, and that right shortly. I know full well, there are speeches more pleasing & pleasant to the ears, But to speak the plain truth for your good rather than to flatter and looth for your pleasure, if mine own nature and disposition did not reach and

admonish me, even very necessity doth force and constrain me. Willing would I be, and most willing O Quirites to please you: but much more would I have you to be in safety, think what I see, or ye will of me. It falleth out commonly, as a thing that cometh by kind, that who I speak to a multitude in his own cause, and for himself, is better liked, and heard with more applause, than he whose mind smiteth at nothing else but a publick weal, unless peradventure you think these common flatterers, these clabwacks, and men-pleasers, which give you no rest, neither in war nor peace, do stir you up and provoke you for your good. But will you have the truth? ye being once solicited and pricked on by them, serve their turns in good stead, either for their honor or gain. And because they see themselves to be of no worth and regard, while the states do agree, they desire to play small game, rather than to sit out: to be Captains of millions and legions, rather than of nothing: and in one word, to be the heads, the ringleaders of troubles and distractions. Whereof, if you be so blest and happy, as to be weary now at length, and will brake your selves to the ancient manners and fashions, both of your own, and of your ancestors, in lieu of these new fangles, I will refuse no punishment: nay, let me be put to the most shameful death that is, if I do not before many dayes pass over my head, defeat, and overcome them that fight these robbers and destroyers of our fields, and send them packing out of their own camp, and finally translate and remove this terror of war, wherewith ye now are so affrighted and affonied, from our gates and walls, even unto their own Towns and Cities. Seldom at any time else had there been a speech delivered by a popular Tribune, more acceptable unto the Commons, than was the sharp Oration at this present of a most severe Consul, Yea, and the very youth, which amid such terrors of war, had been wont to refuse soldiery, the only keen and sharp weapon they had to fight withal against the Nobles, now desired war and to be in arms. Over and besides, the country kerns that fled (to Rome,) such also as were spoiled and wounded in the villages about, reported more foul and cruel outrages in their ears, than were presented unto their eyes, and set all the City in an hot an angry broil. Now when the Senators were assembled together in the Councell Houle, then verily they all cast their eyes upon Quintus, beholding and regarding him well, as the only patron and maintainer of the Majesty of Rome: but the chief peers and Lords of the Senate spoke out and said: That he had made an Oration, becoming the sovereign Government of a Consul, becoming so many Consulships by him already born, becoming the whole course of his life, that had passed off through many honorable dignities, and yet always deferred more. As for other Consuls, they either in flattering and soothing up the Commons, had betrayed the dignity of the Nobles: or else in seeking by hard courses to maintain the rights, preeminences and royalties of their state, and to tame the multitude, have thereby made them more fell and untractable. But T. Quintus, he hath made a speech, respectful and tending, as well to the royal dignity of the Nobles, as to the concord and unity of the States, and principally regarding the condition of the times. They would request him therefore, together with his brother Consul, to take in hand the care of the Common-weal. They would request the Tribunes likewise, to joyn in one accord with the Consuls, and shew themselves willing and forward to have the war kept off and put back from their City walls: and in so fearful and dangerous a case, to reclaim their Commons to their due obedience to their Nobles: saying moreover, that the native Country, the common mother of them all, calleth unto the Tribunes and craveth their aid, now that the territories are wasted, and the City at hand to be assaulted. Whereupon they all agreed generally to decree a mulct, and presently to make a levy of fouldiers. And when the Consuls had pronounced before the whole people then and there assembled, that it was no time as then to hear excuses, but that all the younger sort, should become the next morning by day-light, be ready to attend in Mars field: and that after the war was ended, they would find out and appoint a time to enquire into their allegations and reasons, that entred not their names: and that he should be taken for a traitor and rebel, whose excuse they allowed not: the whole manhood and youth of the City flew themselves the morrow after in readinesse. Each cohort or regiment chose their Centiniers or Captains, and every Regiment had two Senators for their Provoct Marshalls. All this was performed (by report) with such speed and expedition, that on the very same day, the standards and ensignes were by the Quæstors had forth of the Armory and Chamber of the City and brought into Mars field: and by the fourth hour (or ten a clock) the same day, set forward and advanced out of the field. And this new army, with a few bands of old fouldiers, who willingly of their own accord followed them, marched on and rested, at ten miles end. The day following they discovered their enemies, and at Carbio encamped close unto them. And by the third day, there was no flay on both hands, but they must needs encounter and fight. For why? The Romans for anger were sharper: the enemies again, upon a guilty conscience that they had so often rebelled, were grown desperate. Now, whereas in the Roman army the two Consuls were unequal commission, yet gave Arrippus place unto his brother Quintus, and yielded unto him the entire and absolute command. A course most profitable in the managing and execution of great affairs. And being thus preferred, he again courteously answered and requited the others Gentlest, and in inclination to submissiveness, in this wise: by inspiring unto him all his Comrades: by parting with him all his honor and praise, and by making him his equal, who was indeed his inferior and underling. In the battell Quintus commanded the right point, Arrippus led the left: Sp. Posthumus Albinus, the Lieutenant General, had the conduct of the main battell. And P. Sulpicius the other Lieutenant, they set over the horsemen. The footmen

A men of the right point fought most valiantly, and the Voltians received them with equal valour. Sp. Sulpicius with his men of arms, brake through the main battell of the enemies: albeit he might have ranked himself the same way again unto his company, before that the enemies could bring their ranks again into order, that he was dismayed: yet he thought it better to charge them upon their backs. And in one moment he had discomited and quite dejected his enemies: by affrighting them behind, and thus affrighting them on both sides, but that the Voltian and Equian Horsemen recharged him, he left him play in his own fight, and to keep him occupied a good while. Thereat, Sulpicius said it was no time now to linger and to drive off, but to befor themselves, crying out aloud, that they were environed round, enclosed within their enemies, and excluded. B From their own fellows, since they set to, and bent their whole force quickly to outpitch the Horse-fight: and that it would not serve to put the Horsemen to flight and leave their wives: but kill both horse and man, that none might escape back again from thence into the battell to renew the fight. And to make head and resistance against him and his horsemen, they were never able, since that the main thick battell of footmen had given him ground already. Good cause they gave to his words, and soon harkened to his direction: and with one entire assault they gave a large charge, and deleted the whole power of the Cavalry, unhorsed and dismounted a number of them, and with their javalins goaded both them and their horses. And there's an end of the horse-fervice. Then they set upon the battell of the footmen and dispatched messengers unto the Consuls with news, what they had done: where also by that time, the battell of the enemies began to shrink. And when tidings came unto the Romans that were already upon the point of victory, they verily were more encouraged: but the Equians that were about to retreat, were flurried with greater fear. In the main battell first began the overthrow: namely, whereas the men of arms before had broken the array. After them, the left point also began to be distracted and driven back, by Quintus the Consul. But in the right there was hard hold, and most ado. Where, Arrippus being a tall man of his hands and young withal, seeing in every part of the battell things go better than where he was: caught the ensigns from the ensign bearers, advanced them forward on his own left, yea, and fell to flinging some of them against the thickets of his enemies. For fear therefore of shameful disgrace, the ion dier, befor themselves, and truthily assailed the enemy. And on all hands alike, they achieved the victory and won the field. Then came a messenger D from Quintus, & brought word that he had the better hand and was now ready to give an assault upon the camp, but would not break in and enter thereto before he knew for certain, that they in the left point also had gotten the upper hand, and made an end of the battell. In case therefore he had discomited the enemy, he should joyn his forces to him, that the whole army altogether might gain the spoil and pillage of the tents. So Arrippus, who also for his part was victor, came to his brother Consul and the camp of the enemies, and met with mutual congratulation on the other. There finding but a few to defend, whom they discomited in the turning of an hand, they brake into the rampier and munitions, without conflict or skirmish: and to besides, the recovery of their own goods again which they had lost by the overrunning of the country, they gained also a rich booty, and retired back with their whole army. I cannot learn, that either they themselves E required triumph, or the Senate offered them any: and no cause appeareth upon record, why they should either refuse or not hope for that honor. For mine own part so far as I can guess in to long distance of times seeing that Valerianus and Horatius, who over and besides the conquest of the Voltians and the Equians, had the honor also of dispatching and finishing the Sabines: war were denied triumph at the Senate's hand: these Consuls might not with modesty sue for the same: having performed but half the good service of the others: lest if they had gotten it granted, there might have seemed more regard had of the persons, than of the deeds.

But this noble and honourable victory over the enemies abroad, thus achieved, was observed and only dilayned with a shameful doom of the people, in a controversy of their allies, about the bounds and meers of certain Lands. The inhabitants of Ardea and Ardea's allies, having warred oftentimes one with the other, about some Lands in question between them, and by giving and taking fivdy feuds and overthrows outwearied, chose the people of Rome, their umpire to decide and determine this quarrel. And when they were come with their counsels to plead the case, the Magistrates granted a Court of Allies of the people. Where was not but arguing and dispute on both sides before them: and after the witnesses were depoeled, that at length the Tribes should be called to the kirtme, and the people give their voices, there steps forth an old father one P. Scæpius a Commoner. And I quote he for my part O Consuls if it be lawful to speak for the good of the State will not suffer the people to erre, and be deceived in this question. When as the Consuls denied him audience, as being an old fool, and of no credit: and commanded him (as he cryed still) that the publick cause of the City was betrayed) to be had G away, he called for the assistance of the Tribunes. The Tribunes then, who lightly are ever overruled by the multitude, rather than able to rule them, yielded unto the Commons: That for as much as they were desirous to hear what the old man could say, Scæpius should speak his mind at large. Then forth he the rule on end, and beginneth thus: I am I quote he, fourscore winters old and three on the head of it and even upon that very ground for which all this strife and variance is served as a fouldier, when I was no young man neither but one that had been prety forewarned, and received pay twenty years afore, And it was, I remember well, during the siege before Corinth. Higher am I now come, to give evidence of a thing by long continuance of time,

A controversy between the Ardeates and Romans, decided by the people of Rome.

The evidence given by old Scæpius.

"We shall have then the Camuleians and Isclians to be our Coss. But Jupiter (that great good God) forbid, that ever the Royal and Imperial Majesty, should come to that low ebb or desperate pass: dye they would a thousand deaths rather, than suffer to great a shame and indignity: knowing this assuredly, that their ancestors also, if they had once suspected or foreseen, that by granting the commonality every thing as they desired, they would not have proved more lovely and cheerful towards them, but rather more churlish and untractable: and when they had obtained their first suits, to proceed still to demand worse and worse, one thing after another: they would sooner have endured at the first, any contending and debate whatsoever, than suffered those hard conditions to be imposed, and put upon them: and because they had once relented, that Tribuns should be created, therefore to grant them again the second time, so that as now, there is no quietness with them, nor end of quarrels will be none, so long as in one and the self same City, Tribuns and Senators remain together. Nay verily, either this state must be put down, or that office utterly abolished. And better late than never, to withstand and meet with their rash and desperate boldness. What? shall they without controulment, first sow discord at home, and then stir up foreign wars abroad? and afterwards, against those wars which themselves have raised, debar and hinder the City, for to take arms and defend it self? and when as they have as good as sent for the enemies to come to their doors, then, not suffer an army to be levied against them. But let Camuleius (if he dare) speak these words out in the Senate, That unless the Nobles suffer his laws, as if he were a Conqueror to be admitted and received, he will stay the mulling? For what else is that, but to threaten that he will sell and betray his country, and suffer it to be assailed and lost? What encouragement will such a word give as that, I say not, to the commonality of Rome, but to the Volscians, Æquians and Veientians? Will not they hope, under the conduct of Camuleius, to be able to scale the Capitol and the Castle? so be the Tribuns shall take from the Nobility their courageous hearts, as they have bereaved them already of their right, their honor and dignity? Let him know therefore, that the Consuls are ready, first to shew themselves to be Captains and Leaders, against the mischievous practices of their own citizens, before they will head against the armed forces of their enemies? While these matters were debated of with great contention and heat in the Senate house, Camuleius for the maintenance of his laws, and to cross the Consuls, made this Oration unto the people. How greatly the Nobles have despised you, O Quirites, how unworthy they have ever thought you, to live among them within the walls of one City, me thinks I have, as often heretofore, so now especially and most of all perceived: in that they have risen up altogether to flatter, to check and withstand our proposed laws. "Wherein, what pretend we else, but to not of them and put them in mind, That we are, as well as they, citizens: and although we are not of the same wealth, yet we inhabit the same country with them? In the one, we request marriage: a thing to borderers, yea, and to forrain nations usually granted: and to speak of our selves, we also have afforded even to our conquered enemies, the benefit of our City, which is far more than marriage. In the other, we move no new matter, but only claim again and challenge that, which is the peoples right, to wit, that the people of Rome may bestow their offices and dignities, upon whom they please. What reason have they then, I pray you, to set all on an uproar, as if Heaven and Earth should go together? and what is the cause, that ere while I had like to have had violence offered unto me in the Senate? What moved them to break out and say, they could not forbear nor keep their heads from me, and threaten to abuse and violate the sacred authority of the Tribuns? Set case that the people of Rome may have their free voices and suffrages, to elect the Consuls whom they will, and that no Commoner be denied, so be he worthy of the highest place, for to obtain the sovereign dignity. How then? cannot this City possibly stand any longer? and is our Empire come to an end for ever? And all one it is (be like) and importeth as much, to disable a Commoner, for being made Consul, as if a man inferred that a bondman or a freed libertine should become Consul. Perceive you not yet (my Masters) in what contempt you live? They would, if they might, bereave you in some measure of this day light: that ye breath and speak, that ye have the shapes of men, they think much, they repine, and it gres to their heart. And what else? They give it out flatly and lay (if God will) it is unlawful, that a Commoner should be a Consul. I beseech you hear me a little. If we may not be allowed to read the Chronicles, nor to peruse the High-priests records and registers, know we not those things then, that even all strangers know? namely, That Consuls entered in place of Kings, and succeeded them, and have no other right, preeminence or dignity at all, than Kings had before? Think ye that men have never heard, that Numa Pompilius, a man not so much as a citizen of Rome, much less than, a Patrician and Nobly descended among them, was sent for out of the Sabines country, and by the peoples voices, and the assent of the Nobles, created King of Rome? Also afterwards, how L. Tarquinius, who was no Roman born, nor, nor yet as much as an Italian, but the son of Demetrius the Corinthian, a stranger inhabitant at Tarquinus, and from thence removing, albeit King Ancus his sons were living, attained likewise to the crown? Moreover, how Servius Tullius after him, the son of a captive woman of Corculum, whose father was unknown, whose mother a bondwoman, through wit and virtue, obtained and did the Kingdom? For what would I speak of T. Tatius the Sabine, whom Romulus himself the father and founder of this City admitted to reign together with him? Well, so long as no stock was declined, no race rejected, wherein appeared sparks of virtue, the Romans Em-mons, against the Nobility.

A "pire became mighty, and flourished. Soon ye then at this day, a Consul out of the Commonalty, when our forefathers desired no King, that were aliens and strangers? No, no, when the Kings were expelled, was this City denied and shut against foreigners that were citizens and men of action. The kindred and whole name (I am sure) of the Landis, after the Kings were expelled, were not only admitted into our City, from out of the Sabins, but also received into the number of the Patricians and Noble men. And may a meor forermer indeed become a Noble man, and so a Consul? And shall a Citizen of Rome, if he be of the Commonalty be wholly disabled and out of all hope for ever of being Consul? Tell me I pray you, I think ye it not possible, that a valiant and hardy man, approved both in war and peace, being one of the Commons, may prove like to Numerus, L. Tarquinius, or Servius Tullius? And whether will ye have our Consuls, such rather as him to govern the Common-wealth, or no? And whether will ye have our Consuls, such rather as the Decemvirs (the most wretched and wicked persons under the sun, who, by your leave, were at that time of the Nobility) than strangers and new-comers, which of all the Kings were simply the very best? But forsooth, presently after the KK, were depoled and expelled, there was not one of the Com, a Consul. What of that? ought no new thing to be ordained, and which hath not been already taken up afore? For many things have not yet been practised, (as in a state newly incorporated) ought not such then to be put in use, if they be thought expedient? While Romulus reigned, there were no Billions nor Angors: by Numa Pompilius they were created. There was no Scilling of the people at all in the City, no description of Hundreds and Chilles. By S. Tullius they were instituted, Coss, were never heard of before: when the KK were driven out, they were deleted. The time was, when neither the absolute rule nor yet the name of a Dictator was known. In our last days it first began. Tribuns, Adiles, Questors there have been none: it was ordained they should be made. Within this ten years, we have both created and also abolished out of the common-wealth, made. Within this ten years, we have changed our laws. And who doubteth, but in a City founded for ever to endure and increasing dignities, new privileges both of kindreds and private persons? And even this one thing in question, to wit, that the Com, and Nobles might not join in marriage, were not the Decemvirs that first within these few years made that Edict? A most shameful example and precedent in a free state, and tending to the manifest wrong of the Commons. Can there be any greater or more notorious injury, than that there should be in a City one part and member, as defiled and polluted, thought unworthy of the bond of marriage? What else is this, but to suffer exile and confining within the same walls, when they debar us that we should not be either allied in affinity or knit in kindred? They provide (forsooth) and take order that blood should not be mixed, nor families confused. How then? if this do pollute this great gentry of yours, which most of you descended from the Sabins and Albans, have not by right line from the Patricians, but by copulation and election into the number of the Nobles, as being chosen either by the favour and grace of the Kings, or else by the peoples voices after the KK, were expelled: could not your wisdoms have kept your blood uncorrupt by some private means and provision, namely, by taking heed neither to couple wives from among the Commons, nor to suffer your daughters and sisters to be married to any other than Nobles? No commoner (ye might be sure) would have forced a daughter of any noble house: no, their insolencies or actions must be appropriate to Gentlemen only of the Nobility: none of us would have compelled any of you against his will, to make covenant and contract of matrimony. But I wot that by an express law it should be forbidden, and that marriage between Nobles and Commons should be condemned, that is it, which to the commonalty is plain contempt and open injury. And why contrary not and lay your head together, that the law may not marry with poor? That which at all times and in all places, hath been a matter left unto particular policy and consideration: namely, That into what housesoever a woman came, she might marry a commoner: and into what family a man obliged himself by word, promise and covenant, he might thence he might take a wife: even that, refraining within the bonds of a most proud and tyrannical law: whereby ye might break in under all civil liberties, and so one City make twain. Why forbid ye not by a positive Law, that a commoner should not dwell by a Noble man, or go the same way that he doth, or frequent the same feast, or converse in the same place or common place of assembly? For in effect what difference is there if a Gentlemen marry a commoner's daughter, or a commoner couple a Gentlewoman? What did I say you or condition of estate is hereby changed? surely the children still take after the father. Neither feel we nor thing else by matching with you, but only this, that we may be reckoned in the number of men and citizens. Neither is there any cause, why you should be in working, as disgrace and shame, if you go good to cross and take a pleasure to exercise your selves in concord and land upon it (unless it do). Finally I would gladly know whether the foreign government of the state reflects in you or in the people of Rome? When the Kings were driven out, got you thereby to your selves to rid the sovereignty, or purchased all men equal liberty? I must needs be granted, that the people of Rome may at their pleasure publish and ordain a Law. And will ye then as soon as any law, whatsoever, is by them proposed, appoint a master presently for their punishment? and as soon as that am Tribun shall begin to call the wards to give their voices, shall you that are Consuls: be and by swear all the younger sort, press them to warfare, lead them forth unto the field, and

In this year, and the year following, when Cato Furius Crassus and Marcus Popilius Crassus were Consuls, there was peace at home, and abroad. The plays which had been vowed by the Deities, according to the Senate's decree, during the time of the Common's intestine and departure from the Nobles, were this year for the first, Perdium fought for some occasion of edition but in vain, Who being made Tribune the second time, about he harried full upon one time, and three the next time things that he had before, yet he could not bring about, that the Commons should propole unto the Senat, concerning the division of lands among the Commons: and when as with great ado he had obtained this much, that the Senators should be moved and their opinions asked, whether they would have an election of Consuls or Tribuns (Consular) determined it was at length, that Consuls should be chosen, So, that the menaces of the Tribuns, that he would hinder the matter, was a ridiculous matter of game: seeing that when the borders were at quiet there was no need either of war or preparati^{on} for war, After this great quietness of the State followeth a year (wherein Publius Gerganius Maccianus, and L. Menenius Lanatus were Consuls, for sundry calamities and perils memorable: namely, Seditions, Famine, and hazard of receiving upon their necks the yoke of Kings rule again and that by the twetness of a Large, There want help of all the gods above have recovered the State, These calamities began with hunger. But whether it were, for that the year was unseasonable for corn, or that they were to move with the plausible and feditious Orations, and of the City it self, that they fligted and neglected the Tillage of their ground: it is uncertain, For both the one and the other is reported, The Lords of the Senat blamed the idleness of the Commons: and the Tribuns of the Commons laid the weight, one while upon the fraud and naughtiness, another while upon the negligence and reminence of the Consuls, At the last the commons enforced and gave the people (but not against the will of the Senate) to chuse L. Menenius Master of the provision or principal purveyor of corn and victuals: a man who in that office proved moe lucky to preserve the liberty of the City than happily in the exercise or ministry of his charge: albeit at the latter end, he delivered himself both praise and thanks for bringing down the price of Corn, Who, notwithstanding many La-ballances sent both by sea and land to the neighbor nations round about, and all to little purpose (or that out of Hesperia there was brought some little sprinkling of Corn) nothing calmed and mended the Market: and therefore he continued unto the disposing or dealing the present dearth

I find, that this Munius forsook the Nobles and went to the Commons, and was taken in to be the eleventh Tribune of the Commons, and appeased the mutiny that arose upon Munius his death. But it was not like that the Senators suffered the number of the Tribunes to be enlarged; and especially, that such an example should be given and taken up by a man of their sort: or that the commonality would not keep it still, if it had been once allowed, or at leastwise attempt it again. But above all, this conflict and reproach the false title of Tribune set upon his image, for that a few years before, it was by a statute expressly provided, That Tribunes might not chuse and take unto them a Collegue in office. Q. Caelius, and Q. Junius, and Sextus Titinius were the only men of all the Collegue of Tribunes that propounded not the Law for the honour of Munius; but rather accused unto the Commons both Munius and Servilius, and ceased not to make complaint of the cruel and unworthy death of Aelius; and in fine prevailed so much, that there should be an election for military Tribunes rather than for Consuls: nothing doubting, but if six were chosen (for so many at that time might be created) some of the Commons also, by promising to revenge the death of Aelius, might step in and be elected. The Commons for all they were ruled that year with many and sundry troubles, chose no more than three Tribunes with Consuls authority: and among them, L. Quintius the son of Cicconatus. Upon the hard conceit and hatred of whose Dictatorship patis, they thought to pick some occasion of quarrel and tumult: and Mamercus Aemilius, a man of great credit and reputation, was by voices preferred above Quintius, and obtained the first place. And L. Julius they created for the third.

Tullius
murdereth the Roman Em-
bassadors.

While these bare sovereign Rule, Fidene the Colony of the Romans, revolted to Lus Tullius, the King of the Veientians, and to the State of the Veientians. And besides their revolting, a more horrible fact they committed. For at the commandment of Aloisius, they slew C. Fulvius, and C. Junius, Sp. Nautius, and L. Scaurus the Roman Embassadors, who came to demand the cause of this change and sudden alteration. Some here do excuse and elevate the act of the King, saying that upon a like call of die he uttered a doubtful speech, which was by the Veientians taken, as though he seemed to bid the Embassadors to be killed, and that (forsooth) was the occasion of murdering the Embassadors to be killed, that at the coming in of the Veientians, his new allies, who were to consult with him and ask his advice, about a murder that should break the law of Nations, his mind should not be turned away from earnest studying about his game) and so this heinous deed proved to be but an error. More credible it is, that he had another meaning and deeper reach: namely, that the people of the Veientians should be bound unto him, and only rely upon him, being ataint with the guiltiness of so foul a murder, and not to look and hope for any mercy or favour at the Romans hands. The statues of these Embassadors which were at Fidene murdered, were set up openly at the charges of the City in the Rostra. [A pulchre grave (as it were) or pulpit in Rome, out of which the Magistrates read Orations to the people, beautified with the heads of ships and their brazen pikes called Rostra.] Thus was there like to be a cruel conflict with the Veientians, and Fidenates, M

called Tiberina.

Who besides that they were people confining on their frontiers, had also in the beginning of their war given so wicked and horrible a cause of quarrel. Therefore when as the common people and their Tribunes, in regard of the care for the publick State, were at quiet; there was no question, but that M. Gerginius Mucius in the third time, and L. Sergius Fidenas (named I suppose) so, upon the war which afterwards under his conduct was fought) should be created Consuls. For this manifest encounter with the King of the Veientians from this side * Anio, and gat the victory: but not without much bloodshed of the Romans. So that the grief was greater for the loss of his own soldiers, than the joy for the discomfiture of his enemies. And the Senate, as in all fearful times and dangerous occurrences, ordained Mamercus Aemilius to be created Dictator. Who, out of the brotherhood of N Tribunes military in Consuls authority, the year before, named for the General of his horse-men, L. Quintius Cicconatus, who had been a Tribune with him, a toward young Gentleman, and a worthy son of lo worthy a father. To those soldiers that were by the Consul mulstered and levied, were the old Centurions, experienced and skilful warriors, adjoined: and the number of those, which in that last battel were slain, was supplied. The Dictator commanded to follow him as Lieutenant, Quintius Capitolinus, and M. Fabius Plautus. This greater power and authority, and the man likewise nothing thereby inferior, drove the enemies out of the Roman ground, and set them farther off, even beyond Anio. Who removing their camp still backward, seized upon the hills between Fidene and Anio: neither durst they come down from thence into the open plains, before that the Legions of the Falisci came to succour. Then at length, the Tuscan encamped themselves under the walls of Fidene. And the Roman Dictator likewise halted and abode upon the banks of the Confluent (where both rivers run into one) and flanked himself thereby. And when he had cast up a trench and rampart afront, reaching across from the one river to the other, themorrow after he brought his power forth, and set them in order of battel. The enemies

A mics were of sundry minds. The Faliscians, who hardly could away long with military service farre from home, and truffling withal in their own civilities, that they were good enough, required battel. The Veientians and Fidenates had more hope in drawing out the war on, to Tullius, albeit the advice of his own men had him better, yet because the Faliscians should not endure lingering warfare, lest such a tragedy, and protracted battel against the morrow. The Dictator and the Romans, for that the enemies to the present shifted offlight, took more heart unto them: and on the next morrow, when as now the soldiers gave out brave words, and menaced, that would there be no more battel, they would assault both the Camp and the Town: the armies of both sides met in the middle of the plain, between the two Camps. The Veientians, as before, in number and having to spare, sent covertly out certain companies to assault the Camp on the Hills, who in the time of the conflict should let upon the Roman Army. And in this order stood the main Army of three Nations together embattled. The Veientians on the right point, the Faliscians the left, and the Fidenates the middle of the battel. The Dictator in the right point advanced his standard against the Faliscians, and the Faliscians discharged the Veientians: and against the main battel between the Veientians and the Corone of the Cavalry, with his Cornets of horse. Thus as they were engaged in battel array, for a pretty while was there silence on either side, and silence, for neither would the Tuscan begin first, unless they were urged: And the Dictator, as he had ordered anon backward toward the Capitol of Rome, that the Aurunci should not get any advantage (as it was agreed between them) so soon as the flight of horse gave opportunity, calling: which he no longer copied, but he put out presently the main Army, with a great shout against the enemies. The army of the footmen followed the Dictator in the rear, and seconded them with a lusty charge. But on no hand were the Tuscan any ways able to abide the force of the Romans. The Cavalry stood hard to it, and made head till for the King himself, the best horseman and most valiant of them all, who with a great cry did his enemies charged and pressed fore upon him, rode among them, beat out and maintained fight. There changed then to be among the Roman horsemen, a Tuscan or Marsian, one L. Cerealis Cestius, a goodly tall man of body, and a valiant and strong warrior, who let before his eyes the noble front from whence he was descended, and carried this mind, as it was right honourable already by his ancestors left him, to recover and the same to his posterity more glorious and renowned. His own name he thought of as Romans waving to and fro, for fear of the violence of Tullius, which way he was to be beat and turned; and knowing him by his rich and royal furniture, wherein he bore himself like a brave Knight, riding all over the battel. So is this (quoth he) the brave and noble humane League, is this he that hath violated the laws of arms, and committed such a deed as I will I presently. If it be Gods will that any thing in the world should be so bold and so insolent, be his brief. I will sacrifice and stake him to the gods, and I will be his sacrifice. Here with, setting upon his horse, with bent spear in hand, he charged against that one enemy, singled from the rest; smote him, and drove him from his horse. Then bearing upon his staff, alight presently on foot, and with the King was getting up again, he cast him backward with the bolt of his spear, and the King was getting long & after many wounds given him at length slaid him with his spear, and the King was getting up again, and when as he was once dead, he disarmed and disposed him, and then he laid dead and carrying it aloft on his lance, presented a fearful spectacle to the enemies of their King slain, and so did omitted them. This was the strength of the Roman Army, which only had made the battel doubtful. The Dictator having put the Roman Army in footment to fight, pursued them still, and drove them to their own King, driving them to the last chafe. Many of the Fidenates which knew the cruelty of the Country, fled into the mountains, and escaped. Cestius with his horsemen pulled over the City a great booty out of the country of the Veientians. As this battel was fought, there was a slight skirmish also in the Roman camp, with that part of the Tuscan which was forbidden by Tullius to stir up. Fidius the son of Fidius the son of Fidius ordered his men all within in camps like a girdle: and while the enemy was whole about about the stant, he with the Tuscan or soldiers of the new camp, which he had forth at the gate, called Principis, on the right hand, and gave him a horse upon them. Upon which they were attacked, but there ensued the less slaughter, because the number was small. However, they fled not like in disorder, but those to the very battel. Thus the Dictator having prospered success every way, returned with triumph into the City. G the death of the King, and grant of the people, in which triumph the great Cestius and goodly Cestius was Cestius, bearing the rich & royal spoils of the King. The Roman Army, which had been the soldiers charged divers rode ballads without time and measure, celebrating in their songs with Roundels, which spoils with a solemn manner of dance, and a triumphed marching up in the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, near unto those of Romulus, who were the first and only spoils, until that time, called Opima Spolia. And as he went he withdrew from the Dictators chariot, the eyes of all the people unto him, and he in manner alone, carried away the magnificence and glory of that festival day. The Dictator by order from the people, presented in the Capitol for the honour of Jupiter, a golden Crown, weighing one* pound weight, raised out of the common money of the City.

Thus have I set down (as following all other writers before me) that Aulus Cornelius Cossus, a Colonel or Marshal, brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the second royal spoils. Howbeit, over and besides, that those spoils only are by right accounted Opima, or royal, which a General hath taken from a General, and we acknowledge none for General, but him under whose conduct an high Commission a war is managed, the very title also written upon the spoils, doth check and reprove both them and me. The words whereof are these, [Thou Cossus being Consul, won these spoils.] When I once heard say, that Augustus Caesar himself, the founder or repairer of all Temples, entered into the house of Jupiter Feretrius, which he re-edified, being by injury of long time fallen to decay, and read it so written in a linen Jack or Curaze: I thought it little better then sacrilege, and did credit and cancel the testimony of Cossus himself concerning his own spoils, and of Augustus Caesar, the benefactor of that very Temple. Which error, if it grow hereon, That to ancient Records and Chronicles; and that the Books of the Magistrates, which being of linen, and laid up in the Temple of Moneta, Macer Lacinus doth very often quote and K cite as his Authors, do represent unto us Aulus Cornelius Cossus, the seventh year after Consul, with Titus Quintus Pennus: let every man abound in his own sense, and have his opinion by himself freely. For more then all this may be alleged to prove, that so famous a battle could not be transferred to that year: because that for three years space about the Consulship of Cossus, there was no war at all, in a manner, by reason of pestilence and death of corn: so as some records, as it were, mourning, and bewailing the calamity of the time, deliver unto us nothing but the bare names of the Consuls. In the third year, after that Cossus was Consul, he was military Tribune in Consuls authority, and in the lame year General of the horsemen also: in which government he fought another notable battle with horsemen. But hereof a man may conjecture and guess what he will. I But (as I think) we may toise these things of small importance to and fro, according to every mans opinion: and when all is done, the author of this battle his own self, having set up these fresh and new spoils in a holy place, in the sight of Jupiter himselfe flarding thereby, to whom they were vowed, and Romulus also, two witnesses, not to be deceived nor abused with a false title, hath written himself, [A. Cornelius Cossus Consul.]

When Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis and Papyrius Crassus were Consuls, the Armies were led forth: the one into the Veientians Country, and the other into the Faliskians; and booties both of people and cattel were from thence driven and carried away. As for the enemies themselves, no where in the Country were they to be seen, nor any battle was fought: and yet for all that, the towns were not assailed, because the people at home died of the pestilence. And within the City, Sp. Melius Tribune of the Commons sought occasions and pretences to move seditions, but without effect. Who supposing by the popular favour of his name to prevail and raise some mutiny, both arrested Mintius to make his answer, and also put up a bill for the confiscation of the goods of Servilius Hala: laying hard to Mintius his charge, that Melius was falsely accused and circumvented by him: and burdening Servilius with the murdering of a Citizen uncondemned. All these murmurs were with the people of less credit and importance, than the author himselfe. But the violence of the sickness still encreasing more and more, troubled them: besides the fearful and strange prodigious tokens: but especially, the fresh news that divers houses in the Country were by many earthquakes cast down. Whereupon the people went in solemn procession and made their supplications, whilst the Duumvir going afoot pronounced the prayers, and the people said after him word for word. But the year following, when C. Julius the second time, and L. Virginius were Consuls, was more contagious by reason of the plague, and caused both in Town and Country, so great a fear of utter desolation, that not only there were none set forth in any roads without the territory of Rome to raise booties, whilst the Nobility and Commons had no mind of making war: but the Fidenates also of their own accord, who before time had kept themselves either within their Towns, or Mountains, or Fortresses, entred now into the lands about Rome, and foraged all the Country. After this, having gotten also unto them a power of the Veientians (for the Faliskians could not be induced either by the calamity of the Romans, or prayers of their confederates, to take arms again) these two Nations passed over Anio, and not far from the gate Collina displayed their ensigns. So the fear was no less within the City than in the Country. Then Julius the Consul bringeth the forces abroad, and placeth them upon the rampart and the

A the walls: whilst Virginius assembled the Senate in the Temple of Quirinus, for to shew his opinion. Where agreed it was, to create for Dictator, A. Sulpicius surnamed Longus (say) Petrus, or as other, Strutius. Virginius making no longer stay then until he had consulted with his Collegues by his permission declared the Dictator in the night season. And he nominated for his General of the Cavalry, Publius Licinius. The Dictator commanded every man to be ready without the gate Collina, by the break of day: and so many as were able to bear arms were in a readinesse. The Standards and ensignes were taken forth of the treasury or chamber of the City and brought to the Dictator. Whilst these things were in doing, the enemies were retired and withdrawn to the higher grounds, and place of advantage: and thither marched the Dictator with his army in order of battle. And encountering with them not far from Nonacrium, he discomfited the legion of the Tullians, and drove them into the town of Fidene, and call a trench about it. But neither could the town be taken for the high stre thereof and the strong walls about it: and to lay siege unto it might not avail: for that they had corn not only to suffice the ordinary need of men beaged, but also plenty to spare, of their old store and provision gathered aforehand. Thus the Dictator being without all hope both of winning it by assault, and also of forcing them to yeild by composition, purposed in certain places for the needfull to him well known, at the backside of the City which was slenderly guarded, most neglected, and for the natural situation the fittest, to undermine unto the Cattle. And he himself in places farthest off from thence, approached close under the walls, with his army divided into four parts, to assault one another by turns in order: and so, by continual sifting day and night, he kept the enemies at a bay and withdrew them from all perceiving and intelligence of the work under ground: until such time as by digging through the hill from the Camp, there was a way and passage made straight up unto the Cattle. And when as the Tullians were wholly amused upon the vain threatnings, and bravadoes of their enemies before them, nothing minding the present danger wherein they stood: behold, the alarm of their enemies even over their heads, made an outcry, that the town was taken. In this year C. Furius Pacellus and M. Geganius Macerinus, Centors, appointed and dedicated the Large Hall, named Villa Publica in Mars field: and there first by them was held the Sefing, and numbering of the people. I find in Macer Lacinus, that in the year following, the same Consuls were made again, namely, Julius the third time, and Virginius the second time. But Valerius Antias and Q. Tubero, do name M. Melius: and Q. Sulpicius for the Consuls that year. Howbeit in so different report, both Tubero and Macer protest that they followed the linen Records: and neither of them both conceal that which the ancient writers have set down, namely, That the same year were Tribunes military, in Consuls authority, Lacinus without doubt is added to those linen Registers, and Tubero is uncertain of the truth. But among other antiquities, not known by reason of long time, this also is left in doubt and not cleared.

After the winning of Fidene, great was the fear in Heruvia: whilst not only the Veientians were feared, fearing the like destruction: but the Falsci also, remembering they began first with them, albeit they were not assistant in their rebellion. When as therefore these two States had sent their Embassadors abroad to the twelve Cities about them, and obtained a Diet or General Parliament of all Heruvia: should be assembled at the Temple of Vatunna: the Senate, as if some great troubles were like thereof presently to ensue, thought good that Marcus Annius should be created Dictator the second time. By whom, A. Publilius Tubero was named General of the horsemen. And with so much more endeavor made they preparation of arms than in the last war afore, by how much more danger there was from all Heruvia banded together, than had been from two nations combined and no more. But this business was much more quiet than all men looked for. When as therefore news came by Merchants, that the Veientians were flarily denied help, and bidden to end that war by their own means and forces, which they had begun on their own heads: nor seek to embark them in the allocation of their misery and adversity, into whom they had not impaired their mind & hope in their upright state, and when they were in that height: then the Dictator, to the end he should not seem to be created in vain, seeing all matter of acquiring renown by war was cut off, desirous yet in time of peace, to do some notable piece of work for a monument, seteth in hand to abuse and diminish the Consulship: either supposing it to be too high an office, or else offended not to match with the greatness of the honour, as with the continuance and length thereof. Having therefore assembled all the people together: Forasmuch as the immortal Gods (quoth he) have undertaken to govern the Common Weale abroad, and performed all safe and sure: I have yet to concerning that which is to be done at home within the walls, will take order and provide for the freedom of the people of Rome. The greatest preservation and defence whereof consist in this, when offices of great command are not long enduring: for when they be limited by term of time which may not be restrained or gaged in jurisdiction. or the Senates decree were alone sufficient. The Tribuns by giving out and threatening that they would stop the multitudes obtained in the end, that Quintus the Consul should propound this matter concerning the war unto the people. And it passed clear through all the Centuries. Herein also had the Commonalty the better of it, for that they prevailed: that there should be no Consuls chosen the year following. So there were four Tribuns military created with Consuls authority. T. Quinctius Pennus immediately from his Consulship. C. Furius, M. Postumius, and Corneilius Cossus: of which Cossus had the charge and government of the City. The other three after they had misruled, took a journey to Vei, and made good proof how hurtful in war is the rule of many Commanders. For whilst every man was inclined to his own counsel and advice, and took divers courses one from another, they made way for the enemies and gave them advantage. For the Veientians taking their opportunity and time, entered upon the army thus distracted, whilst some commanded to found a retreat, others the alarm and to strike up the battle. Whereupon they were disordered and put to flight. But for as much as the camp was near at hand, thither they retired themselves in safety: so as the flame they got was more then the harm in this defeat. The City was pensive and hereupon forlorn, as not used to take foiles and overthrows. The Tribuns they hated, and required a Dictator: in whom settled over the whole hope and stay of the City. And when as even in that behalf, they made a matter of confidence, because there might not be any Dictator nominated, but by a Consul, the Agurs were consulted withal: who resolved them of that doubt and rid them of their scruple. So A. Cornelius (a consular Tribun) nominated Mamercus Aemilius Dictator: by whom he was himself also pronounced Grand Master of the horsemen. At such default was the City then, of right valour and true virtue, that notwithstanding the prejudice by the Censors, yet there was no remedy, but the whole government of the state should rest upon that family, which had been wrongfully disgraced and unworthily noyed by the Censors.

The Veientians proud of their late good success, albeit they sent their Embassadors about all the nations of Hernia, boasting and vaunting that in one battle they had discomfited three Roman Generals, yet could not they with all their solliciting, persuade any to be taken to part with them in publick action: but they procured divers from all parts for hope of spoil, voluntarily to aid and assist them. The people of Fidene only agreed to rebel. And as though it had been in no wise lawful, to begin any war but with some wicked, heinous and execrable fact: like as afore they had embrewed their hands, and bathed their swords in blood of Embassadors, so then they began with murdering their new received Coloners: and so handed themselves with the Veientians. Then consulted the Princes and States of those two nations, whether they should make Vei or Fidene the seat town of the war. Fidene was supposed the fitter and more commodious. So the Veientians passed over the Tiber, and translated the war to Fidene. Great fear was there at Rome to see the army of their enemies removed from Vei, and implanted at Fidene. And being freely danted by their late overthrow besides, they encamped even before the gate Collina. On the walls were armed souldiers placed, vacation in all courts of law was ordained, shop windows shut up, and all more like a Leaguer then a City. Then sent the Dictator the Criers about into all streets and lanes, to summon the Citizens thus terrified, to a general assembly. Where he rebuked them for carrying such wavering and doubtful hearts upon so small accidents and events of fortune, having received but a slight loss and small foil: and that, not through the manhood of the enemy or cowardice of the Roman army, but only through the disagreement and difference of the Leaders. "Also for that they were afraid of the Veientian enemy, whom five or six times afore they had put to the worst and vanquished: and especially of Fidene, which had been often in a manner won, then assailed. As for the Romans and their enemies (saith he) they are even the same still that always for so many hundred years, they had been: bearing the same minds, the same bodily strength, and the same armor: and even my self am the same Mamercus Aemilius, and no other, who heretofore discomfited at Numentum the Veientians and Fidenians, with the Falcians power also adjoined unto them. And as for A. Cornelius, he will no doubt be the same General of horsemen in this battle, as in the former war he was: at what time he being a Knight Marshal, slew Law. Tolomitius the King of the Veientians, in the fight of two armies: and brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the rich armor of him de spoiled. Wherefore ye ought to remember this, that we have on our side triumphs, spoils and victory: whereas with the enemies remaineth the wicked and detestable fact of killing the Embassadors, against the law of all nations: also the massacre of the Fidenian inhabitants, in time of peace: the breaking of truce, and their revelling now seven times to their ruin and overthrow. Take weapon therefore in hand like men for I trust assuredly that so soon as we shall join our camps together, and encounter these most wicked enemies, they shall have no longer joy of the shameful discomfite of the Roman army. And the people of Rome shall understand, how much better they have delivered of the Common-weal, who made me Dictator now the third time, than those, who for clipping the Censors wings and abridging them of their kingly rule, had discomfited and disgraced my second Dictatorship with the shameful blot of ignominy and reproach. After this speech, when he had made his vows accordingly: he encamped a mile and an half on this side, and was flanked on the right hand with the hills, and on the left with the river Tiber. And commanded T. Quinctius Pennus his Lieutenant, to gain the hills afore and beset secretly of that cape or hill, which was on the back part of the enemies. Himself the next morning

A when as the Tribuns, (full of pride and stomach for the prosperous success of former dayes, which was much better than their service in fight) came forth into the field: after he had stayed a while, until the counts and plains brought word, that Quintus was gotten back unto the and with his footmen ranged in better array, marched against his enemies with his standards: manding his General of the Horsemen not to charge without his word: not that he thought as need should require, would give the signal for the aid of his army to one in a wilding him: or his rich pretence and oblation: and of Romulus and Jupiter Feretrius. The legion, armed and mailed, encountered right hardly. The Romans killed and entangled with ran one. These were the Fidenians, wicked and god-like wicked: these the Veientians, Robbers, and with the execrable breakers both, polluted with the abominable murder of Embassadors: the very first shock forced their enemies to shrink. At which instant as at once, there lifted on the open gates of Fidene a strange army, not heard of nor usual, before that day: A mighty number armed with fireworks, and shining all over with burning lights, after a fantastical and mad manner, ran as if they were carried with spirits, upon their enemies: and with the unthought fight of this kind of night, amazed the Romans a pretty while. Then the Dictator busy in flight, having sent both for the General of the Cavalry with his troops of Horsemen, and also for Quintus more like then a battle, hatched himself to the left point: which being terrified with a kind of voyce he thus spake: "What will ye be overcome with smoke like a swarm of Bees, and lose your ground and retreat from your naked and unarmed enemies: will ye not put out this fire with right fight with fire, and not with weapons, pull from them their torches and firebrands, and sling them again at their own heads? Go to, I say, like hardy men, mindful of the renown of Rome, enemies City, and online Fidene into ashes with her own flames: this dishonourable Fidene, which by no favors and good turns of yours, ye were ever able to win and pacify. The blood of your Embassadors, the blood of your Coloners thither sent to people their City, your Frontiers and Borders by them wasted, put you in mind of no manner revenge. At the Dictators commandment, the whole battallion was moved and encouraged. Some catch the firebrands as they flew, others by force snatch them from them, so that now both battels were armed with fire. The General of Horsemen for his part, smother the horse service: commanding them to pluck the bits out of their Horses mouths, and was the first himself, that setting spurs to, rode with bridle in his hand, into the midst of the fire: and the other Horses also being pricked forward, and aided of their bridles, carried the riders with full career against the enemy. The dust rising together with the smoke, took the light from mens eyes and Horses both. And that sight which blind terrified the soldiers, nothing at all affrighted the Horses. Wherefore there, the men of arms rode, they bore down all afore them as if some Horses had come tumbling upon their heads, there with hapned a new alarm to be heard, with having caused both armies to wonder and listen thereunto, the Dictator cryeth out aloud, That Quintus the Lieutenant and his Regiment, came upon the back of the enemies: and himself reconforing the thou, advanced his ensigns forward more freshly. When as now two armies, and two divers battels, pressed fore upon the Tribuns, and environed them both before and behind: and that the enemies could neither fly back to their camp, nor yet retire or withdraw themselves unto the mountains, from whence a fresh supply of enemies, made head, and assisted them: and that the horses being unbridled, carried the riders every way hither and thither the most part of the Veientians ran leaping in disorder and hipping. F then apace towards the Tiber, and the Fidenians that remained to the City Fidene. But in that fearful flight they ran upon their own death. Some were killed on the banks of the River, others were driven into the water, and the stream and whirlpits carried them away. And even they that were cunning swimmers, what with weariedness, and what with fannings of their wounds and with fright, sunk and were drowned: so that few of any way over in safety. The other army fled through their camp into the City. The same way also the Romans followed for,ibly after and were the foremost souldiers for fight (as who came last into the battle) and so afterwards entered pell-mell among their enemies into the gate, climbed upon the walls, and from the walls fell up a banner to their fellows, in token that they had won the Town. Which as soon as the Dictator perceived (for now by this time had he made an entrance into the fort, and abandoned camp of his enemies) he brought the souldiers, upon desire to run to a spoil, and hoping of a greater salvage in the City, flight into the gate. And being gotten within the walls, marcheth directly forward to the Cattle, whereinto he beheld the multitude to fly for refuge and safety. The execution in the City was no less than in the field: which continued until they threw away their weapons, and craving nothing but life yielded themselves to the Dictator. So both City and camp was spoiled and sacked. The morning after, the Dictator disposed of his prisoners thus: he drew them by lot, and gave to every Horseman and Centurion one, and to as many as had done more valiantly offers they could not break forth to their fellows, gat up unto a certain little Hill, and cast themselves into a ring and flood to their defence, not without doing some mischief to their enemies: neither gave they over fighting until night. The Consul also maintained the battle so long as he could see, and kept the enemy play. So the night parted them asunder, and uncertain it was who had the upper hand. And for that the event was unknown, who sped the better, so great a terror came upon both parts in their camps, that leaving the wounded and a great part of their carriages behind, both armies as taking themselves losers, recovered the mountains that were next unto them. Howbeit the Hill or bank aforesaid, continued still better round about, until midnight. But when word was brought thither to the Aſſailants, how that their camp was abandoned: they thinking their fellows vanquished, were also for their part affrighted, and made shift and fled in the dark as well as they could. Tempinius, fearing an ambushment, kept his men there together until day light. Then went he down with a few to discover the coalls: and finding by enquiry made of the wounded enemies, that the tents of the Volſcians were left and forsaken: he was full glad thereat, and called down his souldiers from the mount, and entrench into the Roman camp. Where seeing all void and forlorn, and finding the same desolation which was amongst the enemies: before that the Volſcians upon knowledge of their error should return again, he took with him those hurt souldiers that he could: and not knowing to what quarters the Consul was gone, marched forward the next way to the City of Rome. And thither already the bruit of this unlucky fight, and of abandoning the tents, was arrived. But above all the rest, those Horſemen were bewailed, and great moan and lamentation was made for them as well in private as in public. The Cof. Fabius, seeing the City also terrified with this news, kept ward before the gates: by which time, they might discover the Horſemen aforesaid afar off: but not without some fear of their parts, doubting who they were. But being soon known, they called to great contentment after former fear, that in most joyful manner, the noise went through the City, how the Horſemen were returned safe with victory. And out of those mourning and forlorn will homes, which a while afore had bid adieu to their friends and kinsfolk, and bewailed their death, they ran all decent and womanly modestly, went out to meet the army, fell every one with open arms upon their own husbands and sons, took them about the neck, clipped and kissed them, and with all their hand and heart received them: yea, and for exceeding joy were almost past themselves.

The Tribunes of the Commons, who had challenged and accused M. Posthumus and T. Quinctius, for that by their default, there was an unlucky fight before Veii: seemed to have good occasion and opportunity offered now, by bringing the Consul Sempronius into strife and new hatred and disgrace. For to remove the conceived displeasure and malice of the people against them, having assembled therefore the people together, with open mouth they declared, that the Commonwealth was betrayed first, at Veii by the leaders, and afterwards, because they went clear away withal, and unpunished, therefore the army in Volſci was likewise lost by the Consul: and that a troop of most valiant knights were thus cast away and given to be murdered, and the camp shamefully left and forsaken. Then C. Julius, one of the Tribunes, commanded Tempinius the Horſeman to be called and before them all said, "I would know of thee O Sextus Tempinius, whether thou think that C. Sempronius the Consul, either began battle in good time, or strengthened his battalions with good succors and supplies: or whether thou thy self, when as the Roman legions and footmen were discomfited, of thine own head and policy, caused the Horſemen to alight on foot, and thereby reinforced the fight? Afterwards, when thou and thy men of arms were shut out from our battle, whether either the Consul himself came to relieve, or sent any succor unto thee? Last of all, whether the morrow after, thou hadst any aid or relieve at all? Whether thou and thy troop of Horſemen brake through into the camp by your own hardiness and valor? And whether ye found in the camp any Consul or army, or rather the pavilions abandoned, and the souldiers left behind, hurt and wounded? To these premises and points, he hath thou to speak this day upon thy virtue, and the faith of a souldier: by which only, in this new war-service the Commonwealth hath flood preserved. Finally, where C. Sempronius, and where our legions be? Whether thou wert forsaken thy self, or whether thou forsookest the Consul and the army? And to conclude, whether we have lost or won the field? To these demands, Tempinius made (as they say) no fine Oration, but a grave pithy speech like a souldier: not full of flattery, nor shewing any gladness for the fault of another, and answered in this wise: How great skill (quoth he) of martial feats, and what sufficiency is in C. Sempronius, it is not for me a souldier to judge, nor yet to make any estimate of my General: but it was the people of Rome to determine thereof, at what time as by their suffrages and voices. In a solemn Election, they chose him Consul. "And therefore ye are not to enquire of me, and to be informed, either of the policies of a General Captain, or virtues and duties of a Consul: deep points to be examined, weighed, and discomfired by great wits, reaching heads, and high minds. But for that which I with mine eye saw, I am able to make report and testify: namely, That before himself was excluded out of the battle, I beheld the Consul fighting manfully in the vanguard, encouraging his men earnestly, and even amongst the Roman Standards, and Pikes of the enemies, busily employed. After which I was carried from the fight of my fellows, howbeit by the stir, noise and shouting, I well perceived, that the conflict continued until night. Neither was it possible (as I thought) for them to break through unto the Hill which I kept, by reason of the multitude

The modest answer of Tempinius, to the former Interrogatories.

A "of enemies between. As for the army, what is become of it, I know not: But I suppose, that as I myself in an extremity and fearful case, defended myself and my men, by advantage of the ground: so the Consul for to save the army, took some more late place to encamp in. Neither think I verily, that the Volſcians stood in better terms than the Romans fortune was. And the darkness of the night (no doubt) caused error and confusion on every side, and in all places. After which speech when as he brought them, not to hold him any longer wearied with travel, and faint of his wounds: he was with exceeding praise both of his valiant service and also of his modest speech, licenced to depart.

While these things thus passed, the Consul by that time, had marched by the way of Lavinium as far as to the Temple of Quir: thither were wains, draught-beasts and murtherers sent from the City, to receive and safe the army, toiled out with fight, and tired by journeying all night. Within a while after, the Cof. entered into the City: who endeavored not more, to get the fault from himself, than to extol Tempinius, and give him his due deserved praise. Now whiles the City was sad and heavy for this hard hap, and angry also with the Captains: behold, M. Posthumus, who before had been accused, was now presented to the people, for to wreak their choler and malice upon. He had been a Tribune Military in place of a Cof. at Veii and now was condemned, & a sinner on his head often thousand Alkes of blame. But as for Lucius Quinctius, his fellow in government, because that among the Volſcians he had served so fortunately as Consul, under the conduct of Posthumus Libertus the Dictator: and likewise at Indus, as Lieutenant of the other Dictator M. Aemilius, and laid the whole fault of that other time on himself upon his college before condemned: he was found ingenuity and acquit by all the Tribes. It is said that the fresh remembrance of his father Cicero, late a right worshipful citizen, helped him much: Yea, and Capitellus Quinctius a very aged man, did him no hurt, who humbly brought them that they would not suffer him, having but a while in this world to live, or to be the carrier of so heavy news unto Cicero's war. The Commons made Tribunes of the commonalty, Sextus Tempinius, A. Silius, Sex. Aufidius, and Sex. Pomponius in their absence, whom also the Horſemen had chosen for their Captains or Centurions, in the former exploit, by the advice and counsel of Tempinius. But the Senators, because now for hatred of Sempronius, the name of Consuls milked and offended them, determined that military Tribunes with Consuls authority, should be created. So there were chosen L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius, M. Aemilius, L. Pappus, M. Aemilius.

In the very beginning of the year L. Horatius the fifth Tribune of the commonalty, accused C. Sempronius the Consul of the former year. And when as his other four fellows in office, in the fight of the people of Rome brought him not to trouble their guidle, Captain, in whom nothing could be blamed or found fault withal, but adverse fortune: Horatius could hardly abide, but thought it was but to prove and trye his resolute countance: and that the party accused, trusted not upon the prayer and intercession of the Tribunes, which only for a shew was pretended, but upon their support and assistance. And therefore turning one while to Sempronius himself, demanded what was become of that hantty courage and stomack, so ordinary in those of Senators calling? and where was that magnanimity which relied and relied upon himself? That he being a Consul, was fain to shelter and shrowd himself under the shadow and protection of the Tribunes? Another while directing his speech to his fellow Tribunes: but you my Masters (quoth he) what will ye do? if I prosecute mine action against him this, and convict him in the end: Will ye take from the people their right and overthrow the authority of the Tribunes among the Commons? When they again said and inferred, that the people of Rome had absolute power: to do what they would, both with Sempronius, and all others: and that they neither would, could abridge the people of their judgment, but if (say they) our prayers in the behalf of our General, who was to us in stead of a father, may not avail, then will we together with him change our need for company. Nay, God forbid (quoth Horatius) The Commons of Rome shall never see their Tribunes arrayed in soiled and mournful apparel. And as for C. Sempronius, I have now more to say to him, since that he hath carried himself to, whiles he was General, as that he hath gained thus much, as to be so dearly beloved of his souldiers. Neither was the kindness of those four Tribunes more acceptable to the Commons and Nobles, than the good nature of Horatius, who at their reasonable request, was so easy to be pacified and intreated.

It was no long time that fortune frowned upon the Aequians: who embraced the doubtful victory of the Volſcians, and took it as their own. The next year after, when C. F. Posthumus, Libertus, and T. Quinctius Capitellus, the son of Capitellus, were Consuls: by the leading of Fabius, unto whom was allotted that Province, nothing was done there worthy of remembrance. For when as the Aequians had made semblance of a battle, and brought their army only to fight, they were in fearful wise soon discomfited, and shamefully fled, mislending no matter of great honor to the Cof. And therefore was he denied triumph. But yet because the ignominy of the loss which he suffered by Sempronius, was partly allayed it was granted that he might enter Orant into the City. A General was said to enter Orant into the City, when ordinarily without his army following him he went on foot, or rode on horseback only, and the people in their Acclamations for joy, redoubled Ose or Ose. So that Ostio is almost as Ostio: Howsoever, some think that Ostio took the name of sacrificing a sheep. But he rode in triumph, when his souldiers attended him in his chariot crying To Triumph, in this he carried a branch or warre a garland of laurel, in the order of Myrtle. So that the Ovation was a less honor than the Triumph. And it was hands: which grief of theirs in the Election of Questors, they both shewed and revenged. For this was the first time that the Questors were made of the commonalty: so that in chusing of them, there was but one place left for C. Fabius Ambustus, a Nobleman: and 3 of the commonalty, Q. Silvius, P. Atilius, and P. Papirius, were preferred before young Gentlemen, of most noble families. I find that the perivaders of the people to use their full liberty in bellowing their voices, were the three Ides, defended of that house, which ever was most maliciously bent against the Nobles) who were for that year chosen Tribuns of the commonalty, and possessed the peoples heads with a world of great matters, after which they gaped greedily: but so, as they flatter gave out and said, They would not stir at all, if the people had not courage enough, so much as in the election of Questors, which only the Senat. had left indifferent to the commonalty and Nobility, to effect that which so long they had desired, and now by law was warranted. Thus the Commons assured themselves hereby of a mighty great victory: and esteemed not the dignity of Questorship to be the end and type of honor, but that thereby they seemed to have made a way and overture for new risen upstarts, to be advanced to Consulships and triumphs. The Nobles contrary-wise stormed, nor for that their dignities were made common and imparted to other, but for the utter losse thereof: protesting that if things went to an end, they would neither get, nor bring up children any more: who being put from their Ancestors place, and seeing others in possession of their dignity should be disabled for bearing rule and authority in the state, and be good for nothing but only to be made Priests for Mars, and Flamines for Jupiter, employed about nothing else but to sacrifice (forsooth) for the people. Thus on both parts were their minds nettled and provoked, & whiles the Commons took heart, and had three champions of great reputation to back them and maintain their cause: and the Nobles, seeing all would prove like to the Questors Election (if it lay in the peoples choice) addressed themselves to the Election of Comitils, which as yet was not so free, and indifferent both for Commons and Nobles. Contrary-wise, the Ides perilled still, and urged the point, that in any hand Tribuns Military should and must be created. For now it was more than time that the Commons had their part in offices of state. But no Action hitherto belonging to the offices and charge of the Consuls had been presented unto them, by the hindering whereof they might wring from them, that which they desired and fought for. But see, how even then, in wonderful good opportunity, word was brought that the Volscians and Aequians were departed out of their own Confinnes, and made an expedition into the Latine pale for to rob, and spoil. To the which war, when as by virtue of an order from the Senat. the Consuls began to muster: the Tribuns laboured tooth and nail to hinder it: giving out that this occurred furnished happily on their sides and the Commons. Three there were of them, and all most quick active and courageous men: yea (and for commoners) of good birth, and worthily defended. Whereof Spurius took in hand, by their continual travel to attend and watch the Comitils, to keep them at work, and either of them to hold one occupied: the third, was appointed to entertain the commonalty: and in all assemblies, by their Orations, one whiles to rein them in, another while to give them the head, as occasion required. But all this while, neither Consuls went through with the musters, nor the Tribuns with the election which they desired. But afterwards when fortune began to incline to the Commons side, Messengers came with news, that whiles the soldiers that M. Iulius in garrison at the Castle Carventana, were departed to get a booty, the Aequians having slain a few warders that kept the hold, entered it: and that all the soldiers were slain: some as they ran into the fort again, others as they were scattered in the fields. This thing falling out so cross against the whole State, gave strength yet unto the designs of the Tribuns. For being dealt withal, that now at length they would run ease from hindering the war, nothing would prevail: for that they neither gave place to the public calamity and necessity, nor yet regarded their own private peril of displeasure: and they obtained in the end that an Act of Senat. was granted for to chuse Tribuns Military. Howbeit with this expresse proviso, it was capitulated: That none of them who had been Tribuns that year of the Commons, should be eligible and propounded: no, nor chosen again Tribuns of the Commons for the year following. Whereby no doubt, the Senat. noted and pointed at the Ides, whom they charged to seek to be Consuls, for a reward of their seditious Tribunship. Then went the mustering forward, and preparation of war, by consent of all the States.

Sundry Authors write diversly and make doubt, whether both the Consuls went to the Castle Carventana, or whether one of them stayed behind in the City for to hold the foreaid Election. In this they disagree not, but set down for certain: that when they had filled the Castle a long time without effect, they were compelled from thence to remove: and that Verrius in the Country of the Volscians by the lame army was recovered, and that great foraging there was, and driving of booties both in the Country of the Aequians and also of the Volscians. Now at Rome, as the victory of the commonalty rested in this, that they had the Election which they desired: so in the issue and success of the Election, the Nobles had the better. For besides all menshope and expectation there were three Tribuns Military chosen with Consul authority, all of the Nobility, C. Julius, Tullius, Cn. Cornелиus, Cassius, C. Servilius H. U. Men say that the Nobles used a subtle practice and cunning device, which even then the Ides charged them with: to wit, that by intermingling a many of unworthy and unmeet competitors with others of mark and quality, they had charmed the peoples hearts from the commoners, seeing them to be men of no worth, and loathing the notable benefit that appeared in their persons.

After

A After this, tidings came, that the Volscians and Aequians (were it that the Cattle of Carventana which they held and guarded still, put them into some hope: or their garrison and fort lost at Verrius drove them into anger) were up in arms, with armour ready to make war: that the Antistates were the principal and chief in this intended action: that their Embassadors had told the people of both nations, rebuking their cowardize, for keeping within their walls, and enticing the Romans the year before, to forrage and drive booties in their territories, and the garrison of Verrius to be surprized and lost. Moreover, that not only bolts of armed men were sent against them, but Colonies also were planted in their frontiers and marches: and that the Romans not content to divide their lands and goods among themselves had bestowed upon the Ides, the town Verulanum, which they had won from them. At these speeches they were kindled and set on fire: and in all places whither they went to solicit, the younger fort and men in great number were levied. So the youth and manhood of all those nations, gathered together to Arretinum, where they encamped themselves, and expected the enemy. Which tidings being brought to Rome, caused more fear then need was, And the Senat. presently (which in all such emergencies was ever their last remedy and refuge) gave order that a Dictator should be created. Which thing Julius and Cornelius, two military Tribuns (they say) took in great displeasure. And hereto craved much heart-burning and dissention, whiles the L. U. of the Senat. of one side complained in vain of their grievances: That the Tribuns Military would not be ordered by the authority of the Senat.: and at the last had recourse to the Tribuns of the Commons for help, alleging withal that the very Consuls power upon the like occasion had been by their authority overruled and set down. And the Tribuns of the Commons on the other side, rejoicing at the discord of the Senators, made answer again, and said, That for their parts, they were not able to yield in court at all, who were of no reckoning themselves, being reputed neither in the Role of Citizens, nor yet to much as in the number of men. But if to be (say they) dignities and honors were communicated to us, then would we provide and take order, that by no pride of any magistrate whatsoever, the Senats decree should be made frustrate and dismantled. And in the mean whiles, seeing the Nobles were exempt from all reverence of laws, and regard of magistrates, let them of themselves also exercise the Tribuns authority if they would. This discord falling out so unfitly, when as great war was in hand, occupied and possessed mens heads a long time: whiles Julius and Cornelius one after another, thus reasoned and discoursed: That seeing they themselves were Captains good enough for the conduct of such a war, it was not meet that the honour on a belittled upon them by the people, should be made void and taken from them. Then Spurius H. U., who also was a Tribun Military spake and said: I have been silent thus long not for that I was doubtful in mine opinion, or to seek what to say. For what good Citizen (quoth he) would have his advice by himself, and go from the publick Council? But because I had rather, that my brethren of their own accord should give place to the Senats authority, than to suffer the Ides power to be called for, against them. And even now also if the state would permit, I could willingly give them time and space to retract their too too obstinate, perverse and preposterous opinion. But seeing that the necessities of war, wait not upon hum in counsel, I will have no more respect and consideration of the Well-publick, than of the favor of my brethren. What, forsooth, if the Senat. persist still in that mind and resolution of theirs, I will the next night following nominate a Dictator. And if any one withstand me I will ask no more, than the power and virtue of the Senats Act. By which speech of his, having won deserved praise and thanks of all men, he declared Publius Cornelius Dictator, and was himself by him nominated General of the foreaid war. A singular example to teach as many as beheld him and his Collegues, that otherwhies far more in honor somewhat fall to them that least desire the same. The war was small and nothing more than in one case and light battle were the enemies overthrow and slain at Arretinum. The army upon this victory wasted the Volscians Country, won by force the Castle upon the lake Verulanum, and within it took three thousand prisoners: having chased all the rest of the Volscians within their walls. F not able to keep their frontiers, the Dictator after he had performed this war in such sort, as only he might not seem to neglect his wonted fortune but keep it still in fire, returned into the City with greater felicity than glory, and resigned up his place.

The Tribuns Military, making no words at all of the chusing of Comitils (for anger, I suppose, that a Dictator had been created) published the election of Tribuns Military. But then the Senators were in greater care and perplexity, seeing their cause betrayed even by riot of their own company. Wherefore, as in the former year, by foisting in the battle of the Commons for competitors, they had caused even men of good worth to be deprived: so, now by promoting the principal of the Nobility, both for honour and for favour, to stand for the dignity, they obtained all the places to themselves: so as no one Commoner could be chosen. So there were created four, G. all having aforeborn that Magistracy, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, Cn. Fabius Ambustus, and C. Servilius H. U. This man was chosen again to the place, as well in regard of other virtues and worthy parts, as for the late favour which he won by his rare moderation, and singular carriage of himself.

In that year, as far as the time of truce with the Veientian Nation was expired, they began by Embassadors and Heralds of Arms to challenge of them amends and restitution. Whom as they entered into their territory, the Embassage of the Veientians encountered in the way requesting them not to go forward to Veii, before they had presented themselves to the Senat. of Rome. Who

Who being thither come, obtained of the Senat, that for as much as the Veientians were at civil discord among themselves, they would not claim any amends at their hands. Lo, how far they were from seeking their own vantage by other mens distreses and calamity. Alot the Volscians hands they sustained damage by loss of their garison at Verugo. But (see what a thing it is to slack the time) For whereas the souldiers besieged there, by the Volscians and lending for aid in due time, might have been rescued if speed had been made, the army which was sent for succour, came too short, and after the fray was ended. Only this exploit they did: The enemies, who after their fresh massacre committed upon the garison, were gone abroad fragling for to raise booties, were by them overtaken and put to the sword. The cause of this slackness was imputed to the Senat, rather than the foveraign Tribuns: who became intelligence was given, that they in the garison resisted and defended themselves most manfully, little considered, That there is no prowess of man whatsoever, but by valour again it may be overmatched, Most brave and valiant souldiers they, that neither whiles they lived, nor after death were unreverenced.

The year following, when P. and Cornelius both surnamed Cossus, C. Fabius Ambustus and L. Valerius Potinus were Tribuns Military in Consuls authority, began the Veientian war by occasion of a proud and arrogant answer returned by the Senat of the Veientians: Who commanded that the Embassadors which came to claim amends, should take this for their dispatch: That unless they departed presently out of the City and Country, they would serve them as Lars Tullianus had done others before. The Senators of Rome hardly could digest that: and therefore decreed, K that the Military Tribuns should propole unto the people as speedily as might be, even the day before to morrow, concerning proclamation of open war, and sending defiance to the Veientians, Which as soon as ever it was noised and published, the younger fort and men of service, murmured and muttered in this manner: "That as yet they had not fully ended the war with the Volscians: that even of late two whole garisons were lost, and their throats cut, and the forts kept fill with danger and great hazard, There is not (say they) a year pasteth over our heads, but one field or other is fought: and as if we had not work and trouble enough already, there was now intended new war with a most mighty nation confining upon us, and which was like enough to raise against us all Hetruria. And as they were forward enough of themselves to conceive thus, and utter these speeches, so the Tribuns of the Commons were not behind to buzze more matters into their heads, and set all on a light fire: Who gave out fill, That when all was done, the greatest warring was between the Nobles and Commons: and that the Commons on purpose were to be coiled out with travel or warfare, and exposed to the enemies for to be murdered: and that they were to be kept far off from the City, and as it were confined and sent out of the way: left by being quiet at home, and minding their freedom and Colonies, they should come to suit and devise, both how to dispose of the common grounds, and to give their voices freely. And ever as they could meet with any old beaten souldiers, they would hold them with talk, take them by their hands reckon up how many years they had done service in war, fall to telling of their gashes and scars, asking them what whole place they had left in their bodies to receive new wounds, and what blood was behind to spend and shed, in the quarrel of the M Common wealth? When as by irritating these and such like speeches, both in their private talk and conference, and also other whiles in their publick assemblies, they had turned clean away the hearts of the Commonalty from taking war in hand: the foresaid Aet propounded, was put off until a farther day, and lay fill for the time. Which no doubt, had been nipt in the head, and never would have passed farther, in case it had been referred and subject to the hard opinion and conceit of men, as then they stood affected. In the mean whiles agreed it was, that the military Tribuns should conduct an army into the Volscians country. Cn. Cornelius alone was left at Rome. The three Tribuns after that they perceived the Volscians in no place encamped, and nothing minded to try a battell parted themselves three ways to waste and forrage the frontiers, Valerius he marched to Antium, Cornelius to Ecetra. And every way as they went, they spoiled all before N them, both house and field, and all to amule & keep the Volscians occupied that way, But Fabius them, both house and field, and all to amule & keep the Volscians occupied that way, But Fabius without any forraging at all, came directly to assault Anxur, which was the service most desired, Now Anxur was that, which at this day is called Tarracina: a City seated upon marshes. And on that side Fabius made shew of assault, but having gained the hill that over-looketh and commandeth the town from that higher ground, with a mighty shout and outcry assailed the wall, where it was furnished of guard to defend it. At which sudden alarm, they were amazed who manned the wall of the bale town again: Fabius and suffered them to set ladders to, and to scale. By which means every place was full of enemies, and those that resisted armed and unarmed, one with another. So that, albeit they were too weak, yet forced were they to fight: because in yielding they saw no way but one. But upon proclamation once made that none but armed men should be killed, all the multitude besides willingly were disarmed. Of which number there were upon 2500. taken alive. From the sassage Fabius kept the souldiers, until his Collegues were come: saying that Anxur was taken as well by those armies, which had driven away the rest of the Volscians from the defence of that place, as by themselves. Who being come, the three armies jointly ransacked it, & had the pillage for their labor of that rich town, that had gathered wealth a long time, Which

A Which courtesie and bountifullnes of the commanders, was the first thing that reconciled Commons and Nobles together. Over and besides this ministration of the Rulers, the Nobles also began in a most happy hour to be liberal unto the multitude. For before that either the Commons or Tribuns made the motion, the Senat decreed, that souldiers might have their pay out of the City chamber: whereas before that time, every man in that service had born his own charges. Never was there any thing, by report, so joyfully accepted of the Commons: who ran by heaps together to the Council house: took the Senators by the hands as they came forth, and said, "They were now truly called Patres, Fathers, confessing that now the day was come, that in the quarrel of so bounteous a City, there was no man would to long as his wealth lasted: yet in their limbo of life, seeing that this commoditie they should have to keep their money, that during the time that their bodies were employed, and busily occupied in the defence of the Commonwealth, their private estate should stand at one yet and not decay. And something as it came of themselves, and never moved by any of the Tribuns of the Commons, not a cad dier and craved importunately, by their importune speeches; that was it, that multiplied their joy and made the boon to themselves more acceptable. But the Tribuns of the Commons (who only had not their part in this common joy and concord of all States) came in with their opinions, and said, that it would not prove so joyous and happy to the Nobles in general, as they supposed: that this counte and order taken, was at the first sight better then it would be found in the practice and execution. For how could that money possibly be made and raised but by laying a tribute or due of payment of the people? they were therefore liberal: but of others mens purse. But admit, or say, that the rest would bear it, yet those neither could nor would endure it, who were past war service, and lived upon their pensions and annuities: who would grudge and repine, that others hereafter should serve in war for more gain then they had in their time done; who having been charged with the pay of their own service, should now again be put to contribute to the wages of others. With these words they moved part of the Commonalty. Lall of all, when there was a levy exacted, the Tribuns also proclaimed, that they would bear as many out, as would not contribute to the souldiers pay. The Nobles continued still to maintain that which they had so well begun, and were the first that opened their purses, and for that as yet they had no silver coin, some of them carried gross pieces of brass in Wains, and for that as D house, and made a goodly shew of Contribution. When as the Nobles had most faithfully paid according to the rate of their wealth: the chief of the Commons also, friends of the Nobility, as it was now agreed, began to lay their penny to theirs: whom when the common sort saw both to be commended of the Nobles, and to be admired and revered, of the souldiers as good Citizens: they all upon a sudden, refusing the Tribuns assidue cry, began to strive who should pay first. And the decree or act being once passed, of proclaiming war against the Veientians, the new Tribuns Military led an army to Veio, consisting much upon voluntary souldiers. Now the Tribuns were I. Quintus Capitolinus, P. Quintus Ciceronius, C. Julius Tullus the second time, A. Marcius, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, and M. Emilius MamerCUS. And there were the first that besieged Veio.

E About the beginning of which siege, when the Tuscans held a Council in a solemn assembly at the Temple of Faustina, they could hardly agree upon this point, Whether the Veientians should be defended by general war of the whole Nation, or no. The year following was the second not to hot, by reason that some of the Tribuns, and part of the forces, were called away to the Volscian war. The Tribuns Military in Consil authority, that year were C. Fabius Potinus the third time, M. Sergius Fidenas, P. Cornelius Maluginus, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, C. Fabius Ambustus, Sp. Naevius Rapinus the second time. With the Volscians there was a night field fought between Ferentinum and Ecetra; wherein the Romans had the day. Then the Tribuns began to lay siege to Ardea: a Town of the Volscians: where, by reason of a falling fort by them attempted, the enemies were driven back into the town, and the Romans took occasion and vantage the city, F to break in with them pell mell, and to they won it, save only the Castle. Into this town naturally flocked, a good company of armed men betook themselves: but beneath the Castle, in one place, a man was either slain or taken prisoner. Afterwards was the town besieged all on a sudden, and by assault before, for that there was a guard sufficient to man it: considering the height of the place: nor gave the assailants any hope of yielding, for before the town was lost, they had conveyed all their publick provision or corn into the Castle. So that the Romans had every weariness departed from thence, but that a household army of men, who were in the souldiers at a steep high place, and those were they that won the fortress: for when the warders were by them slain, the rest of the multitude with sudden might were upon the town, and receded. Thus, when both the Castle and town of Ardea was lost and spoiled, the legions were brought back from the Volscians, and all the Roman power employed against Veio. To the traitor or rebel, there was given besides liberty, the pillage of two householders for a reward. And he was ordered after Servilius Reginus, There be that think Anxur was a town of the Veientians, and not of the Volscians: the occasion of which error is, for that there was a town of that name between Cora and Veio. For that town the Roman Kings destroyed, and before it was the Cereses, and not to the Veientians: but this town, whereof we have reported the destruction, was in the country of the Volscians.

"how it would not be only profitable, but also necessary, I will hereafter argue and prove. Now for this time, I list rather to treat and speak of the present condition and state of those, that are employed there in warfare. Which Oration of mine, if it were pronounced, not before you only, but also in the camp, and there answared and fanned of by the very army it self, I suppose, would seem equal, and be received for good and reasonable. Wherein, if nothing else should come in to my head to speak, I would content my self, and rest satisfied with the only speeches given out by the very adversaries. They said of late, I that pay was not to be allowed to the soldiers, for that never before it had been allowed. How then can they now be offended, and so malecontent, if they who have home new commodity coming to them, be enjoined also new labour proportionably? For never lightly is there travel any where without gain, nor gain commonly without travel and employment. Pains and pleasure, things of themselves in nature most unlike, yet by a natural kind of society (I know not how) are linked together. The soldier (aforetime) thought much to bellow his labour & service upon the Common-wealth, at his own proper charges; yet was he glad with all his heart, that one part of the year, he might look to home, husband his land, and get maintenance to find himself and his, both at home in City and abroad in war. Now, taketh he contentment and is well pleased, that the Common-wealth is gainful to him; and with joyful heart receiveth his wages. Let him likewise be content, with patience to forbeare his house and family (since he is at no great charge) somewhat longer than ordinary. Might not the Common-wealth, if he would call him to a reckoning, justly say? Yearly pay thou hast, perform therefore thy yearly service? Dost thou think it reason, to receive full wages for the whole year? and to be employed but six months for it? Much against my Stomach. O Quirites, enforce I this point, and dwell still in this one part of my Oration: for in this wise ought they to reason that have merenary and hired soldiers: but we will use them as fellow Citizens, and think it meet likewise that they entreat us kindly, and speak unto us as to their native Country. Either it behoved us, not to have begun the war at all; or else to proceed forward, now it is begun: yea, and for the honour of the people of Rome, to finish it with all speed possible. And finished it will be, if we press upon our enemies thus besieged: if we depart not where we have accomplished our hope, by the winning of Veii. And surely, if there were no other cause but this, even the very shame and indignity of the thing, might force us to continue siege unto the end. In old time the whole power of Greece laid siege full ten years to one City, and that for one only woman: How far (good god) from their own home? how many lands and seas between? Are we then loth and weary within 30, miles of our dwelling place, and almost in the sight of our own City, to endure the toil of one years siege? Because (forsooth) we have but small cause given us to war: and not griefs enough that might justly provoke us to abide and see the end. Seven times already they have rebelled: In peace never were they true. Our Country have they spoiled and wasted a thousand times. The Fidenates they have caused to revolt from us. Our inhabitants there by us placed, they have slain: and against all law of nations they were the principal instruments of that unworthy and unhuman murder of our Embassadors. All Hetruria would they have raised up against us, and at this day about it they go. And when our Embassadors came to demand amends, they had like to have run upon them and killed them. And ought we then with these kind of men to stand at a bay and to war coldly and by leaseure? But if so just an hatred as this move us not: do these things (I pray you) move whither move you neither? Their City is environed and beleaguered with deep trenches: blocked with mighty fortresses, whereby the enemy is pent up and pinned within his own walls. His fields he cannot till, and what so ever was afore tilled, hath been destroyed by war. If we dislodge and withdraw our army back, who doubteth, but that they (not for desire only of revenge, but upon necessity also and constraint to prey of other mens goods, having lost their own) will invade and over run our country? So that by this means we defer not the war, but bring it within our own borders and confines. But now as touching that which properly indeed concerneth soldiers (of whom our good Tribunes of the Commons would now in all N the halfe seem to have to great regard, from whom erewhile they would have wrested their wages;) but what is that (I say)? A trench they have at a rampart and platform they have raised, (matters of exceeding travel and labour) for about: fortresses at the first a few, but after as their army increased, they have erected very thick in every place. Forts they have built, not only to command the town, but also looking toward Hetruria, to impeach any relief, if any aid should from thence come. What should I speak of the rolling frames and towers, the mantlets and other Fabricks? What should I speak of the Tarraces, Tortoises, Rams, and all other engines of assault and battery? Think ye it meet, that after so great toil and pains taken, now that the works at length are brought to an end, these things should be left and abandoned, that against summer we should be new to begin again, and sweat afresh about the same? How much less travail rather is it to keep these munitions already made? to be instant, and constant to endure, and abide? yea, and to rid our hands of all the care at once? For surely we may soon dispatch the service, if it be played thoroughly and followed on till without stay; and if we ourselves by these intermissions and respites between, make not a long piece of work of it, and draw our hope at length. Thus much of the labour and loss of time. What else? Considering these so many Parliaments, these Diets and Councils continually in Tuscany, about sending aid to Veii, can we forget the danger that we incur by deserting the War? Indeed (as things

A "now presently stand) I confess the Tuscans with the Veientians are angry, they hate them and deny to lend: and for anything by them done, we might win Veii out of hand. But who dare warrant, that if the war be delayed, they will hereafter be of the same mind? Seeing that if the Veientians have any rest and breathing time given them, they are like to send forth their Embassadors, and those more honourable than heretofore. And as the King who newly is set up and created at Veii (the only thing that now offendeth the Tuscans, and the Trojans of themselves are changed for another governor, either by agreement of the State, chiefly to receive the hearts of the Tuscans, or of his own accord: who will not peradventure that he principally intendeth to be hurtful to the safety of his subjects. See how many things, how many in our opinion should be low and ensue upon that course and manner of proceeding. The loss of the City, and the incursions, with so great labour already prepared and at hand, the imminent and present writings of our own borders: the Tuscans war in mind, of the Veientians the imminent and present writings, are much what like to his, that offering a sick man some kind of meat or drink, for the very present to gratifie him withal, to please his palate and to content his taste, neglecteth his disease long, and peradventure incurable: who might have been recovered out of hand, in case that he would have resolutely endured the right cure of a skilful Physician. And surely, if it were not material to the managing of this war in hand, yet would it import much to martial discipline, that our soldiers should be acquainted, not only with the sweet fruit of a victory achieved, but also if occasion required longer time, to abide this tedious, slow, and to wait for the end of their hope, be it never so long; and if war be not finished in summer, to stay for winter: and not as summer birds by and by in the fall of the leaf, to look about and seek for housing, harbour and covert. Consider, I beseech you, and see, The love and pleasure of hunting carrieth men into mountains, woods and forests: through frost and snow, after their game: still not we then be the like inference in the needful exploits of war, which hath pastimes, sports, and delights, are wont to draw and teth out of us? Think we the bodies of our soldiers to be delicate, to be hearts so tender and delicate that they cannot for one winter abide in the climate of their home, but must needs war as men at sea, watching times and seasons, and observing the quarters of the year? Cannot they endure both part, being heat and chilling, cold? They would shiver and be abashed verily, if a man should therewith charge them, that they would stand still in this, and touch, That they had both in body and mind manlike tolerance and patience: and that they were soldiers as well for winter as summer: and that they yet not the Tuscans were, for their patronage of cowardice and shelter of idleness: but remembered well enough, that their forefathers were not under shade for fear of sun-burning, nor had their bones over their heads for taking cold, when they first created and ordained that magistracy of Tribunes. This rather is becoming the valour of your soldiers, this fitteth well the name of Romans not to shew their eye upon Veii only, and this war now in hand, but to seek for fame and glory both by their exploits, and also with other nations in time to come. And think ye that there would ensue hereupon a small crack of credit, and hazzard of reputation? Would ye have the mighty nations confining upon us, conceive thus of the people of Rome, That a City could receive their first brunt, and abide their assault for a very small while, it need not alter to fear any more. Or rather should not this dread and terror of our name spread all abroad, both far and near? That no wearisomness of long siege and assault, no violence of bitter winter, is able to rattle the Roman army from any town once by them invested? as knowing no other end of war but victory, and whole manner of service is not by way of violent force more, then of obstinate continuance, which (as in all other military occasions) for in besieging of Cities is most needful: the greatest number whereof, being either by strong bulwarks and other fortifications, or by natural situation impregnable, yet by famine, by hunger and thirst, procs and trait of time on ye doth force and overthrow. As it will (I doubt not) Veii at length: unless the Tribunes of the commonalty favour our enemies: unless that the Veientians find relief and aid at Veii, which they seek in vain throughout all Hetruria. For can there ought happen to the Veientians, which is wished for, as that first the City of Rome should be full of variance, and then the Camp, as it were by a contagion from thence) as full of mutinies? But contrariwise I shure you, amongst the enemies, so good order there is and government, that neither the redemption of a siege, nor yet the loathing of Kingly rule, hath caused any stir or commotion among them. Nor the denial of help from the Tuscans hath one whit troubled and discomfited their minds: nor the die be shall forthwith, that is the author of sedition. Neither shall any man therein be suffered to speak those words, which are spoken here amongst you without any punishment or controlling. He deserteth the ballando, to be dry beaten and well called that to flinch his Colours, or departeth from his guard and quarter. But here, in open assemblies, they that persuade and counsel not one or two soldiers, but whole armies to leave their standards and ensigns, and abandon the very camp, have audience with applause. Informeth, that who so ever a Tribune of the Commons speaketh, although it were to beray the City, and undo the whole State, yet is he not to be hearken and give good ear to him: and being raised and carried away with the sweetness of that authority, ye suffer under it to link any mischief whatsoever. There remaineth now no more but this, that the words they give out here with open mouth, the same they might iterate in the camp among the soldiers, to corrupt the army, and not suffer them to obey their Captains. For to such licentious liberty they are grown at Rome, that they fear and reverence neither:

"neither Cuncel nor Magistrate, neither Laws nor ancient Customs, neither Decree of Senators, nor yet the Discipline of Military service.

Now was Appius with his Orations good enough for the Tribuns, and able to meet them at every turn: But Vet (a thing that no man would have thought) a loss and foil received before Vet in de Appius to have the better hand of the cause, wrought a greater unity among the States, and kindled an ardent desire to assail Vet more hotly, and to besiege it with more resolution. For when they had raised up a mount near unto the City, and approached in a manner to the walls thereof, with their rolling towers and roofed mantlets, whiles (Hay) they were not so vigilant in the night season to tend and watch their Fabricks, as they were buke and earnest in the day time to rear and plant them; behold, all of a sudden the enemies opened a gate and aimed in great numbers, especially with burning firebrands, set all on a light fire: and in the space of one hour consumed both the mount and the mantlets, which had cost so long time in making. And many a man besides that came to help (but in vain) by sword and fire lost his life. Which being reported at Rome, made all men heavy and sad, and caused the Senators to take care and fear, how upon this accident, they might possibly prevent and stay, either commotion in City, or mutiny in camp: doubting lest that the Tribuns would have insinued over the Common-weal, as if they had gotten a great conquest. At what time, they that were by calling Gentlemen and so assailed, and had no hopes of service assigned them from the City, after some consultation together among themselves, suddenly came into the Senat: and having liberty granted of speech, promised to serve in the wars with hostes of their own. After that the Senat had right honourably thanked and given them the most gracious words, the news thereof was no sooner bruited through the market place and whole City, but behold, all on a sudden the Commons came running unto the Council house, saying, that as they were then to serve as footmen, so they offered their service to the Commonweal extraordinarily without murthering, whether they should be led either to Vet, or to any other place whatsoever. And if they were conducted to Vet, they would not return again (they say) from thence, before they had won that City from their enemies. At which words, the Senators so exceedingly joyed above measure, that hardly they could temper themselves. For they took not order, as they did by the Gentlemen and horsemen afore, that they should be praised by the mouth of the Magistrates thereto appointed, nor called them into the Council house, there to give them an answer, neither could they keep themselves within the Council house door. But every one of them in his own behalf, so well as he could signified from aloft, both by word of mouth, and gesture of hand, unto the multitude standing in the Comitium, a general joy conceived: saying, That the City of Rome in that concord and unity would be happy, invincible, and perpetual: commending the horsemen, praising the footmen, extolling and magnifying that very day, and confessing that now they had surpassed the courtesie and bounty of the Senat. So that Nobles and Commons both, for joy were again who could weep most, until the Senators were recalled into the Court: where a decree was made, That the Tribuns Military should assemble the people, and give thanks both to horsemen and footmen, and promise in the name of the Senat, that they would be mindful of their affectionate kindness to their Country: and to signify that it was their pleasure, that they all, who had offered extraordinary service to willing, should have their pay notwithstanding: yea, and for the horses also there were assigned a certain rate and proportion of wages. This was the first time that the Gentlemen began to serve on horseback for money. This voluntary army marched to Vet, and not only repaired again the works which had been destroyed, but also went in hand to erect new. And from the City was provision of victual brought, with greater care of convey than afore, that nothing might be wanting to an army so well delivering of the Common-weal.

The year following for their Military Tribuns in Consuls authority, C. Servilius Hala the third time, Q. Servilius P. Virginus, Q. Sulpicius A. Maenius the second time, and M. Servius the second time. In these Tribuns time, whiles every mans care was bent to the Veientian war, the fort of Auxur being neglected, by occasion that the garrison soldiers were disbanded and ranged much abroad, and commonly received Volcian Merchants into the town, was suddenly surprised, by reason that the warders of the gates were betrayed. Less company of soldiers there were slain: because that all of them (besides those that were sick) found themselves occupied and traded all the country over, and in the Cities adjoining, like to lawless lackies that follow the Camp. Neither was there better success at Vet, wherein retired the chief care now, of all their publick affairs. For not only the Roman Captains were more angered one at another, than courageous against the enemy: but also the forces of the enemies were encreased by the sudden coming of the Captains and the Falisci. Which two nations of Hetruria, because they inhabited next, supposing when Vet should be forced and lost, that their turn would be next to be warred upon by the Romans: and the Faliscians besides, upon a special grudge and old quarrel of their own, for that aforetime in the Fidenat war, they had intermeddled and interessed themselves, sent their Embassadors to and fro, and by binding themselves by a solemn oath one to the other, came unlooked for with their power to Vet. And by chance they assailed that side and quarter, where M. Servius a Military Tribun had the charge of a fence. Who gave a great alarm and caused exceeding fright: because the Romans supposed certainly that all Hetruria was raised out of every part, and there presents, with all the power they could make. The same imagination animated the Veientians also within the City, to make a fall. So was the Camp of the

A the Romans assailed on both sides. And whiles they ran together up and down, and turned their enigma every way, and could hardly keep the Veientians within the strength of their fortifications, nor yet repulse the violence from their own fortifications and ramparts, and defend themselves from their foreign enemies behind: their only hope was to have help from the greater legions: that the legions in sundry places might make head, some against the Capenates and the Falisci, others against the tally of the townsmen. But Virginus had the charge of that main camp, one that bare a privat grudge and inward malice against Servius, and was hated again of him. This man, when word was brought that most of the Fabricks and buttresses were shattered, that the ramparts and trenches were won, and that the enemies on both sides charged busily, kept his

B soldiers well appointed in arms: saying, that if there were any need of help, his colleague should lend unto him, if he would. And he for his part was not so arrogant and insolent, but the other was as pensive and willful. Who because he would not seem to seek into his adversity, nor crave aid at his hand, chose rather to be vanquished of his enemy, than to overcome him by help of a fellow-Citizen. Thus between them for a good while the poor soldiers went to wrack, and were slain. At the last, forsaking their ramparts, a very few of them escaped into the main camp. But the most part, with Servius himself, went thorough to Rome. Where when he had laid all the fault upon his fellow in government, it was thought good that Virginus should be sent for out of the camp: and that in the mean while their Deputie, and Lieutenant should command the forces. Hereupon was the matter debated in the Senat, and the two Tribuns kept a

C taunting and reviling: and many hard terms were dealt between them. Few there were that rendered the common good, but took part either with the one or the other, as each of them were fancied and beloved. Howbeit the LL. of the Senat thought good, howsoever that so shameful chance happened either through the default, or unhappy fortune of the Captains, not to expect the ordinary full time of the election, but that presently there should be new Tribuns military created, to enter into their office on the Calends of October. To which opinion when they were all agreed, the other Tribuns military nothing grieved it. But Servius and Virginus (for whose sake it appeared that the Senat was weary of the Magistrates that year) at the first made means to bring them not to disgrace and discredit them soon afterward away to cross the decree: saying that they would give over their place, before the Ides of December, which was the last and final day of entering yearly into new offices. Amid this business, the Tribuns of the Commons, who had kept silence even against their wills, so long as men were at unity and the affairs of the City prospered, upon a sudden brake out and threatened sharply the two Tribuns Military, that unless they would submit themselves, and rest in the authority of the Senat, they would commit them to ward. Then C. Servilius Hala, a Military Tribun, stood up and said, As for you and your threats, O ye Tribuns of the Commons, in good faith, I would gladly see once that there were no more power and authority in these here, then will and tomack in you. But who teacheth not that there is no striving against the authority of the Senat? And therefore hold ye content: and forbear

D you to seek opportunity and occasion upon our variance to offer wrong. And my brethren let their parts shall either do that which the Senat thinketh good: or else if they shall continue E stubborn still in their contumacy, I will presently nominate a Dictator, to force them to leave their office. This speech was approved with a general accord. And the Senators being glad that without the terrors and affrightments of the Tribuns authority, there was found out another greater power to bridle magistrates: the two military Tribuns afore said, were overweighed with the consent of all parties, and held a new election of military Tribuns, to begin their government on the Calends of October: and before that day they resigned up their places. Thus were L. Valerius Potitus the fourth time, M. Furius Camillus the second time, M. Aemilius Mancinus the third time, Cn. Cornelius Cossus the second time, C. Fabius Ambulstus, and L. Julius Tellus, Tribuns military in Consuls authority.

In whose time many worthy Acts were performed both at home and abroad. For not only F they had war in sundry places at one time, namely at Vet, at Capena, against Faliscians, and with the Volscians, to the end that Auxur might be won again and recovered from the enemies: but at Rome also, what about murtherers and paying the tribute for soldiers pay there was much trouble. Besides, there was some variance, about taking in certain Tribuns of the Commons to the ret: and the two arraignments of those, who a little before had governed in Consuls authority, caused no small stir. But the principal care of the Tribuns military, was that the murther should go forward. Neither were the younger fort and serviceable men only prest forth, but the elder also compelled to give their names, and to keep watch and ward in the City. But look how much greater was the number of soldiers, so much more money they needed for their payment. And the same was levied by a contribution: but unwillingly of as many as carried at home. For that besides the levy G they were enjoined to become soldiers also in defence of the City and to serve in person for the Commonwealth. These things, grievous as they were of themselves, to be the seditious Orations of the Tribuns in their assemblies, they seemed more grievous and heavy. Who argued and discoursed thus, That wages was appointed for soldiers to this end, only that what by warfare, and what with exactions and impositions, they might undo the Commons, and make an end of them at once for ever. One war (say they) hath now continued three years, and the time, for the purpose, ill managed, that it might be drawn out the longer. Again, in one murther there were armies enrolled for no fewer than four wars, whereunto bareheaded boyes and old craven men, "were taken up and haled forth. Now there was no difference of winter or summer: so as the poor Commons at no time can have any rest. Who now at last are taxed also and raked to the uttermost, so that after they have brought home with their bodies overtoiled with travel, weakened with wounds, and last of all, wasted and spent with age: and finding all things at home unhusbanded by reason of the long absence of the masters and owners, they must beain to pay tribute even out of their poor decayed quick flock, and repay again with great ulury to the Common-wealth, their wages received in war, as it were upon interest.

Between the mutters of one side, and the levy of souldiers pay on the other side, and their minds occupied about greater affairs, at the election of Tribuns of Commons, the number could not fully be made up: Whereupon there was great labour made, that into the rooms that were void, there should be some of the Nobility taken in and admitted. When that could not be obtained, yet to impeach and overthrow the Tribuns law, it was effected or brought to pass that they should assume unto them for Tribuns of the Commons, C. Lacerius, and Marcus Attilius, by the might and practise no doubt of the Patritii. It hapned, so that the same year C. Trebonius was a Tribun of the Commons, who would seem to undertake the patronage and defence of the Law Trebonia, and discharge it as a duty to that name and house belonging. He spake aloud and said, "That whereas the Tribuns Military had won that, whereof some of the Nobles had born the repute in their first suit, and that the Law Trebonia was disannulled, in that certain Tribuns of the Commonalty were taken into their fellows, not by suffrages and free voices of the people, but by the rule and commandment of the Nobles: and that the matter was come to that pass, that either Noble men, or their favourites and followers were to become Tribunes of the Commons: that their sacred laws were taken from them perforce, and the Tribuns authority writted from out of their hands by violence: all these inconveniencies he complained to have hapned through the fraudulent practise of the Nobles: and the mischievous lewdness and treachery of his own companions in office. Thus whilst there grew great heart-burning among them, and that not the Nobles only, but also the Tribuns of the Commons, as well they, which were elected, as they that were electors, were hardly thought of by the people: Then three of the Company, P. Curiatius, M. Attilius, and Munatius, fearing some fireward turn, like to fall upon Sergius and Virginius, (the Tribuns military of the former year) and by serving process, giving them a day to answer, turned from themselves the anger and displeasure of the Commons, upon those two persons: publishing openly, "That whosoever were grieved for the mutters and the Tribute, whosoever thought the war long, and the continual soldiery tedious, whosoever sorrowed for the damage and discomfiture received at Vei, whosoever for the loss of their Children, Brethren, Kinsfolk, or any of their alliance had heavy and mournful honies: to them they offered liberty and power to vent their publick and privat grief, upon these two guilty persons and offenders, Sergius and Virginius, the very causes of all the mischiefs and calamities that were hapned. For why? the adversary charged them with no more then was confessed by the very parties: who finding themselves both faulty, laid the blame one upon the other: whilst Virginius reproached Sergius with running away, and Sergius laid treason to Virginius; his charge, in that he denied his help in time of need. For to say they were both of them so inconsiderate and foolish, were to speak beyond all compass of belief. But much more likely it was, that there was some packing rather, and that the matter was contrived, and practised of set purpose, and by an ordinary and common fraudulent plot of the Patritii. By whose means both at the first the Veientians gat opportunity to fire their works, thereby to draw out and prolong the war, and also now the army was bought and sold, and the Roman camp betrayed to the Volscians. And all this to no other end, but that the youth and flower of the City might wax old at Vei, and that the Tribuns might not propose and consult with the people about the distribution of lands, or any other commodities of the poor Commons, or in frequent and full assembly of Citizens intend and follow their publick actions, and withstand the conspiracy of the Gentry and Nobles. Moreover there is already (say they) a prejudice passed against these offenders, both by the Senat and people of Rome, and also by their Colleagues. For as they were displaced and deposed from their office, by an Act of the Senat: so when they refused to give over, they were for fear of a Dictator forced by their own companions to resign up their government: and the people of Rome had created other Tribuns military to enter into their charge, not upon the usual day which was in the Ides of December, but forthwith in the Calends of October: as who would say, the Common-wealth had not been able to stand any longer, if these men had remained still in place. And yet for all this, these persons thus convicted and fore-condemned by so many prejudices, come now to be judged of the people: thinking they are sufficiently omit, and discharged, yea, and have suffered punishment enough, in that they were two months sooner then ordinary, made private persons; and peevish not, that thereby was taken from them the power only to do any harm, and no punishment inflicted upon them. For as much as even their very Colleagues, who had not offended, were likewise discharged as well as they: Let the Quirites therefore and people of Rome take that heart to them again, whilst they had upon the late overthrow, fresh and bleeding new, when they beheld the army running in fearful flight, fore wounded and agave, arriving at the gates, blaming no fortune, nor any of the gods, but only their two brave leaders. And as for us, we know assuredly that there is not one of all them here presently assembled, who that day cursed

The invective speech of C. Trebonius against Sergius and Virginius.

* The 13 day of December.

A "sed not in his heart and detested the head, the house, and whole estate of L. Virginius, and M. Sergius. Neither is it convenient, that upon whom, erewhile every man prayed that the anger and vengeance of God would light against them now when they both may and ought, they should not extend their full power with rigour. Since that even the very gods never lay hand themselves upon unners and offenders: but it sufficeth that they arm the wronged and oppressed persons with means and opportunity of revenge. The Commons upon these speeches notwithstanding that Sergius pleaded for himself, blamed the common fortune of war, and laid all upon fortune: and Virginius besought them (but both in vain) that he might not be more unhappy, and speed worse at home, than abroad in war. Thus the peoples wrath being directed upon the Tribuns also, and of detesting the remembrance both of the assumption and admitting having got the upper hand, to the end that the Commonalty might have a present reward for warding this doom, publish the Law Apparia, and forbid the levying of the Subsidy for souldiers pay: seeing there was need of pay for so many armies: and sped so well they had, in the managing of warfare, as they were like to come to an end, without any waiting at all. For at Vei the peery camp which was lost, being recovered again, was fortified with strong bulwarks and furnished with good guards. The Tribuns Military, M. Aemilius and Q. Fabius, had the charge there. And as for M. Furius in the Faliscan, and Cn. Cornelius in the Capen Country they could meet with none enemies without their town walls. But they drive away booties, and waited their man: by firing their villages and their corn: but as for their towns, they neither assaulted nor besieged them. But in the Volscian country, after their territory was wasted, Aurula also was assaulted (but in vain) for that it was situate on high. Whereupon Valerius Potitus, who had the charge of that province, seeing that force would not prevail, began by trench and rampart to lay siege to it, and in effect it round. The affair of war abroad standing in these teams, there arose domelie strife and sedition at home: and the time was followed more cruelly and with greater ado than the wars were managed without. And when by reason of the Tribuns there could no subsidies and exaction be gathered, nor money for souldiers pay sent to the Generals, and that the souldiers, asked on other hand, were hardly for their wages: the camp also had like to have been troubled and infected with the contagion of those civil mutinies. During these heats and angry fits of the Commons against the Nobles, albeit the Tribuns of the people laid, That now the time was come of establishing their freedom, and translating the chiefest dignity from the Sergius and Virginius, to the Commoners, such as were men of valour and action: Yet they prevailed no more then thus, that one only of the Commonalty, (as it were to make trick and take possession in the right of that dignity) Jo. Wit. P. Licinius Censor, should be created Tribun Military with Consults authority: the rest were all of the Nobility, Pub. Manlius, and P. Titinius, P. Melius, L. Furius Medullinus, and L. Papirius Polseus. The very Commons themselves marvelled that they had obtained to great a thing, and not he only who was created, a man that aforetime had never been in place, and born no magistraty, yet an ancient Councillor of State, an elderly person and well E steep in years. Neither as yet is it for certain known, why he first and above all others was counted a meet man to have handled, or make essay of this new dignity and promotion. Some think, that for his brother Cn. Cornelius his sake, who had been the year afore a Tribun Military, and had given to the horsemen triple pay, he was through favour drawn in, and called to to great honour. Others, for that himself had picked out a convenient time, and made a plausible Oration, that both Nobles and Commons liked very well, concerning the agreement and unity of the States, The Tribuns of the Commons, rejoicing highly for this their victory in the Election, remitted and called in the inhibition of the subsidy or imposition afore said, the thing that most of all prejudiced the service of the Common-wealth. By means whereof punishment was made in all dutiful obedience, and sent it was unto the army. Then within short time was Janner in the Volscians neglected. This was a year notable and famous for the cold and watchy winter, for as the high ways were choaked up, and Tiberus was unnavigable: Howbeit, by reason of provision brought in beforehand, the price of corn arose not. And for became P. Licinius, as he ended his government without any troubles, and with greater joy and contentment of the Commons than in his former time: so also ruled and executed it all the year long accordingly: therefore their teeth watered at the new election also, to make Tribuns military of their own body. Only M. Furius, of all the Nobility that stood in suit for the dignity, had a place among them. But as for the other Tribuns Military in Consultal authority, all the Centuries in a manner, chose Commoners, to Wit. L. Titinius, P. Aemilius Barbula, Cn. Genucius, and L. Attilius.

G After this hard Winter, either by reason of a distemperance and disposition of the weather, suddenly changed to a contrary, or upon some other hidden and unknown cause, there followed presently contagious and dangerous summer, by occasion of a pestilence common to all kind of living creatures. Of which in urable malady, when as neither the reason of the found, nor any and thereof seen. The Books of Syllabus were by a decree of the Senat perused, and Divinities appointed for Divine Rites and Ceremonies, by celebrating a Lustrum (then first instituted in the City of Rome) to appease and pacifie Apollon, Liberus, and Diana. Hercules, Mercure, and Nephtis: sealed them (as it were) for the space of eight days together, & for that purpose they met one

A mid these affairs there came Embassadors from the Volscians and Aequians to treat for peace, and peace obtained they, rather because the city, wearied with continual wars, might now take itself rest and be quiet, than for any defects of them that fued for it. After Vej was taken, the year following had six Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, two C. Caninius, namely, Cajus and Scipio, M. Valerius Maximus; the second time, C. Fabius Ambulx for the second time, L. Etrius Atilius for the second time, and Q. Servilius the third time. Unto the Consul Caninius out by lot the Volscians can war to Valerius and Servilius the Capenates. Who neither assaulted the cities by force, nor were in the cities with flege; but foraged the countries, and drove booke away of such things as were in the fields, not atree that bareth fruit, not any fruitful things bodied, cleaped their hands. This diffirelle and calamity fufed the Capenates: who thereupon fued for peace, and had it granted. But amongst the fallacious the war continued fill. In the meantime, at Rome there were hungry feditions. For the appeasing whereof, it was thought good to fend a Colony to Volfer, and thither three the land citizens were appointed in cheekroll. And Triumvirs were thereto choien, who divided to every man three acres of ground and a half, and one twelfth part. That began to be depofited, because they thought it but a poor comfort offered to ftop their mouths withall, and to put them belide a greater hope. For they thought the Commons beuent away into the Volscians land, seeing there was Vej within their eye-fight, a moft fair city, and the land about more plentiful and larger than that of Rome.? And as forthe city it felf, they preferred it, either for the site, or fate of privat or publick buildings and other places, before the city of Rome. Moreover a motion allo was made (which, after that Rome was won by the French, was more hotly followed) concerning a General tranfmigration and removing to Vej for ever. Many thies intended that Vej fhould be inhabited, partly by the Commons, and partly by the Nobility: faying, That the people of Rome might well growe in habit two cities jointly in one state of Commonwealth. Against all this, the LL. of the Senat laboured what they might, and plainly faid, they would fower dye in the fight of the people of Rome, than any of thofe matters fhould palle. For why? if there were now in none: city to much diffention, what would there be in twain? Would any man be mad, as yet to prefer a conquered city, before his own country that had conquered the fame? and fufured Vej after it is won to be in better eftate then it was afore, even when it was at the bell? Finally well might they be fortaken at home in their own country by their Citizens, but to forfike their country and Citizens, they would never be brought by any force whatfoever. They would not follow to Vej, T. Sestius as his founder, for he amongst the Volscians of the Commons perfwaded this Act, and leave their good Roman nation of the Y, thence the father and begginner of the city of Rome. Whiles these matters were in handling with folemn fpeach and much debate and variance (for the nobles had won to their opinion more of the Tribunes

the Gauls to the Embassadors
of Rome.

[illegible][illegible]

The Roman soldiers that lay in garrison there, had espied these Tuscans ranging about the country, and gathered together in a body to drive booties alore them: and withal they derided their Camp pitched not far from Veii. Where, at first they pitted their own estate; but after, they fell into an indignation and anger that the Tuscans also, from whom they had diverted the Gauls was upon themselves, should in their calamities thus scorn them and have them in derision: so as they could scarcely temper themselves and forbear, but presently set upon them. But being stayed perforce by Captain Cedius, a Centurion whom they themselves had made their Ruler, they put off this exploit until night: Only their Commander and Leader was not to be compared with Camilus: else all the service was achieved in the same order, and with as good speed and happy success. Over and besides, by the guidance and direction of those prisoners which remained in prison over-night, they went forward as far as Salus, to another power of the Tuscans, and in the night following, upon a sudden they made a greater havoc and slaughter of them, and so in joyous manner with double conquest they return to Veii. At Rome in this mean time, the siege for the most part was but cold and slack, and all quiet on both sides: whilst the Gauls regarded and looked to this only. That none of their enemies should make an escape through their guards. At what time a certain valiant young Roman behaved himself so, as his own countrymen and enemies too had him in great admiration. There was a fee sacrifice or solemnity to be celebrated by the house and lineage of Fabius in the Mount Quirinalis. For the accomplishment whereof, Caius Fabius Dorso in his holy robes after the Gabinus fashion, bearing in his hand the holy complements thereto belonging, came down from the Capitol, passed through the midst of the enemies corps de guard, and nothing moved whatsoe'er was done or said to terrify him, went on forth right to the mount Quirinal. And when he had there performed and dispatched all solemnities, returning the same way with like constant countenance and comely pace, hoping assuredly, that the gods would be merciful and gracious unto him, whose worship he had not left undone for any fear of death: he retired again to his company into the Capitol: whether it were that the Gauls were at death at his wondrous boldness, or rather were touched in conscience with a reverent regard of Religion, wherein that nation is very zealous and devout. At Veii in the mean while they gathered not only heart every day more than other, but strength and forces also; for that not only Romans thither repaired out of the country, such as either in discomfiture of the battell, or for the calamity of the City now taken, had been scattered: but also out of Lutium divers of their own accord had flocked thither, to have their share in the pillage. Now they thought it high time to return to their country again and to deliver it out of the enemies hands. The body was strong enough, but without an head it was. The very place put them in mind of Camilus, and a great part of the soldiers were such as had achieved prosperous exploits under his leading and conduct. And Cedius gave out plainly, that no god or man should make him give over his government, but would himself as mindfull of his own place, call for a General. So by general consent it was agreed, that Camilus should be sent for from Ardea, but with the advice before of the Senat which was at Rome. So modest were they in all their carriage, and so precisely observed they (even in their desperate case) the due respect and regard of every action. Now to pass through the wards of their enemies, was an hard and dangerous adventure. To this exploit therefore, Pontius Cominius, a valorous young man, promised his service. Who bearing himself upon a bark or corke under him, hulled along the Tiber down the water to the City: and to the next way from the strand, over a steep cliff (which was negligently or not at all guarded by the enemy) he passed through the Capitoll, and being brought to the Magistrates, declareth there his message from the Army. When he had received the Senates decree to this effect: In primis, That Camilus should be called back again out of exile by a Ward-leet, or the suffrages of the Curia: Item, that by the voices of the people he should be created Dictator out of hands: and that the soldiers might have for their General whom they desired: the messenger returned the same way back again to Veii. And Embassadors were sent to Camilus at Ardea, who conducted him to Veii. But I would rather believe that he departed not from Ardea, before he had certain intelligence of the Act of the Senat. And for that neither without the will of the people, he might change the place whereto he was confined, nor unless he were named Dictator, have the conduct of the Army: there passed an Act of all the Wards, and Dictator was he declared in his absence. While these things were a doing at Veii, the Cattle of Rome and the Capitoll was in very great danger. For the Gauls, either having found out a mans footing, that way as the messenger went from Veii, or espied at the cliff of Cominius, an easy place to climb up: in a clear night sent a man before unarmed to assay the passage, & then gave him up his arm, and where it was steep, one helped, lifted up, and drew up another, as the difficulty of the place required. So as they got up to the top with such silence, that not only the Sentinels were not aware of them; but also the dogs (a watchfull creature at every noise in the night) were not once awakened thereby. But they could not to escape the people, which were encircled into Ardea, and for all the scarcity of victuals, were pined and not killed up. And this it was that saved them all. For with their gazing and fluttering, of their wings, Ardea, who three years before had been Consul a right hardy and noble warrior, was awaked. Who taking weapon in hand, speedily went forth and raised the rest to take arms. And whilst all else made halt in a great fright, he stroke the Gauls who now stood upon the top, with the boss and pike of his buckler, and turned him down. The fall of whom overturned them that were

A were next. Then slew he others, (whiles they were in fear) who had laid their weapons out of hand, and took hold of the stones whereto they clinged close. By which time, the rest being come together, some flinging darts, others casting down stones, tumbled their enemies back, and the whole power of them lost their sure footing and fell down headlong. This tumult being appeared the rest of the night (so far forth as men might with troubled minds, seeing that even the danger, past disquieted them) they gave themselves to sleep. When day was come, the soldiers by sound of Trumpet were summoned to assemble before their Tribunes, and considering there was reward due both to well-doing and mis-doing; Manlius first for his valour was commended and rewarded, not only by the Tribunes military, but also by consent of all the soldiers. Upon whom, B they amongst them all, bestowed and brought home to his house (which stood upon the Cattle hill) wheat-meal by the half-pints, and wine by the quarts. A matter of small reckoning to be spoken of: but in that scarcity this might be an argument of their love and affection, when every man beguiled his own belly, plucked from himself and the necessities of his life, and conferred the same to the honour and recompence of that one man. Then were summoned to appear the sentinels of that place where the enemy climbed up undetected. And when as P. Sulpicius a Tribune Military, had pronounced that he would exercise martial law upon them all, the soldiers cried out with open mouth, and laid all the fault on one watchman: and so for fear of a mutiny he spared all the rest: and with their general consent and approbation, he caused that undoubted guilty perion to be thrown down from the rock. Whereupon they were more careful and circumspect C in their watch, both amongst the Gauls (because it was commonly noised that there passed messengers to and fro between Veii and Rome: and also amongst the Romans, for the remembrance of the late danger by night. But above all other miseries that follow war and siege, the famine was fore in both the Armies. The Gauls were plagued with pestilence besides: for that they had pitched their tents in place lying between two hills; exceeding hot by reason of the fires, and full of smok, carrying both dust and ashes, when any wind was stirring: which be things that of all others, that nation cannot abide, as being used to wet and cold. Thus being smothered with heat, and therewith stifled and choaked again, they died with contagious diseases like rotten sheep. And now for idleness that they would not bury them severally one by one; they laid the dead bodies on heaps one with another, and to burnt them: and made that place famous and notable by the name of Busta Gallica, i.e. Gaulbury. Hereupon, they grew to make some truce with the Romans, and empared together by succurance of the Generals. In which parties, when as the Gauls very often alledged the famine, and upon that extremity perswaded them to yield: it is said, that the Romans for to put them by that opinion of them, in many places from the Capitoll flung out loaves of bread into the very stations and corps de guard of the enemies. But at length neither could their hunger be dissembled, nor sustained any longer. Therefore, whilst the Dictator mustered a power at Ardea by himself, he commanded the General of horsemen L. Valerius, to have away the Army from Veii: and maketh so good preparation, and furnisheth himself so, as he might be able to match his enemies, and to charge upon them. In the mean season the army of the Capitoll wearied out with watching and warding, having fountained all humane miseries besides E hunger, which only of all others, nature would not suffer to be over come: looking day by day for succour from the Dictator now at last when not only their food, but their hope also failed them, and were grown to that weakness, that when they went to keep their guard, they could hardly bear the weight of their armour, they agreed and gave consent either to yield or to ransom themselves upon any condition, they cared not what. Whiles the Gauls also gave forth plainly, and said, they might be entreated for a small consideration to give over siege. Then the Senat went together, and gave Commission to the Tribunes Military, to bargain and go through with them. So by a parley or treaty had between P. Sulpicius Tribune Military, and Publius the Duke of the Gauls, a conclusion was made, and that people, who within a short time should be Lords of the world, were valued and esteemed at a thousand pound weight of Gold. This in itself was F a most odious and shameful thing, but there was adjoynd thereto a foul indignity. For English, the Gauls brought forth false weights and uneven balances. And when the Tribune red them, behold, the insolent and proud Gaul would needs have his sword weighed too for vantage, adding this speech moreover, (which was intolerable for the Roman to hear) Woe worth me conquered, and down with them I'll. But neither God nor man would abide the Romans to be ranomed. For by good hap, before that shameful sum of money by composition was paid, before (I say) that upon some wrangling that fell between, all the Gold was weighed out, cometh the Dictator in the manner, and commandeth the gold to be had away, and the Gauls to void. And when as they made resistance and pleaded the capitulation and bargain, he again repeth, and saith, That the composition was not good, nor ought to stand, which after he was made G Dictator had been by an inferior Magistrate concluded, without his commandment & warrant: and withal warneth the Gauls to prepare themselves to fight: commanding his own soldiers to call all their bag and baggage down on a heap, to put on their harness, to make ready their weapons, and by dint of steel, and not by weight of sword to redeem their Country, having in fight before their eyes the Churches of their gods, their wives and children, and the soil whereon the City stood (deformed now with miseries of war) and all things else which they ought by good reason to defend, recover, and be revenged for. Hereupon he marshalled his battell as the ground ground would give him leave, being the plot only of a City half ruin'd and lying along, and without of it itself naturally uneven. For setting and providing for all things with special choice and preparation to serve his soldiers turn, as far as martial skill could possibly reach. The Gauls surpris'd at this to strange an occurrence, betook them to their weapons, and in a furious fit of anger rather than with any considerate discretion, they ran upon the Romans. Now had Fortune turn'd her wheel: now Gods help and mans policy assisted the Romans. Therefore at the first encounter the Gauls were discomfited with as little difficulty, as they themselves had achieved the victory at Albia. Afterwards also, in another more let battell in the way of Gabres, about eight miles from Rome (to which place they were fled) they were vanquished by the conduct and leading of the same Camillus. For there were they slain in every place, their Camp taken and not so much as one left to bring news of their overthrow. The Dictator having thus deliver'd his Country out of the enemies hand, returneth again with triumph into the City. And in all the sports and pleasant ditties which the soldiers rudely after their manner devised, he was filed Asmulus the saviour of the Country, the second founder of the City, which were no vain titles of commendation.

When he had sav'd his Country thus in war, he preferred it afterwards again undoubtedly in time of peace, namely in gainingaying their transmigration to Ven: whilst both the Tribunes enorced that matter more earnestly, now after the burning of the City, and the Commons also of themselves were more inclin'd thereunto, than before. Which was one cause, that after his triumph he resign'd not up his Dictatorship: being requested also by the Senat not to leave the City in doubtful terms of perplexity. And first and foremost (as he was evermore a most precise devout man and religious) he propos'd those things which concern'd the immortal gods: and causeth an act of the Senat to be made, Imprimis, that all the Temples, for that the enemies had held and possessed them / should be repaired, bounded out new, and purged. Item, that the manner of cleansing them, should be search'd out of the books of Syllabus by the Dumviris. Moreover, that with the inhabitants of Cere, there should be made a league of publike and mutual hospitality, for receiving the sacred Images and Priests of the people of Rome: by the means and favour of which people, the honour and service of the immortal gods was not forelet and discontinued.
Item, That there should be set out the Plaies called Capitoline, for that Jupiter Optimus Maximus had fill defend'd and preserv'd his own feat, and the Refuge of the people of Rome in that fearful time of trouble. And that M. Furius should ordain a guild, or fraternity out of those that dwell in the hill of the Capitol, for the celebration of those plaies. Finally, to the end there should be also some satisfaction and expiation made of that night voice which being the fore-messenger and warning-giver of their destruction before the coming of the Gauls, was heard and yet neglected, a motion was made, that a Temple should be erected in the new way to Am Locum. The Gold which was recovered by force from the Gauls, as also that which out of other Temples in that fearful hurly-burly, was brought into the chancel or chapel of Jupiter, because they could not call to mind precisely into which Churches they were to carry it again accordingly, was all judg'd holy and sacred to Jupiter: and order taken that it should be bestowed and laid up under his shrine. And how devout the City was, appear'd before in this, That when there was not gold enough in the common chest, to make up the full sum of the ransom that was agreed upon between them and the Gauls, they took that which the matrons and wives of Rome contributed, and all to spare and save the gold appointed to holy uses. The Matrons were therefore thanked, and this honour besides done unto them, That after their death they as well as their husbands, should be openly praised in a solemn funeral Oration. When those things were once accom-plish'd which appertain'd to the Gods, and all that belonged to the Senat or to do: then and not afore, upon the first that the Tribunes kept with the Commons continually, with their tie-ties in all their assemblies, soliciting them to leave the ruins of the City and to remove with all they had to Ven: a town readily furnished to their hand: then / they and not before, Camillus accompanied with the whole Senat, came up into the common place of audience, and there / time the people spake in this wise: "So grievous to our O. Quirites, is all correction and variation with the Tribunes of the Commons that while I lived at Ardea I found no other comfort and solace, in that most heavy and woful banishment of mine but this, That I was far enough off from those debates and jars. In regard whereof I would never have come again I assure you, but that you called me back both by act of Senat and also by approbation of the people. And it is not in me any change of mind but your calamity and distressed estate, that hath forc'd me to return again unto you. For this was the very point that you stood upon, namely that our country might continue still and keep her ancient place: and not by us, that I should remain and dwell therein again. And even now verily, would I be still and keep place willingly, but that this quarrel is in the behalf of my re-laid country: the which to fail / (so long as we doth live) for others might be a shameful reproach: but for Camillus it were most impious, and abominable, for to what end have we returned to it again? To what purpose when it was belieg'd have we deliver'd it out of the enemies hands, if when we have recovered it, we our selves abandon and leave the same? And when as the gods and men of Rome kept still, and inhabited the Capitol and the capital, notwithstanding the Gauls were Lords, and possessed of the whole City, is it possible that both Cattle and Capitol, after the City is regain'd, should be forsaken and abandoned of the Roman

The Oration
 of M. Furius Camillus to the people of Rome.

A "Roman victors? And shall our prosperous hand over our enemies bring greater damage, than "City, than adversity hath? Verily, it is wretched, that we made no reckoning of that calamity and dis-
 "vine solemn service, imputed even with the foundation of our City: that we burnt and de-
 "phies that have been deliver'd unto us by tradition from our ancestors: yet to evident purpose
 "of God hath assisted the Romans: that I must needs think, that men can now prosper better
 "the worship of God. For consider with me I pray you either the prosperity of the adversity
 "these years late past, one after another they find that as long as we served God and follow'd
 "his will so long we prosper'd: and went forward: and all the while that we despoil'd the times "ever went backward and to decay. And first and foremost the Veient war / (I pray you) The
 "you how many years lasted it: how troublesome and painful was it: And ended it was not
 "fore thereby the direction and advertisement of the gods, the water was at out of the Albia
 "pool? What shall I speak of this late & strange calamity of our own City: the ruin it (and yet truth)
 "before that voice which came from heaven was made to light on, once raising the coming of the "Gauls: before the law of nations was by our Embassadors broken and before that through the "same neglect of the gods, that fact was by us wink'd at and put up, which indeed should have "been punish'd and revenged? This was the cause that we were vanquish'd made captive, put to "our ransom and suffer'd in his origin punishment both at Gods hand and at mans: that we "are made an example and amazement to the whole world. Then our adversity and calamity put "us in mind of our religion, and the fear of the gods. We fled into the Capitol, to the gods even "to the very best of Jupiter Optimus Maximus: and when our own prior civility to have "the sacred monuments yet and holy Images some we hid in the earth, some were convey'd away "into the neighbour Towns, and remov'd them out of our enemies sight, And, but we were "forlorn and given over both of God and men, yet gave not we over, nor did we confirm the "vice of the gods. And therefore gave us our country again, they gave us victory, and the "anient honour of war which we had lost: and upon our enemies heads, who / blinded with co-"vetousness in the weighing of gold brake both covenant and fidelity, they have turn'd all their "finels, all light & slaughter. Considering then, O Quirites, by the civility and apparent signs, "& testimonies in the course of this world, what it is to serve God: & what it is to dishonor him,
 "perceive ye not what wickedness we go about to plunge ourselves into, being / that city got both
 "D and escap'd out of the shipwreck and perill of our former sin and calamity? A City we have "founded and built, by the will of God and due obsecration of Agrippa and Amphius, no corner
 "therein but full of religion, full of divine Majesty: and for solemn sacrifices, there are no lack
 "when they shall be celebrated, there are places appointed wherein they ought to be perform'd "med, And are ye about then O Quirites, to leave all these gods both public & private, for "tell this deed of yours with that which I lately during the time of the calamity was in with modest "admiration of our enemies, than our own leaves in that Noble young Camillus (I pray you)
 "when through the pike of the Gauls, he departed out of the Capitol, and perform'd to them
 "duty of the house of Fabius even upon the mount Quirinal? What can ye do now, and be it
 "the sacred ceremonies of private families, should not to me, as in mine own house, be neglected:
 "E and suffer now the public sacrifices and the Roman gods, in time of peace, to be neglected, and "the City abandon'd? That our High Priests and Flamines should be neglected, and the public
 "the public service of God, than a private citizen was in the Agora / (I pray you) to be neglect-"and kindred? But peradventure some one may say, We will do the same as we did before, and "from thence our Priests hither for to execute that mimicry. Neither of which I have already "giving the due observance of holy ceremonies, For to say nothing in general of all other solemn "dances and of all the gods besides: In that one high feast and solemn dinner of Jupiter and "venerable celebrated, or a sacred table be spread and furnish'd in any place, but in the
 "What should I speak of the eternal fires of Vesta and of that Image, who has a power in the "city of our imperial state, I kept within the safeguard of that Temple? What should I say
 "F those your Ancistrum and Santhicon: O M. Furius, and thou other Quirites, receive ye "contented that all these rituals and sacred solemnities, which are all of equal time with the "eyes, and of more antiquity (some of them) than the foundation of the City, and yet are
 "ken in a private place: but see what do, there is between us and our ancestors. They kept
 "to uncertain solemn feasts and sacrifices to be celebrated in the Atrium and in the Forum
 "am. Was it then a matter of conscience and religion that those solemnities should be brought "into us from our enemies Cities to Rome? And shall we translate the times of honor out of our "enemies Cities / (I pray you) without any and malicious offence that would respect them? Do but call
 "to mind I pray you how often our seals and sacrifices have been renewed and restored, learn
 "for that those one old accustomed ceremony, either by chance or too want of reverence, hath
 "G been over-slipped and left out. And even so late what was it, that our fathers / (I pray you)
 "the Atrium / I received our Common-wealth to distressed with the Veient war, but the remem-"tion of our divine service and renewing of our Amples? And more than this we have "remembrance of ancient religion and devotion have both brought upon us, and yet we
 "and it to have in flatter'd and decay'd new, What a notable and festive day, that in the
 "the ex-ceding zeal and forward affection of the Matrons upon which / (I pray you) the "flated from Ven, was dedicated in Aventina? And to Ant. Lentulus, for a voluntary offer

"heard in the new cause, we caused a Temple to be erected. The Capitoline plaies have we ad- H "ded to other solemn feasts; & thereto we have ordained and founded a new guild or fraternity, "even by the advice of the Senat. And what need was there, that we should have done any of these "things, if we meant, together with the Gauls, to leave the City of Rome? If we abode not in "the Capitol (so many months while we were besieged) willingly and without constraint? And "if we were for fear of our enemies, held back from going elsewhere? Thus much of our festival
 "daies and temples. But what shall become now, I pray you of our Priests? Never think ye once "of it, what a sinful deed you are about? As for the Vestal Virgins and Nuns, it is certain, this "is their only place, forth of which nothing ever could drive them but the winning of the City.
 "The Flamin of Jupiter may not lie forth of the City one night: and will ye make these Priests "of Romans to become Veintians? And shall they virgins indeed, O Veinti, leave their now and "shall the Flamin dwelling in a strange place, for every night he is absent, taint with great im-
 "piety, both himself and the Common wealth? As for other matters, which we do with great so"lemnity by the direction of the Augurs (and all well near within the Pomeroy or compass of the "City) how can we forget or neglect them? Namely, the Ward-leet or assembly of the Curia for "matters of war: also the other of Centuries, wherein ye chuse your Consuls and Military Tri"bunes, where can they be held (if we respect the will of the gods and regard the Auspices) but in "the places accustomed? Shall we remove all these to Veinti? or shall the people repair hither from "thence with great trouble and inconvenience, to a desolate City, forsaken of God and man, "whencever they would hold those assemblies? But the present necessity (they will say) forceth us K
 "to leave a town that is wasted with fire, and wholly ruinat, and to go to Veinti, where all stands "safe and sound, and not to put the poor Commons to the toils and charge of new building. That "this is a pretence and cause rather devised, than meant in earnest, if I should say nothing. I think
 "appeareth manifestly unto you already, O Quirites, who remember that before the coming of "the French men, whiles your public buildings and privat houses were whole, and whiles the "City stood upright on foot, this self-same motion was made and debated, as touching the remo"ving to Veinti. Consider now ye Tribunes, what difference there is between mine opinion and
 "yours: ye are of mind, that if it had not then been meet to be done, yet now verily it were "good and requisite: I contrariwise (but marvel not I pray you before you hear what I will say) am L
 "of opinion, that albeit we might have then gone, whiles our whole City flourished, yet now we "were not to leave it thus ruinat & decayed. For at that time we had some cause to remove into "a conquered City, namely, Victory, a glorious thing to our selves and our posterity: but this re"moving now, were reproachfull and shameful to our selves, but glorious and honourable to the "Gauls, for we shall not be thought to have left our country as conquerours, but to have lost it as "conquered. And shall it be said, that our running away at Alia, the winning of our City, the be"sieging of the Capitoll, hath imposed this necessity upon us, to leave our house and home and "to make shifts, to seek our own exile and departure out of that place which we are not able to "defend? And were, indeed, the Gauls able to pull down and rase that City of Rome, which the "Romans shal not be thought able to reedifie and set up again? What remaineth now in case they "should come upon us afresh, with a new power of men, for certain it is that their multitude is M
 "in redress: & were willing to dwell here in this City by them conquered, & by you abandoned,
 "but that ye gently permit and suffer them? Nay, What and if not the Gauls, but your old enemies
 "the Aequians and the Volscians would remove and come to Rome, would you be willing to have "them become Romans and your selves Veintians? Would ye not rather, that this desert and "wast ground as it lieth, were yours, than to be a City peopled by your enemies? For I cannot see,
 "I assure you, whether of the twain, were more to be detested. And because (forsooth) ye are loath "to fall to building, are ye resolved to abide these mischiefs and these shameful reproaches? If through"out the whole City there might not be built a more commodious or stately house, than is that "cottage there of our founder, were it not better to dwell in cottages like shepherds & peasants, so
 "it be among your sacred monuments and household gods, than all at once generally to go into N
 "exile: Our ancestors and forefathers being a mixture of divers countries, and no other than herd-
 "men, finding in these parts nothing but woods and bogs, in a short time build a new City out of "the ground: and are we loath, having yet our Capitoll, our castle here, the Temples of our gods "standing (till to reedifie it now that it is burnt, That which every one of us would have done, if "our houses had been fired, refuse we altogether to do in the common care of the City? Give "me leave a little, What & if by some villany or by mischance there should be a fire at Veinti &
 "by reason of the wind (as it is often seen) the flame spread and catch and so consume a great part "of the City, shall we go from thence by and by, and seek to Fidenae or G. this, or some other City "near at hand to remove unto? Is the very native soil of our country, and this ground which we "call our mother, of no power at all to keep us here, but doth the whole love and affection of O
 "our country, rest in the superficial outside, and in the timber and rafters of our houses? Verily,
 "I confess I will unto you (although I take less pleasure to remember the wrongs you did me than "the calamity which I endured) when I was absent and in exile, so often as I thought of my coun"try, all these things ran in my mind: the hills, the plain, the Tiber, the coasts all about, which was "my daily prospect, and this air, under which I was born and brought up. All which, O Quirites, "let them move you rather now with an affection to them for to carry still in this your habitation,
 "than

A "than disquiet you hereafter, and torment you for the want and mis of them, when you have "once left and forgone them. Not without good cause both God and man chose this place for "the building of this City: most healthy and wholesome hills: a very convenient and commodi"ous river: to bring in corn and other fruits out of the inland parts, to receive provision and o"ther victuals from the sea-coasts: the sea itself near enough for commodities, and not exposed
 "and open by too much nearness to the dangers of forrain navies: they cry heart and centre of "all Italy, a place as a man would say, naturally made, and only for that City to grow and encrease
 "in. And that doth the very largeness and greatness of a City to newly founded, plainly prove.
 "It is now three hundred three score and four years, and not above, since the foundation there"of, O Quirites. Amongst so many Nations of greatest antiquity, thus long ye have made war:
 "and all this while (to say nothing of particular Cities) neither the Volscians together with the "Aequians peopling to many towns, and those so strong, nor all the Gauls together with the "land, and containing the whole breadth between the two seas, are in war to you comparable.
 "Which being so, what reason have you (in the devils name) when ye have had sufficient proof
 "already of it, to try again new experiments? considering now that a beir your valour and vertue
 "may go with you elsewhere, yet surely, the good luck and fortune of this place can never de"part and remove from hence? Here is the Capitoll, where sometimes upon the finding of a
 "mans head, answer was made by diviners and wizards, That in that very place should be the "head of all punishment, and the imperial seat of the whole world. Here, at what time as the Ca-
 "pitoll by the direction of the Augurs should be voided and cleared of all other Chapells, Lady
 "Juvencus and god Terminus, to the great joy of our forefathers, would not suffer them to be: to "heaven, here are all the gods, favourable & gracious till unto you, so long as hereby ye make abode
 "and remain. Camillus in all his Orations throughout moved them much, but that part thereof "touching religion (by report) was most effectual. But that which struck it dead and put all out "of doubt, was a certain word that fell out to be spoken fitly to the purpose. For at what time as "the Senat a while after was gathered together in the Court, Hostilius to debate about these things "and certain companies ofouldiers that returned from their guards, chanced in the mean time
 "to march through the market place, one Captain hapned to speak in the Court, and said, "Puch down thy castle, stand and bear, here will be our best abode. With this voice was not to soon
 "heard, but both the Senat being come out of the Council House, cried with one accord, That "they took that omen for good luck, and happy preface: and also the Commons all gathered "thereabout, approved the same. After this, when the foresaid Act of immigration was once "clean dashed and abolished, the City began to be built confusedly and without order. The was "allowed at the common charges: to dig either stone, or hew timber, every man had liberty
 "where he could, putting in furies that within the compass of that year they would finish their "buildings. The haste they made, caused them to have no regard of drawing out the streets di"rectly, whiles every man built in the void places without respect of his own or others mens "ground. Whiles the cause that the out-finks and vaults which first were covered through "the common streets, now run every where under mens homes and the form of the City seemeth
 "as if it were built at random (as every man could catch a place for himself) rather than direct"ly ranged, and set out in good order unto them.

What acts from the building of the City of Rome unto the taking of the same, the Romans have achieved, first, under the government of Kings, afterwards of Consuls and Dictators. Decemvirs, and Tribunes Consular, as well in the wars abroad as seditions at home; I have in five books declared. Matters obscure both in regard of exceeding antiquity (as things that a far off hardly be discerned) and also for that in those daies there were very few writings and monuments, the only faithful safeguard and true remembrancers of deeds past: and besides, whatsoever was registered in the Commentaries of the Priests and in other public or private records, the same for the most part, when the City was burned perished withall. But now from henceforward, their civil affairs of policy, and martial exploits in wars, ensuing after a long beginning of the City (as springing again with more fresh shoots and fruitful sprouts from the root of the old stock) shall be delivered in more plain and certain manner.

Camilus bare the Dictatorship a whole year, which otherwise was limited within six months.Q. Fabius ca-dicted.Disast. daies, † 18 of July.

† 16 of July.

And to begin withall, look by whom the state first was underpropped and set upright, upon him (as chief and principal) it still bare and rested, and that was M. Fabius: whom the Romans would not suffer to give up his Dictatorship before one year was fully expired. As for those Tribunes (Consular) in time of whole government the City was lost, they liked not that they should call and hold an assembly for Election of Magistrates the year following. So the matter came to an Interregnum. Now while the City was busie in continuall work and labour, about recedifying and repairing their buildings, Q. Fabius so soon as he was out of his office, was by C. Martius Tribune of the Commons ordered to make his answer at a day appointed, who laid to his charge, That he contrary to the Law of Nations, had fought against the Gens, unto whom he was sent in embassy, and as an Orator only. But he avoided his judicial trial by his death: and died to just against the time, that many men thought it was voluntary and wrought by his own hands. Then P. Cornelius Scipio first entered upon the Interregnum: and after him M. Furius the second time. He created Tribunes Military in Consular authority. A. Valerius Publicola the second time, L. Virginii, P. Cornelius, A. Manlius, L. Angulius and L. Postumius. These men presently after the Interregnum, were not so soon entered into office, but before all other things, they consulted with the Senat in matters concerning Religion and conscience. And first of all they commanded, that all the instruments of leagues and confederacies, the ordinances and laws also (as those were the twelve tables & certain Statutes made by the Kings) should be sought up as many as could be found extant. Whereof some were published abroad, even amongst the Common people: but the rest, as pertained properly to holy Rites, and divine service, were by the Priests and Priests, kept secret: especially, of purpose to hold the minds of the people in a reverent awe of Religion and devotion. Then began they to reason and debate about the dismal daies. And the fifteenth day before the Calends of August, so notorious for a twofold loss and overthrow; upon which day at Corvina the Fabii were all slain, and after at Alia an unfortunate field was fought, even to the utter ruin and desolation of the City, they named of the latter misfortunes, Alia first: and set this notably mark upon it. That it should be reputed unmeet and inconvenient for any business as well public as private. Some think because upon the next day following the Ides of July, Catullus the Tribune Military could not by sacrifice find any tokens of happy speed, nor of gain the grace and favour of the gods; whereupon three daies after, the Roman host fell shamefully into the hands of the enemies: therefore, the morrow also after the Ides was interdicted, and men were commanded to forbear and abstain from doing sacrifices: and thereupon likewise the day next following the Calends and the Nones, were by tradition held as ominous and dismal as the other.

But long they might not quietly sit about the devising of means to reform the Common-weal. And let it upright again after so grievous and dangerous a fall. For of the one side, the Volscians, their old enemies, took arms, intending the final destruction of the Roman name. On the other side, the Merchants brought news, That the Princes and chief of all the Nations of Hetruria were banded and confederate together in a Diet held at the Temple of Vulturnus, to make war upon them. Besides a fresh and new fear came upon them by reason of the rebellion of the Latines and Hernicks, who after the battell at the pool Regillus, for the space almost of an hundred years, had continued fast in loyal league and amity with the people of Rome. Therefore being thus greatly afflicted on every side, that all the world might see apparently that the State of Rome was not only hated of her enemies, but despised also of her allies: it was thought good and resolved upon, that by his direction and rule, the Common-weal should now be maintained and defended, by whose prudent guidance it was relieved and recovered: and that M. Furius Camillus should be created Dictator. He being desired Dictator, named Q. Servilius II. for General of the Horsemen. And having proclaimed a law, freed (or vacation from Courts of Law) he took muster of all the younger sort and serviceable men: but so, as the elder people were not left out, as many as were of strength sufficient for service. Unto whom he likewise ministered the military oath of Allegiance, and enrolled them by hundreds in the muster book. When he

A had thus levied a power of men, and furnished them with armour, he divided them into three parts. The one he opposed against Hetruria in the County of Veii: another he commanded to those which were sent against the Tuiscans had L. Aemilius a Tribune military was made Captain: himself led against the Volscians: and not far from Lavinium (the place is called Ad-Ad-Ad-Ad-Ad-Ad) he began to assault their Camp. The enemies had put themselves on this their journey, with a kind of scornful contempt, as thinking the whole manhood in a manner of Rome, was by the French clean spent and wasted. But when they heard once, that Camilus was the Lord General it strook such a fear and terror among them, that they were glad to defend themselves by the strength of their trench and rampier, yea, and to fence it round about with huge-piled heaps of wood and trees, that their enemies might have no passage to enter in upon their munitions. Which when Camilus perceived, he gave order to let on fire that Barricado which stood in his way. And as good hap was, the wind was big and high, and blew full upon the enemy. So that not only he made way by fire, but also with the flames thereof that went toward the Camp, with the vapour likewise and smoke, and the crackling noise of the green wood, he so amazed & astonished the enemies, that in getting over the mound and enclosure consumed with fire, having thus defeated and slain his enemies and won withall the Camp in the same breath, the Dictator gave the whole spoile unto the soldiers: which to them was so much the more welcome, as they less hoped for it at their General's hand: who was never known to be lavish of gift, and over-liberal in dealing rewards. After this he followed them that fled, in chase, waited and foraged their whole country, and at length (in the seventeenth year of the war) he wholly subdued the Volscians and forced them to yield preparations for war. Their forces he surprised and defeated at Bols, and assailed not only their Camp, but also forced the City, and at the first assault won both.

But while fortune smiled thus, what way soever Camilus went, as being the only stay of the Roman state: so on another side the fear of peril greatly increased. For the Tuiscans well near all up in arms, lay before Sutrium, and besieged it being in league with the people of Rome. Whole Embassadors came unto the Senat to entreat for succour in their distress, and had a ree-gained Dred unto them, that the Dictator with all speed should relieve the Sutrines. But being so straitly beleaguered, that they might not abide the delay of this their hope, for that the townsmen who were but few in number, were over-wearied with working, watching, and bloody fighting, (all which lay still upon the same men without intermission) they were driven by compulsion to surrender up the City to the enemies: and being dismayed and sent away with a single piece of apparel (after a pious sort all a-row) departed the town, & left their dwelling places. But see, it befell that Camilus at the same time came in the very manner with the Roman Army and met them. At whole feet the multitude all sorrowfully prostrate: their Nobles and chief men in this extremity felt to beleeve him to be good unto them: the women and children who went along with them, as partakers and companions of their exile, seconded them with wofull tears and lamentations. But he willed the Sutrines to forbear their mourning plaints, and give over their dolefull moan: laying that he brought the Tuiscans heavy and weeping cheer. Then called he his soldiers to lay down their packs and load, the Sutrines likewise there to abide with a mean guard, and his men to follow him with armour and weapons only. Thus marched he forward with his Army lightly appointed for ready expedition, and advanced before Sutrium. Where according to his exhortations, he found the enemies all careless and secure (as commonly it falleth out to their exorations success.) No warders, no corps de garde quartered before the walls, the gates wide open, houses. So was Sutrium in one day twice won. The Tuiscans (for all their former victory) were hewn in peeces on every side, by a new-come enemy. They had no time to call themselves life, made in all haste to the gates, if haply any way they might escape into the fields. But when they came thither, the gates they found fast shut, for to the Dictator had given order afore-hand, when this sudden tumult surprised them, to call their fellows together for to begin a skirmish: which no doubt in that desperate case of the enemies had been holy fought, had not the Trumpets and Trumpeets which were sent into all parts of the City, made proclamation to lay down their weapons, to spare them which were unarmed, and that none should have any harm but fully bent to fight it out, for hope of life on all hands hung away their weapons: and thus dismayed as they were (for as the case stood, it was the safer course) presented themselves to the enemy. A great number of them were belted in several places, and were attended upon with good guards. And before night the town was delivered again unto the Sutrines, safe and sound without hurt at all done unto it, as being not won by force, but intreated upon compulsion. Camilus then returned with triumph into the City of Rome, victor at one voyage in three kindly wars. The greatest number by far, of prisoners, whom he led before his chariot in triumph, were Tuiscans: whom he sold in port-sale at the spear, and raised such a sum of money, that when he had out of it repaid the dames [of Rome] to the worth of their gold, there were of the surplusage thereof three bouls made of massie gold : which with the title and inscription of Camillus his name, were for certainty, before the Capitol was burnt to be seen in the chappell of Jupiter set up and belowed at the feet of Juno.

The same year, there were enfranchised and made Citizens of Rome, such Veientians, Capenates and Falcianians in the time of those wars were fled to the Romans : and for these new Citizens were certain lands set out. Those also, who for idleness loath to build at Rome, were gone to Veser, there to inhabit the vacant houses, were by an Act of the Senat recalled home from thence. And they at the first grumbled & refused to obey; but after that a day was set for them & they threatened upon pain of death to return again to Rome, as if that as they were, and obdurate all of them together now for fear every one became obedient. As Rome now increased in number of inhabitants, and became well peopled : so on all hands in every place they fell to building new edifices : whilst the Common-wealth somewhat eased them of charges, and the Ædiles by virtue of their office called hard upon them, halting them forward as to a publick work; yea, and every man privately made all speed possible, according as each ones need required, to make an end and finish his own house. So as within the year the City was new built and stood on foot again.

At the years end was the great Election held for Tribunes military in Consuls authority. Wherein were created T. Quintus Cincinnatus, Q. Servilius Fideus at the fifth time, Julius Tullius, L. Aquilius Corvus, L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Ser. Sulpitius Ruffus. One army they let out and led against the Æquians, not to war with them (for they granted themselves conquered) but upon K meer sight and deadly hatred, to waste all their borders utterly, and to leave them no power and strength to enterprise any new rebellion. The other, into the territory of Tarquinius. Where, two towns of the Tuscan, Cortusola and Contenebra, were by assault won and rased. At Cortusola was no resistance made. For the Romans surprised them on a sudden, and at the first shout and impression they were masters of it : The town was sacked and burned. As for Contenebra, it endured the assault for some few daies : but the continual labour, flacking neither day nor night overcharged them; whereas the Roman Army divided into six parts, fought six hours in their several turns round one after the other. And the townsmen being but few, and those overtoiled, were fain without any supply, still to maintain fresh skirmishes. Whereupon at last they retreated back & yielded, giving the Romans leave to enter the City. The Tribunes were of mind and thought good, that the spoils should be confisic and go to the common treasury : but the commandment and proclamation was more flack than their purpose on that behalf. For whilst they lingered and protracted time, the soldiers already had seized in their prizes : and taken from them again without much offence and harred the booty could not be. In the same year, because the City should not flourish in private buildings only, the Capitol was also built of squared asher stone : A piece of work even in this so glorious estate, and magnificence of the City, to be had in price and esteemed excellent. And now before this time, the Tribunes of the Commons, whilst the City was buied about their buildings, began often to move for the Laws Agroaria (about the division of the lands) in all their assemblies and speeches before the people. For to draw them on and to let forward their hope, they presented unto them very often the Pomptine Territory, which then above all others, so presently upon the subduing and subversion of the Volscians by Camillus, was, no doubt, the rightfull possession of the people of Rome. Complaints were made, that those grounds sustained much more detriment and damage by the Nobility, than they had received before from the Volscians. For they, so long only as they were able to bear arms and maintain war, made inroads thither : but the Noblemen forcibly entered and made havoc in the possessions of the common lands : and unless (before they had set foot there, and got all into their hands) a division were made, the Commons should never enjoy one foot of ground there. These Remonstrances of the Tribunes little moved the Commons, both because few of them resorted to the common place of assemblies whilst they plied their building; and also for that money was away, and their purses lo emptied in the charges of workmen, that they had little mind of holding those lands, which to store N and flock they were not able.

The City was now given much to their devotions and religions, and the rulers also somewhat suspitious upon their late calamity : In much as they minded to renew the Aspicula (or the solemnity of prelates taken by bird-flight) for some error supposed therein; and therefore they agreed that the government should return to an Interregnum. So there were Interregents one after another M. Manlius Capitolinus, Ser. Sulpitius Cornelianus, L. Valerius Potitius, Valerius at length held the assembly for to elect Tribunes Military in Consuls authority and created L. Papirius, Cn. Servilius, L. Æmilius the second time, L. Lucretius, T. Valerius Publicola the third time. These presently after the Interregnum, began their government. That year, the Temple of Mars vowed in the Gauls war was dedicated by T. Quintus, a Dumvir departed for the executing of holy duties. O Four Tribes of new Citizens were now adjoyined. Stellatina, Pomptina, Sablatina, Arminia, and these made up the number of the 25 Tribes. And now L. Sicius, a Tribune of the Commons was in hand with the people in greater number assembled together, about the Pomptine lands : and more inclined they were and forward to hearken after grounds, than they had been afore. And whereas it was moved in the Senat house, to make war upon the Larines and the Ælennicks that matter was not followed, but put off to a further time : by reason of preparation for a greater war, because

A Hernia was already up in arms. And all was laid again upon Camillus his shoulders, who was made Tribune Military with Consuls authority, and had five other brethren in office joyned unto him Ser. Cornelius M. Lucius, Q. Servilius Fideus the sixth time, L. Quinctus Cincinnatus, L. Horatius Pulvillus, P. Valerius. In the beginning of the year, the minds of men were turned away from the careful regard they had of the Tuscan war, by reason that a number of people that the Antians were up in arms, that the nations of the Latins had sent their able youth to on this point, that by the covenant there was no provision for that voluntary consideration might be in what warssoever they would. Now had the Romans been well engaged and learned to distinguish, who if he had been a private person, was no doubt have been nominated and elected Dictator : yea, and his companions in office, consorted frankly that it was one of them to have the foreign and absolute Regiment of all, in case there were any foreign and dangerous wars, no disparagement at all unto them, nor any loss of their own honour and reputation. In referring the same upon the Majesty of so worthy a person. The Senat highly commended the triumphe in this wife. "A weighty burthen (quoth he) I see is imposed upon me by the people of Rome, in that they have elected and nominated me Dictator now the fourth time : a greater charge is enjoyned me by the Senat : the whole state and body of which order, hath delivered to exceeding kindness and judgement of me : but the heaviest load of all is laid upon me by the If any painfull travel of mine therefore, and watchful care may be labour'd. I will earnestly endeavour, I will strain and strive to answer thereunto : that the opinion which the City hath of me, great content hath conceived of me, right as it is exceeding great, so it may continue still and be perpetual. As to that war of the Antians, there are more brags and threats than any danger and peril from thence. But as I would combat and advise you to be at aid of no war, to I would not have you to be careless and secure of any. The City of Rome is better on every side : partly D "envid, and partly hated of her neighbour borderers. Need theris both of more Captains, and also of more armies, to manage the affairs of the Common-wealth. I think it good therefore (quoth he) O Valerius, that you should me in government and council, and have the leading together with me of certain legions against the Antian enemies. That you Q. Servilius with an other army well appointed, and in readines, ye encompassed hard by the City side, having an eye and good regard, lest either Hernia in the mean while, (as of late daies) of the Latins and Hernicks (who trouble us now afresh, break out and make some thing. Alured I am that you will behave your self, and quit you in this service so worthily, as may answer the famous mention, and those six Tribuneships which you have already part rased. As to L. Quinctus, let him levy a third power of men, consisting of those that are by reason of sickness or otherwise E "excused for warfare, and are above the ordinary age for military service, to be indeed of a great use for the defence of the City and the Walls. Let L. Æmilius provide harness, weapons, corn, and other necessities for war, at all occasions whatsoever. Finally, O Servilius, we your self and Chur, matters of general assemblies, of the Laws and all other civil affairs of policy whatsoever in performing their several charges, Valerius whom he had joyned with himself in commandment, ad led moreover and said. That as he would take At. Furnius to be Dictator, so would he F "nat, exhorted them, that what opinion they had of one only So: reign General, the same hope they would conceive of the whole war. The Senators herat took great joy and contentment generally of the State. Neither shall the Common-wealth (say they) ever find in need of different and ready as well to obey as to rule, and rather yielding their private private to the promotion of the Common-wealth, than dismembering and plucking from it their private glory and reputation.

After a Vacation or Law-fee'd proclaimed, and the Musters taken and past : Furnius and Valerius set forward to Servilius : whether the Antians had not only sent the flour of all the Volcks, the choice youth out of a fresh fry and new generation ; but also had raised a mighty power of new enemies into : old thus combined together, troubled the minds of the Romans somewhat, and kindled his patrols in array : and that in their terms to wit, that the hearts of his outlying and idling when they thought of it, it seems, yea, and that there were some of them overhead to say, that They must fight once on an hundred, and that so great a multitude of their their enemies (if they were unarmed) might hardly be encountered in his being so well armed and appointed: he mounted precisely upon Horieback, and rode before the engines, and then turning himself about his army, travelling between the ranks and armies: "What heaviness is this my soldiers (quoth he) what means this strange and unwonted lagging behind? Why? Know ye not your enemy? Know ye not me? Or, know ye not your own fields? The enemy, what is he else but the perpetual matter and subject of your valour and glory? And ye again are the men, who under my conduct (to say nothing of the winning of Faleria and Veis, and of the slaughter of the Gauls Legions, put to the sword by us even when our native City was by them taken, and they matters thereof) of late, and but the other day, made a three-fold triumph, upon a triple victory over the same Volscians, Æquians and people of Hetruria. What, do ye not agnize and accept me for your General, because not as Dictator, but as Tribune, I gave you the watchword, and put out the banner of battle? For mine own part, I stand not much upon absolute and sovereign command over you: no more likewise should ye regard ought else in me, but mine own self. For never yet did my Dictatorship make me haughty and set me up aloft, no more than my banishment abated my courage and cast me down. We are the same men still all of us: and since we are come to this war, furnished with the same means that we carried with us unto the former, let us look for the same event of our service, and no worse. So soon as ye shall encounter and joyn battle with them, perform each one that which he hath been taught and wonted to: the journey surely will be ours, and they (no doubt) shall run away. Then after he had founded the battle, he alighted from his Horse, and caught the ensign-bearer that stood next him, with his hand, haled him forward against the face of the enemy, crying very often aloud, On afore with thy banner. Port-ensign, and advance forward, soldier. When they saw that Camillus in person, a man well steeped in years, and thereby weak to perform the parts of bodily strength, put himself forth against the enemy: all at once they pressed forward, set up an outcry and shouted, every man calling upon his next fellow, to follow their General for shame. And over besides, some say that by the commandment of Camillus, there was an ensign flung into the very battle among the enemies. Whereupon they of the forefront, belittled themselves lustily to recover it again. And thereby were the Antients first discomfited, and the least not only came upon them in the vanguard, but entered also and reached as far as the rearward, that stood ready for supply. And as the violent force of the soldiers, provoked by the presence of their Captain, much troubled the enemy: so nothing more daunted the hearts of the Volscians, than the very sight of Camillus himself, when they chanced to espie him. So furiously carried he the victory with him, which way (where he went) And that appeared most evidently in this, That when he saw the left wing at the point to give back and run away, he took himself in all haste to his Horse, rode thither with his light footmen but, kler, and with his only presence renewed the fight, shewing unto them how the rest of the battle had the better. Now were the enemies put to the sword, and the victory inclined to a side. But their multitude both hindered themselves in their flight: and also a long piece of work the wearied soldiers of the Romans had to put to great a number, all to the sword. But behold, there fell a great tempest of rain all of a sudden, which poured down with so mighty winds and storms, that it rather put them by the execution of assured victory, than parted any battle or stayed the fight. Whereupon the retreat was founded: and the night ensuing, whilst the Romans were at rest, made an end of the war. For the Latins and Hernicks forsook the Volscians and departed home, with as ill speed, as their enterprise was bad. The Volscians seeing themselves abandoned and left in the lurch by them, (upon whose trust and confidence they had rebelled, quit the camp and field, and put themselves within the walls of Saturnum: whom Camillus at first began to besiege, calling a trench and rampier about them, raising battilions and plat-forms against the Town. And seeing his munitions and fabricks by no staying forth of the enemies impeached, he supposed there was no such courage in them, that he should need to stand so long about the hope of victory: and thereupon, encouraged his men not to wear themselves out in a tedious and costly piece of service, as if they lay at the siege of Veis: assuring them that the Victory was in their hands already: and so with exceeding cheerfulness of his soldiers, he set ladders upon every side, scaled the walls, and entered the Town. Then the Volscians flung away their weapons and yielded themselves.

Saturnum won.

But the General his mind was bent upon a greater exploit, and that was the winning of Antium, being the seat Town of the Volscians, and from whence the beginning of the last war arose. Howbeit because so strong a City might not be won without great preparation of artillery, ordnance, & engines of battery leaving his colleague behind him with the army he went himself to Rome, to persuade with the Senat, for to destroy and raze Antium utterly. And whilst he was employing with them (such was the will of God I believe, that Antium should stand still & continue longer) there came Embassadors from Nepes and Saturnum, craving aid against the Tuscans, saying: That it was more than high time, that they were succoured and relieved. Upon which occasion it fell out, that Camillus was withdrawn thither from Antium. For seeing that whole two Towns stood even against Hetruria: as it were the very keys and bar-gates from thence: both the enemies laboured to gain them afore-hand, against the time that they went about to make new wars: & the Romans also held it a matter of great consequence, to refuse and defend those frontier Towns. The Senat therefore thought good to be in hand with Camillus, for to leave Antium and to undertake the war with the Tuscans. The City-legions under General Quintius were appointed unto him,

And

A And albeit, he rather would have had the leading of that army, which lay now in the Volscians Country, and which he had good tryals, and were acquainted better with his government, yet refused he nothing: only he required to have Valerius his associate with him, and joined with him in commission. So Quintius and Valerius were sent to invade Valerius in the Volscian war. The Town possessed already by the Tuscans. On the other side the Townsmen, for that the ease of the had stopped all passages between hardly able to repel the force of the assailants. But the coming of the Roman aids, and the manebres of Camillus, (so highly renowned as well-memoried) the enemies as Aliens both for the present gave them heart to abide the brunt, and stick to it till that B they were before at the point to give over: and also gained time and repit, to come in with fresh supplies and succours. Camillus therefore divided his forces, and gave direction to his colleague, for not so much for any hope he had by scaling the walls to win the City, as by withdrawing the enemies thither, not only to ease the Townsmen of their toil, and give them a breathing time, (who the City without skirmish and resistance. Which being put in execution on both hands, according to walls assailed most fiercely one way: and the enemy got within the Town another way: flung out at one gate (which as it happened was not better) and in great haste all together sought to escape away. But as they fled, they were slain by heaps both within the Town and abroad all over the men were more ready and nimble in the chase, and gave not over the execution until the night, that they could not see and discern them.

So soon as was need,

When Saturnum was thus recovered and restored again to their allies they led forward the army to Nepes: which Town the Tuscans held woollily, as surrendered already into their hands. Every man thought it would be a busy piece of work to win that City again: not in this regard only, that it was fully in the enemies possession, but also because some of the Nepesians, by treachery had yielded it up. Howbeit, they resolved to send unto the heads and principal citizens, that they should sever themselves from the Tuscans, and perform on their behaviour and faithful loyalty. D From whom they received this answer again, That it lay not now in them to do any thing at all, for that the Tuscans kept the walls, and watched the gates. Whereupon they first turned and more reckoning of keeping their faithful loyalty to their enemies unto whom they had lately surrendered, than of offering the league with their friends which they had long before concluded: they and so approached the City with the army filled up the ditches close to the walls, set ladders to, and at the first shout and assault given the Town was taken. Then proclamation was made, that all the Nepesians should part with their armour and weapons, and so many as were found unarmed, should be spared. But the Tuscans as well armed as unarmed were put to the sword every one. E As for the chief authors, that persuaded the Nepesians to deliver the Town to the enemies, they were beheaded. The humble multitude had their good: restored, and to the Town was sent with federal Citizins, returned in great glory to Rome with their victorious army.

Nepes taken

The same year the Latins and Hernicks were required to make amends for harms done, and restitution of goods wrongfully detained: and the same demanded why of late years, according to a covenant in that behalf provided they had let forth no soldiers to the Romans wars. Answer F not proceeding from counsellors of the State in case some of their youthlier served under the Volscians, and yet their selves had well paid already for their lewd and rash projects, in that not one of them was come home alive. And as to the not sending forth of soldiers, the cause was, for that they were in continual fear and danger of the Volscians: which noisome plague (as it was one in the neck of another. When relation hereof was made unto the Lords of the Senat, they thought so well of their answer and excuses, that they deemed they had quarrel and occasion good enough to war upon them, if they might have had while and time as well to follow it.

The excuse of the Latins and Hernicks.

In the year following, when A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, Titus and Lucius Quintius, both City-legions, and L. Papirius Consul for the second time, were Tribunes Consular, there arose a grievous war abroad, and a more dangerous edition brake forth at home. The war, from the Volscians, was least feared: from a personage of noble lineage descended, of great name and reputation, A. Manlius Capitolinus. Who being a man of too lofty and haughty a minde, despised all other noble dignities, as above the rest, M. Furius, so singular, as well in regard of his nobility, and evoked one his worthy parts and commendable virtues. He could not brook and endure, that he only should ever be Lord General in the field: who now was exalted to high above others, that even those who were created with him in equal authority, he accounted not as equals.

his peers and fellows, but employed as his Miniftrers and Servitors. "Whereas (quoth he) if men would weigh aright, and duly consider every thing, M. Furius could never have delivered his Country from the ferge of the enemies, had not the Capitol and Cattle cliff been faved by me alone. Camillus fet upon the Gauls, when they were amuffed in receiving their gold, when they were upon terms of peace, and their hearts quiet and secure: whereas my felt chafed them away whiles they were in arms, and at the point to win the Cattle Hill. In that exploit of Camillus the fouldiers, had each one his fhare proportionably of the glory, who together with him did their parts: but in the fervice performed by me, no earthly creature was fellow and partner with me. With thefe conceits he fed his own humour, and puffed up his proud fpirit, being withal by corrupt difpofition of nature, hot and hafty, arrogant and inolent. Difcontented besides, that of the Nobility, his gifts and qualities were not efteemed of that worth, as in his own judgement they deferved: fift, of a Senator he became popular and began to break his mind, and impart his designs unto the Miftrats of the Commons: finding fault with the Nobility, and complaining of them: folliciting and inveigling the Commons, to caft aliking and favour toward himfelf: carried away with the vain gale of the peoples opinion: nor guided by fage council and difcretion: and in one word, chufing rather to be of great name, than of good and honeft report. And not contenting himfelf to deal in the Laws Agraria, about the divition of Lands, which had alwayes miniftred to the Tribunes of the Commons matter enough of mutinies and leditions: he began to intermeddle between the debtors and their creditors, and to overthrow all keeping of credit. And indeed, deep debts are fharp goads, and prick fhrewdly: threatening not only poverty and fhame, but alfo terrifying the bodies of free men with hard imprifonments, little eale, and Irons. Now there were exceeding many far in debt (a thing moft dangerous and hurtful to mens ftate) even of the richer fort, by reason of their great expenfes defrayed in building. The war therefore of the Volcians, which was it felt of great importance, but much more, in regard of the Latins and Hernicks Rebellion withal, was in fhew pretended, as a caufe to feek for to have a more foveraign and abfolute power to govern the State: but in truth, the new defignments and plots of Manlius, rather than the war, forced the Senat to create a Dictator. And A. Cornelius Coflus being created, nominated for his General of Horfe, T. Quintus Capitolinus. The Dictator, albeit he faw a greater contention toward, at home than abroad, yet were it that the war required fome fpeedy expedition, or becaufe by victory and triumph, he thought to make his Dictatorfhip more mighty and powerful) he took muffers, and fet forward into the Pomptine Land, into which parts he had intelligence, that the Volcians had proclaimed their forces, to repair.

of the author.

I doubt not, but they that read in fo many books already, of thefe continual wars fought with the Volcians, besides their tedious fatiety of reading, will mufe alfo at this (which to my felt was likewise a wonder, when I perused the writers that lived near about the times of thefe acts) how thefe Volcians and Equians, fo often vanquished and defeated, were furnifhed with fupply of fouldiers to maintain their wars. But feeing by the ancient Chroniclers it hath been overpaffed with filence, what fhould I alledge, but only mine own opinion and bare conjecture, which every man hath liberty to put in for himfelf? Likely it is, that either between the times of wars (as now we fee in the Roman muffers) they ufed to breed up one fupply under another, of the younger fort, to the maintenance and renning fo oftentimes of their war: or that their armies were not awayes levied out of the fame States, albeit the wars go under the name of one and the felf-fame nation: or that thofe countries yielded in thofe days an infinit number of freemen, which now are well near waft and deart but for fome Roman flaves, which keep thofe parts yet from being void and difpopped, as having but a very fmall feminary, or none at all left, of ferviceable fouldiers.

Certainly, the Volcians army, as all authors agree, was very great at this time: albeit of late dayes by the leading and conduct of Camillus they were fore weakened, and their ftrengh much abated. Besides, there were with them in field, the Latins and Hernicks, fome of the Circians, and other Colomers from Velitra. The Roman Dictator having that day pitched his camp, and the next morning come abroad with happy tokens of good fpeed from the Birds: having alfo flain a facifice, and procured thereby the favour and grace of the Gods, in joyous manner fhewed himfelf unto his fouldiers: who according as they were commanded, were ready early in the morning, by break of day in arms, attending the found of Trumpet for battel. The day is ours (quoth he) my valorous fouldiers, if either the Gods or their Prophets can foretell future events. Therefore as refolute men of affured hope, and fuch as fhall encounter with far manner than our felves, pitch we our javelins down at our feet, and draw our fwords only. Neither would I have you to run out of the main battel, and to give the charge, but to keep your ground, to ftand ftedfaft, and abide the firft fhock of the enemy. And when they have spent their volley of fhoot in vain, and fhall with full force come upon you as you ftand, then brandifh your fwords, and let them glitter in their eyes, and think every man of the Gods, that they will help the Romans. The Gods I fay, which in happy hour, by the lucky approbation of their Birds, have fent us into the field to fight. And as for you, O Quintus, keep your Horfemen clofe together, marking advifedly the firft beginning of the skirmifh: and when you fee the battels buckle together pell-mell, and come to hand-firokes, whiles they are bufied and occupied one way, fight them another way with your Horfemen, ride among their ranks as they fight, and break their arraies. Thus fought both Horfe and Foot according to his direction, And

As the legions wanted not a worthy Captain, no more miffed the Captain of happy fpeed. The multitude of the enemies trufting upon nothing but their own number, which they meafured and compared together only by their eye, interviewing both the one army and the other, rafhly gave battel, and as rafhly gave over again. In fhout only and fhout fhewing themfelves hot and eager at the firft encounter: but were not able to abide the fhord-light, the clofing together foot to foot, and the firy countenance of their enemies, which for the very heat of their courage, fhined and glittered fully in their eyes. So the forefront being put back, a fear came upon them likewise, that ftood behind for fupply, and withal, the Horfemen for their parts fet to and fought moft terribly. Whereupon the ranks of the enemies in lundry places were broken and all fce out of order, fo as their battalions feemed to ftore and wave up and down to and fro, in fupenew thought no other but his own turn was next to be killed (fmiten down and flain, and every one Romans came forward till and chafed them. And fo long as they went their way armed and thick together, it was the footmens work to purfue them: but when it was perceived once, that in the fields: then were the troups of Horfemen fet out after them, with this caveat and charge, to make no ftay and forlet the time, by killing them one by one, and fo to give the main multitude of them in the mean while fufficient refpit to elcape: but that they fhould content themfelves only to let fime fhoot amongst them, and by fcaring them to hinder their running: and when they were ridden beyond, to crofs upon them and itay them, until the footmen might overtake them, flay them down right and make an hand of them clean. Thus fled they, and thus were they followed in chafe until night. The very fame day was the Volcians camp taken and ransacked, and the whole pillage, besides the bodies of free men, was given unto the fouldiers. The greater part of the prifoners were Hernicks and Latins: and thole not of the common fort, and fuch as might be thought to have ferved for pay: but there were found among them certain young Gentlemen of good mark, a plain proof and evidence, that the Volcians enemies had aid from thence by the publick and general warrant of the State. There were known alfo to be among them fome of the being examined before the chief of the Senators, they confefled every one in plain terms, the refilling of their own Nation like as they had before betrayed it unto the Dictator. The Dictator kept his forces together within the ftanding camp, making no doubt, but that the rulers and Senators of Rome would determine to war upon thofe countries.

The Volcians
defeated.

But even at that time a greater heap of troubles which arole at home, caufed him to be fent for to Rome, by occasion of a fedition which grew daily more and more: and by reason of the Author thereof (a man of quality and note) was more feared than any actually had been ftore time. For now by this had M. Manlius not by fpeeches only, but by plain deeds alfo, which in outward fhew feemed popular and plaufible) fhewed evidently upon what troublefome and turbulent fpirit all proceeded. For feeing upon a time a Centurion, of good worth for his lifetime, condemned in an action of debt, and upon an execution of judgement carried to prifon: retinue, laid hand on him, and took him perforce from the officers: and a ter he had given out some words aloud touching the pride of the Senators, the cruelty of the ufurers, the exaltations of the Commons, the valour and preftent diftreffs of the party: Marry then (quoth he) have I done a great deed, to no purpofe, in faving the Capitol and the Cattle with this right hand of mine, if I could abide to fee my fellow fouldier (as if he were taken prifoner of the Gauls by way of conquest) had away into bondage and captivity, and laid up faft in eyes and fetters. And therewith openly in fight of all the people paid the whole debt down right on the nail, unto the creditor: and fo after the ufual and folemn ceremony by a brazen peece of coin and the billance, fet him at liberty out of the creditor his hands, and let him go at large: Who prayed he, patron and protector of the Commons of Rome. And when he was once got into that untuly and feditious throng, he prefently himfelf fet all a madding, fhewing the fars of his wounds received in the Veintians and Gauls wars, and in other fervices one after another: lying, that whiles he thus followed fouldierly, and rebounded his honie that was destroyed, he became indebted, and that fo deeply (by reafon that the intereft alwayes overgrew the principal, which he by that means had paid and paid again) that he was not able to creep out of the ufurers hook, but was plunged therein over head and ears. And now behold (quoth he) by the only goodneffe of M. Manlius, I have the liberty again to fee the light of the Sun, to behold the Commonplace, to look my neighbours and fellow citizens in the face: at his hands I acknowledge, to have received all the benefits that mine own parents could give me: at his hands I vow whatfoever in me is left, and in his quarrel to fpend that little life and blood which remaineth in my body: and in one word look what privilege I may enjoy in right of my country, and in the communion of the Gods, publick or private, the fame do I impart and communicate with that one man. By thefe fpeeches the Commons were fce and pricked forward mightily, as if they devoted unto one perfon: and who but Manlius now in every mans mouth? And prefently the nick he entred into another action that tended more effectually to mar all quite, and to fet every thing out of order. His Land in the territory of Veii, which was the chief and capital

Manor of his inheritance, even the fairest flower of his garland, he set upon sale, causing it openly to be cried: and said wistful, I will not O Quirites, so long as I have one foot of ground, or any thing else left, see one of you condemned and upon execution carried to prison. This let them so a flote, that they were ready, as it seemed, to follow him as the only protector of their liberties, in any action, were it right or wrong, they cared not which way, all was one with them. Besides, at home in his own house, he spared not to cast out scurrilous speeches against the Senators, as if he had been at the open Cross, making Orations, Amongst which, without all regard whether he spoke true or false, he let fall these words, "That the Senators kept in secret certain hidden treasures of the Gauls gold, and were not now contented to hold in possession the common grounds, but they would also embezzle the treasure publicly, which if it came abroad, the Commons might soon be acquit and discharged of their debts. This gap being once laid open, and this light given the people, they thought (ye may be sure) an unworthy indignity, that when there was gold to be levied for redemption of the City out of the Gauls hands, it then should be gathered by a general contribution of all: and the same gold, now recovered from the enemies, should be as a prey in the clutches of a few. Therefore they followed instantly upon him and were very earnest to know, where so great a mass of money and ston good was hidden. But when he posted them off, and said he would in due time disclose all: they were not content, but setting all other matters apart, their whole care was employed about this business, and nothing else. So as it plainly appeared that neither he should reap a mean thank if he reported a truth, nor incur a small offence and displeasure, in case he told a false tale.

Things hanging thus in these doubtful terms, the Dictator who was sent for, returned from the army into the City. The next day he assembled the Senat: and after he had thoroughly sounded and felt the minds of them, that were there mer, he commanded the Senators not to depart from him: and assisted as he was with that company, he cauled the Ivory chair of estate to be set in the Comitium or common Hall, and sent a servant for M. Manlius. Who being thus peremptorily summoned by the Dictators express commandment, gave warning by a token to his complices and favourites, that there was a broil and fray toward: and with a mighty retinue of his followers, he preferred himself before the Tribunal. On the one side, stood the Senators, on the other the Commons: either part beholding their Captain, as it were in a pight field ready to joyn battle.

Then after silence made, "Would to God (quoth the Dictator unto Manlius) I and the Senators of Rome, might in all other things fort as well with the Commons, as I am assured, we shall agree all together about thee, and the matter which I shall ask and demand of thee. I see thou hast put the City in some good hope, that by the Gauls treasure which the principal and chief of the Senators detain with them secretly hidden, all men may keep their credit, and fully pay and discharge their debts. Which I for my part, so God me help, am lo far from hindring, that contrary-wise I would exhort thee, O M. Manlius, to ease the Commons of Rome of the wretches book: to discover these fellows and make them known, that gave so greedily after the common treasure, and to disappoint them, and turn them out of this their privy booty. Which if thou do not effect, either for that thy self wouldst have a fleece with them, or else because it is but a forged tale that thou hast made of thine own fingers ends. I will not fail, but commit thee to a wild, and suffer no longer the multitude upon a vain and deceitful hope, thus by thee to be abused and disquieted. To this, Manlius made answer and said, "I was nothing deceived but as I said well enough, that a Dictator was created not against the Volscians, who are enemies (forsooth) so oft as our great Masters think it for their purpose: nor against the Latins and Hernicks, whom they drive and provoke to rebellion by false and forged surmises: but against myself and the Commons of Rome. For now I see well, that the Dictator professeth to maintain and bear out the Wretches against the Commons: and that against myself, for the favour that the multitude beareth unto me, there is matter devised to charge me wistful, and to procure my utter ruin and overthrow. Doth it offend and grieve you indeed, O Cornelius and you my Lords of the Senat, that the people thus stand about me on every side? Why do not ye every man for his part, by your good offices divide asunder this company, and draw them away with you from me? Namely, by your mediation and intercession, by giving your word for them, by ridding out of gyves and prison your fellow citizens, by saving them that are condemned, from being awarded to the thraldom of their creditors, and out of the overplus and superfluous of your own living and goods by relieving their present need, and supplying their necessities? But what mean I to periwade you to forgo any thing of your own, and bestow it upon them? Take another course with them, and make them another offer. Do but deduct out of the principal debt, that which hath been paid, for consideration of the loan; you shall soon see that my retinue will make no greater shew, than any other mans else. But why am I the only man so careful of the citizens and people? Certainly, I can make no better answer herunto, than if I should ask me, wherefore I alone saved the Capitol and the Cliff? As I then yielded my helping hand to all in general, so will I now to my power relieve each one in particular. For as touching the treasure of the Gauls: the thing in itself being easy, this demand of yours maketh hard and difficult. For what need you ask me that which you know already your selves? Why lay you not that open which is in your secret bosom, rather than to have it sifted and bolted out? but that there is some privy juggling, some cunning practise and packing therein? The more ye would seem to have your leiger demain to be sought into and detected: so much the more, I fear me, ye will

A "hide it even from the eyes of those that are watchful and quicksighted. And therefore aim not "to be forced to reveal and shew where your ston goods are: but you would be made, if you "were well served, to bring them abroad into the view of the World. At these words, the Dictator commanded him to leave off these foolish vapourings and trifling shifts: urging him either he had lately slandered and wrongfully charged the Senat, and sought to bring upon them the ill will and hatred of men, for a vain surmise and insinuation of Theocracy. But as he stoutly interposed and replied again, that he would not speak at the pleasure of his enemies, nor owed them any such service: he commanded him to be had away to prison and kept in bonds. And as he was B apprehended by the Officer, "O Jupiter (quoth he) Optimus Maximus, O Imus Queen of heaven, "O Minerva, with other gods and goddesses, that inhabit the Capitol and the Cattle: suffer ye "your Knight and Defender: to be thus tugged, misused, and evil entreated by his adversaries? "And shall this right hand wherewith I defeated the Gauls, and drove them from your Chapel and shrines, be now pinnioned and manacled? There was no one man there, that law and abide any just, righteous and lawful commandment of the Magistrate, contained her self and was content in some cases to be overruled: so far forth, that against the authority and absolute power of the Dictator, neither the Tribuns of the Commons, nor the Commons themselves, durst either cast up their eyes to look awry, or once open their mouths. But after Manlius was committed, it was for certain known, that a great sort of the Commoners, changed their weed and put on their worst apparel and mourning array: many a man let his head and beard grow long; yea, and a number of them with loud and heavy cheer, kept commonly about the Goal-dore.

Now when the Dictator triumphed over the Volscians, his triumph bred him more hatred and displeasure than honor and glory: for it is commonly spoken, that he got it at home and not abroad, and triumphed over a citizen not over an enemy: and this only wanted, (say they) to like to grow much scandal and very sedition. For the appeasing and mitigation whereof, the Senat upon a sudden, without any motion made, of themselves became bountiful, and assigned 2000, D citizens of Rome to be sent to Saturnum to inhabit as a Colony. And to every man was set out two acres and an half of Land apiece. Which the Commoners construed to be a matter of nothing, a small boon bestowed upon a few, the very hire and reward for betraying Manlius. So his followers made him of greater mourning and heaviness, in their vile clothes and sad countenance, after the guise of persons accused during the time of their troubles. And when the fear and terror was once overblown, by reason that the Dictator after his triumph, reigned up his head in open audience to upbraid the multitude and cast in their teeth, "That it was their faultions always to lift up and advance their Protectors and Defenders: into high places, and afterwards, in the very pitch of danger and point of downfall, to forsake and leave them destitute. This was Sp. Cassius served, that solicited the Commons to the division of Lands: this was Sp. Melius overthrow, that put his hand to his purse, and at his own proper charges kept "extream famine from the hungry jaws of the poor citizens. Semblably, M. Manlius endeavoured to deliver a great part of the City (drowned as it were and overwhelmed in debt) and "to enlarge them and let them abroad at liberty, now for his pains is betrayed unto his deadly enemies: so that the Commons do feed and drink up, even for the shambles and butchers knife "the factors and maintainers of their wealth and liberty. And ought indeed (say they) a Noble man, that sometimes had been Consul, thus to be misused? he answered not to the good liking "and pleasure of the Dictator? Suppose, he had over-reached and made a lie afore, and so had "not a present and ready answer at the time: was there ever any servant and slave, for leaving call "in prison and laid up in lions? And how could they forget that night, which was like to have "been the last night that ever the Romans should have seen: that fatal night of their final destruction for ever? Or how could they chide, but have still in their eye the army of the Gauls climbing up the Cliff Tapeia? and how M. Manlius in person, so bravely been in his armour, "all sweating all bleeding, rescued and saved Jupiter himself in a manner out of the enemies hands? "What? Did they think that with half-pound measures of wheat meal, they had insufficiently recompensed the Saviour of their Country? And whom they had well near canonized amongst "the holy hallows of Heaven, or at least-wise by his new addition of surname made equal to "the Jupiter Capitolinus, was it well done to suffer him by his new addition of surname made equal to "and are ye all not able to help him alone? Thus cased not the multitude to exclaim and make "their plaints, and would not depart from that place, nor, not all the multitude to exclaim and make "break the prison by force: until such time as they got that wretched, which otherwise they would have wrested, and Manlius by an act of the Senat was released out of prison and enlarged. Whereby the mutiny was never the more ended, but rather a Captain given them to maintain the Sedition.

About the same time the Latins and Hernicks, the inhabitants also of the Colony Circensia, and they of Velletri, who came to excite themselves for the Volscian war, wherein they were charged to have had their hands, and required to have the captives delivered, for to proceed against them, according to their own Laws, had a heavy answer. But the Coloners received the sharper check and rebuke, because they being Roman citizens, were entered into that wicked plot and abominable action, to combine against their native Country. And they were not only denied their prisoners, but also (wherein the Romans dealt more favourably with the rest that were their Allies) were warned and commanded in the name of the Senat, to avoid and that with speed out of the City: from the sight and presence of the people of Rome; for fear lest the privilege of Embassage, provided for the security and safe conduct of forrainers and not of citizens, should not serve to protect them. Now when the Sedition of Manlius was let on foot again, somewhat before the end of the year, the great assembly was holden for the Election of Magistrats: wherein there were created Tribuns in Consuls authority Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis the second time, P. Valerius Potius the second time, M. Furius Camillus the fifth time, Ser. Sulpitius Rufus the second time, C. Papirius Crassus, T. Quintus Cincinnatus the second time, all of Senators calling.

In the beginning of this year, peace they had with forrainers nations; a matter very commodious both for the Senat and the Commons. For the Com, in this regard, that being not called away by any musters, they had some good hope (especially having so mighty a champion) to be rid at once for ever of ultry. For the Senators again, because their minds being not distracted by any fear from abroad, might attend about curing and healing the intestine maladies at home. When both parts therefore were now more sharp let, and eagerly bent, they thought out of hand to trie what would be done, and to make either a shaft or a bolt of it. Manlius calling the Com, to his house, devised with the principal heads of them both day and night, to bring in a change and alteration of the State: and fuller of (tomack, anger and gall he was now a good deal than aforetime. Needed he was, the rather by his late disgrace and shame, who never before had been touched in credit, nor tasted of any reproach and contumely. Heart he took unto him, for that the Dict, durst not execute that rigor against him, which Cincinnatus Quintus had extended upon Sp. Madius; and it seemed unto him, that not only the Dict, sought to wind himself out, and in resigning up his room, to avoid the offense given by his imprisonment; but also that the very Senat was not able to endure the manner of proceeding. With these imaginations being puffed up and galled too, he failed not withal to prick forward and exasperate the minds of the Commons, who of themselves already, were kindled and set on fire. And with these and such like speeches he entertained them. "How long (quoth he) I pray you, will ye be ignorant, and not know what ye may do, and what power ye have? A thing that nature it self would not have so much as the very dumb beasts, but to understand. Do but count how many you are in number your selves, and how few adversaries ye have against you. If ye were but one to one, yet (I would think) you should more eagerly strive for to maintain your liberty, than they, to let up their Lordship. For, look how many favours ye have been, following and courting one patron, to whom many shall ye now be opposed to one enemy. Make but shew only of war, ye shall have peace. Let them see you once ready to make head and offer violence, soon will they yeeld and part with their right; Either ye must adventure, all jointly together to do somewhat, or else make account each one, to abide and suffer all. How long will ye stand looking from every side upon me? I for my part, surely, will not fail any one of you. Look ye then to it, that fortune fail not me, I, even I, that was your redeemer and deliverer, was all at once (when it pleased mine enemies) taken down and made no body. And ye, all of you saw him led to prison, who saved every one of you from prison. If happily those mine enemies should attempt to do me more (spight, Where am I then? and what were I best to trust unto? Should I look for that end that Cassius and Madius came unto? Ye do well to signify how you dread the peflage, and with the contrary. And the Gods forbid that it should so come to pass. But look not that ever they should come down from Heaven to protect me. That mind they must give you, to preserve me from so hard a hap, like as they gave me a resolute heart, both in mine armour to save you from barbarous enemies, and in my gown to defend you from proud citizens. Is there so little courage in you (so mighty a people otherwise) as to think it sufficient, and to stand contented, if you may be backed only, and meet with some help against your enemies; and to know no other scuffling with your adversaries (the Senators) but wherein you suffer your selves to be commanded in the end? This baseness cometh not to you by kind, by use and custome only, you are become their vassals and subjects. For what is the cause ye are so courageous against your enemies abroad, that ye think it meet and reason to rule and govern them? No other in truth but this, because with them you have been ever wont to strive for forrainers, whereas against these ye have been used rather, to make some slight proof and tryal what you may do by your liberty, than to do your best, and to put your selves forth for to maintain it and extend it to the most. And yet what manner of captains sever ye have met withal to lead you, and howsoever affected ye have been your selves, obtained ye have hitthero all things that ye shot at, were they never so great: Such was your might, or such was your felicity. Wherefore now it is high time to give the adventure of greater matters also. Make but tryal only of your own good fortune, and of my self, whom I hope ye have had happy

"experience

The Feditious
Oration of
M. Manlius to
of Rome.

A "experience of already: with less ado shall ye be provided of one to over-rule and command the Senators, than ye have been hitherto of those, that were to resist only their impetuous government. Down we must with these Dictatorships and Consulships both, and lay them all with the ground: that the commonality of Rome may once be aloft, and bear up the head, that your selves therefore, and play the men. Hinder process and course of law for actions of debt, I profess my self a Patron of the Commons, which name my care or you, my friendships to you, hath induced me with. And if you please to entitle your leader and Captain, with a more glorious title of honour and Majesty, ye shall find it more potent and available to effect that which you long for and desire. And so from that time forwards, began some practice to set up the Government of a King: But neither who were the agents in this action, nor to what terms they agreed, or plots proceeded, is it plainly enough recorded. But on the other side, the Senator, sat in Con-cel, and debated about the Succession and secret meeting of the Commons in the private house of Manlius, and that house, which stood (as it fell out) upon the Cattle Hill: likewise of that imminent engine and fabrick, devised for the overthrow of the present liberty. Many were of opinion, of one wicked member out of the way, and cutting him off, might end this intestine and civil war.
But they came down at length, and grew to a resolution, in words milder, yet indeed and effect all one, That the Magnificence should have a cure. For that by these mischievous plots and practices of C. M. Manlius, the Commons were incited and diminished, and hurt. Then the Tribuns in Consuls authority, and the other Tribuns of the Commons (for even they also seeing, that in the looke of the publick liberty of all, their power likewise should come to an end, had yeelded to be advised and ruled by the Senat) laid all their heads together, and consulted what course was best to be taken.
When as no man could be think of any way, but plain violence and bloodshed (a peace or work in all appearance, of great adventure and doubtful hazard) then M. Mucius, and Q. Publilius, two Tribuns of the Commons stepped forth and said, "What mean we to make that, a quarrel between the Senators and Commons, which the whole body united of the City, indeed should understand against to dangerous and pestilent a member? Why trouble we one selves to let upon him and the Commons with him, whom by the means of the very Commons themselves we D "own power wherupon he presumeth, he may fall lurcharged and overwhelmed with his fully minded to arrest him, to convent him judicially, and call him to his answer. We are the less popular, and more odious to the people, than to hear of Kings government again. The multitude shall not so soon see and perceive, that our quarrel is not with them, but that they shall become his competent Judges, and pass upon him, who now are his Advocates: also, that his accusers from out of the Commons, shall behold one of the Nobility to hold up his hand, at the bar, and the indictment framed, upon the crime of usurping the Kingdom: but (by these of it) they will tender and favour the fair looks and person of no man, before the cause of their own free estate. When all the house liked well, and allowed of this advice and overture, they E made no more ado, but served Manlius with process to answer at a day appointed. Which was when they saw the accused man, during his trouble so fitfully arraigned, accompanied with none the Senators, nor so much as one of his kindred and affinity, nor his very brethren An. and T. Manlius. A thing; before that day never seen nor known, but that in so great a danger as was, the nearest kinsfolk in blood, did change their weed. For even when Q. Claudius his adversary, yes, and the whole image and name of the Claudivi, were mournfully clad, and poorly paraded. Now surely (say they) it is a very compact amongst them all, that this popular man, to gracious and well beloved, should be confounded and overthrown, because he was the first that ever fell away from the Senators to the Commons. When the day was come of his arraignment, F I can find in no author, what was objected against the prisoner by his accusers, directly tending to prove the crime of aspiring to a Kingdom, but only the conventicles of the multitude, certain in-dicious words, his overmuch largels, and his forged libelle and false information of the gold, I doubt not but there was matter of great importance, urged and enforced against him, seeing that the Commons delay in proceeding to his condemnation, was not long of his cause, but occasioned by the place only. This one thing seemeth worthy to be noted, and for all mens learning, that how notable and how great forever his honor, worship, and commendable parts were: the foul and curied desire of tyrannical rule, made not only unpleasant and without grace, but also odious and detestable in the eyes of the people. He brought forth, as it is reported, twine hundred men, dred men, whom he had laid out money for gratis, and without any interest, twine hundred those whose goods he saved from port-sale, and without any interest, twine hundred men, they were condemned. Over and besides, he not only reckoned up their creditors, after fight, the honorable testimonies of his service in the wars: as the spoils of his enemies by him slain and disbursed, to the number of 30, gifts bestowed upon him by his enemies by him 40, amongst which were two goodly mural garlands for scaling and entering upon the walls first: eight civick coronets for saving the lives of citizens in danger. Moreover, he presented there in place, the parties themselves in person, whom he had rescued out of the enemies hands:
and amongst them he nominated C. Servilius at that instant General of the Horlemen, and now abient.

"come with reason and counsel, that you may sooner overcome by force and arms. Hiceto: Camillus made answer again: What wars forever (quoth he) unto this present day have by mine own entire conduct, and sole direction been managed, neither can you nor the people of Rome deny, but that in them you never repented, either of my policy or happy luck. Now I know full well, that I have a companion joined with me, in government & rule of equal commissions: for the prime and lustiness of youth, much above me, and my better. And as to the army, I have indeed been used ever to command, and not to be commanded: but yet my fellows authority, I cannot be against. Let him do in Gods Name, what he thinketh good for the Commonwealth, and God speed his hand. Only in regard of mine old age I crave this favour, that I may not be set in the forefront: but for other labours, look what an old man may or ought to do in war, therein surely I shall not fail. And this one thing would I crave at the hands of the immortal Gods, that some notable mishap befall not to make my former counsel good and praiseworthy. But neither would men be ruled by his advice for profitable and wholesome, nor the Gods you, bide to hear his prayers for holy and devout. Then Lucius Furius the author and principal periwader of battel, setteth the vanguard in array. Camillus he fortifieth the Regiments and Squadrons for supply in the rearward: but above all, he placeth a strong guard before the camp. Himself took up his standing on a higher place, to behold and mark the issue of another mans counsel. So soon as at the first brunt and encounter, they rustled and made a noise with their armour, the enemies on purpose (of policy, and not for fear) gave footing and loft ground. Now, there was behind them on their back a pretty rising of an Hill between their camp and the battel: and by reason that they were well stored of men, they had left behind them in the camp certain strong companies armed and well appointed: with this instruction that whiles both armies were hard in fight, and when their enemies should come near their trench and rampier, they might tally out on a sudden upon them. The Romans following out of measure upon the enemies as they retreated, were drawn upon the disadvantage of the ground, and gave occasion and fit opportunity unto the enemy to issue out of the camp upon them. So the terror returned upon the ill-fated victors, by reason both of the new supplies of the enemies, and also of the tall and delectable of the Hill: and forced the battel of the Romans to give back. The Volscians that charged them from out of the camp, and were fresh and lusty, pressed hard upon them: they also that made as though they fled, began now to fight again. The Romans soldiers forgetting now both their late insults, and their ancient honour, retired not easily and softly in good order, but plumed their backs on all sides, fled amain by heaps, and ran away toward their own camp. Whereat Camillus being by them that attended about his person, mounted upon a good Conner, and with all the speed he could make, opposing the Squadrons of the rearward against the enemy: "Is this (quoth he) the fight, you soldiers, that ye so called for? What God, what man can ye lay the weight on now? It was your rashness and fool-hardiness afore: and it is your dastardly cowardice now, and nothing else, that is the cause of all this. Followed ye have already one General, Follow Camillus now a while: and as ye have been always wont by my leading, once more win the victory. What look you toward the hold and the camp? there is no coming thither, there is no being there for any of you without victory. At the first they were affrighted, and staid themselves from farther flight: but after that they saw one the ensigns wheel about, and the Squadrons turn again, they made head, and charged the enemy amain. And the General himself, a man renowned for many triumphs, and besides, for his venerable age so revered, even amongst the foremost ensigns, amid the greatest perils, and most difficulties, advanced forth in person. Hereupon every one for his part, let the better leg forward, provoked his fellow withal, and encouraged one another, so as with a cheerful and lively shout, the whole field rang again. Neither was the other Tribun behind hand for his part: but being sent by his Collegue unto the Horsemen (whiles he in the mean time marshalled again the Footmen in order) not by way of chiding (for whar might he avail thereby, so long as he was himself in fault as well as the rest?) but laying aside all Lordly command, fell wholly to entreating, and besought them both all and some to quit themselves like men, and acquit him of the guilt and blame of that unlucky dayes work. Indeed (quoth he) when my brother Camillus would not agree thereto, but expressly forbade, yet I chose rather to be partaker of the folly and rashness of all, than the widome and sage advice of one. Camillus (come what will of it, speed you well, or speed you ill) seeth the glory will be his: but I, unless the battel be revived, shall take such part as you all, (a most miserable and pitious case) but the flame will redound and light upon my head and none else. Well, as length they agreed, and thought it best to abandon their Horses to beslow them among the waving and disordered companies and on foot to make head upon the enemies. Thus they go both together, as bravely minded with resolution, as they were richly and gorgeously armed. And in what part soever they saw the footmen most distressed, there went neither in the Generals nor in the soldiers, courage in the highest degree to fight it out lustily. Well was it seen by the happy event, that valorous endeavours speed ever well. For the Volscians the same way that erewhile they made semblance of giving ground upon a counterfeited fear, now fled in good sadness as hard as they could. A great number both in the conflict, and after in the chase were slain. As for the rest that remained in the camp, which presently at one brunt was won, more of them were taken prisoners than killed. In the chase & account taken of the captives, there were some of them known to be Tuskians, who were severed apart from the rest, and brought before the

A State-Tribuns. And upon examination, confessed fully, that they served by the publick warrant of the City. Camillus herewith disquieted, sort out of war from to meet neighbors. said he would forth with have those prisoners with him to Rome, that the Lords of the Senate might not be ignorant how the Tuskians were revolted from their fidelity. In the mean while, his brother Tribun might, if he so pleased, have the regiment of the leaguer and the host. The work neither he himself, nor any man else in the army, thought that Camillus would quit, and yet fault of his, whereby the State of the Commonwealth was driven upon so dangerous a point of downfall. And as well in the host, as also at Rome, it was ripe and urgent in every mans mouth: that whereas the fight with the Volscians was variable, and the victory doubtful, the Tuskians, by the difficulties and the running away, L. Furius was all in fault: but for the good felicity, Camillus had all the honour.

When the captives were brought into the Council House, and the Lords of the Senate were of opinion and determined war against the Tuskians, and had laid the charge thereof upon Camillus, he requested to have an assistant joined with him in Commission: and being left to his own choice L. Furius. By which moderation of his affections, and good carriage of himself, he both delayed the intamy of his Collegue, and won himself great glory and commendation. Yet for all this, proceeded not they to any war with the Tuskians. For they by their constant observation, when the Romans entered and invaded their territory, they were not so much as one of those places that lay near the high way, whereas the enemy marched: they were not so much as one of those grounds, but kept the gates of their City wide open, came forth solemnly in their long gowns, as well out of the City as Country, bringing their victuals right conveniently to leave the army, desirous to know, whether there were the same appearance of peace within the walls as abroad in the Country, entered the City: and seeing the doors standing open, the shop windows up, all kind of wares set out to sale upon the bulks: the Craft-men and Artisans busily every one occupied at his work: the Grammar schools ringing again with a chime of Scholars, learning and doing their lessons: the streets full of women and children amongst the other common people going to and fro about their business: he could perceive no where about him any thing that carrying in that warlike order. Thus call he his eyes into every corner, seeking where this war should be. For there was not so much as any token to be seen, either of ought removed out of the way, had scarcely heard any inkling or rumor of hostility. Being therefore overcome with this patience and sufficiency of the enemies, he caused their Senat to assemble unto whom he spake in this wise: "Ye alone this day of all that I know, O Tuskians, have found the only manner of proof, and the forcible sense indeed, to save your selves and all ye have from the Romans ire. Go your ways to Rome unto the Senat there. The Lords of the Council will weigh and consider, whether ye deserve more punishment before, then pardon now. I will not torcible and pick my self a private thank for a publick benefit. At my hands ye shall have this favour and liberty, to speak for your selves and plead your own cause: as the Senat shall think good, so shall you yourself have been faithful Allies and kept their allegiance seen to stand waiting with heavy cheer, and giving their attendance at the entry of the Court and Council Chamber: the Lords received by way of hospitality, more like then hostility. Then the Dictator of Tusculum made this speech and said: "Right honorable Senators, we against whom ye have proclaimed and made war, came forth to encounter your Generals and Legions, armed and appointed as ye see us at this present standing in the porch of your Council House. This was our array, this was the habit of our Commons, and always shall be, unless at any time we shall put on arms for you, and in your quarrel. Thanks we yield to your Captains and to your Armies that they have beleaved rather their eyes than their ears: and where they saw no hostility at all, there they offered none themselves. That peace which we have shewed and observed, the same gave we humbly still at the hands of your clemency. Turn we before you from your forces thither where power is to be found. And if we must needs make trial (by suffering ought) of your piety and power be against us: we will try it surely without armor. This is our full resolution, God grant it prove as fortunate, as it is well meant and proceeding from a single heart. As for the treacheries whereupon ye were moved to denounce war against us: although it be bootless and to no purpose to disprove that by words, which by deed is already proved: yet surely, were they never to true, we think verily that without prejudice to our selves, we may fairly confess the same, since that we have so evidently repented the do. And for you, so long, as you be worthy to have to fill much in effect (take the Tuskians. At the very instant they obtained peace: and not long after, the right of free burghers, to be made Citizens of Rome, so the Legions were withdrawn back again from Tusculum. Thus Camillus having won great honor by his policy and valour both in the Volscian war: by his happy success in the journey of Tusculum: by his singular patience and carriage of himself, toward his companion in government, as well in the one place as the other, went out of his Magistracy: there being created Tribuns Military for the next year, L. Valerius the fifth time, and Pub. Valerius the third time, C. Servilius the third time, Licinius Menenius the second time, P. Porpinus, Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis.

There was this year need of Censors also, by reason especially of the doubtful rumors that ran concerning debts: whiles of the one side the Tribuns of the Commons did aggravate the greatness thereof, and made it seem an odious matter: and they again of the other side, did elevate and made life of the same for whom it was good and beneficial, that the lent money should be thought abroad, in danger of being lost: for that (say they) the debtors cautiously rather would not, than for ability could not, keep their credit and make payment. So there were created Censors, C. Sulpicius Camerinus, Sp. Posthumius Regillensis. And this matter now already commenced, was broken off by the death of Posthumius, because it would have bred a scruple to chuse another Censor in the room of him deceased. When Sulpicius therefore had resigned up his place, it fell out to that other new Censors upon some error committed in their creation, exercised not their office: and to chuse a third time they made a scruple, so tender conscienced were they, as if the gods were not well pleased with that office for that year. But the Tribuns would not endure this deluding of the Commons, but gave it forth that it was intolerable: saying, "That the Senat sought to avoid

The Tribuns of the Commons against the Senat,

"the exhibiting of publick records and books, which gave testimony of the valuation of every man's substance to the worth: because they would not have the sums of debts to be seen and known: which might bewray and plainly shew, that one part of the City was enervated up and devoured of the other: and in the mean time the poor Commons too deeply engaged, were packed away, and sent forth against these enemies and those: and now without all regard and discretion, they sought occasions to quarrel and make war in every place. From Antium to Saturnia, from Suricula to Velutris, from these to Tusculum have your Legions been posted. And now, forsooth, there is war intended against the Latins, Hernicks and Prenetins: for hatred rather of the Citizens here at home, then of the enemies abroad: and all to wear out the Commons with continual wars, and to afford them no breathing while within the City: that in time of rest they might remember and think upon their freedom, keep their rooms in common assembly, where they might at the length hear their Tribuns voice pleading for the easement of misery, and for a final end of all injuries. But and if the Commons had the heart, and carried that mind with them, as to call to remembrance their ancestors liberty, they would suffer neither any Citizen of Rome to be awarded to bondage for debts, nor any multures for to be taken, until a view were made and just account had, of every man his debts, and some course taken for abating the same: that each man might know, what he had of other mens goods, what remained of his own: whether his body were left free, or at the mercy of his creditor, to lie in cold iron and baleful prison. This hire and salary of sedition, this reward once propounded a-forehand, stirred up (you may be sure) a mutiny soon after. For whereas there were many adjudged to be bound unto their Creditors, and the Senators had decreed new Legions to be believed, for the bruit and rumor that went of the Prenetins wars: both matters began to be hindered for taking any effect, as well by the Tribuns help as the Commons accord. For neither would the Tribuns suffer those that were condemned to be led to prison: nor yet the younger sort of the Commons, enter their names in the Muster-master his book. And the Senators for the present, less minded the execution of judgement for the Creditors behoof, then the mustering. For why?

News came already, that the enemies had put themselves in their journey from Prenefte, and were encamped in the Sabins country: And all this while, the very tidings hereof rather quickened and provoked the Tribuns of the Commons to the broil that was begun, than frightened them any jot from it. Neither would any thing serve to quench the sedition in the City, until the war was come in manner to the very walls. For the Prenetins had intelligence given them, that in Rome there was no army gathered, no General certainly known: the Senators and Commons not at jar and together by the ears. Their Captains hereupon, taking this advantage and opportunity, with a running camp invaded, spoiled and wasted the fields all afore them as they went, and came with banners displayed before the gate Collina. Great fear was in the City, every man cried Alarm, run up to the walls to man them, and to the gates to ward them. And at the last they left their mutinies, turned to the wars, and created T. Quintius Cincinnatus Dictator. He appointed for his General of horsemen, A. Sempronius Atratinus. This was not so soon vol-ged abroad, (so great a terror went always with that magistrature) but the enemies withal dissolved and departed from the walls: and the younger sort of the Romans, without any trifling and drawing back, upon the proclamation, gathered together. Whiles forces were thus arising at Rome, the enemies pitched their camp not far from the River Albia: and as they foraged the Country all about, they bragged and vaunted among themselves, that they had got that very plot of ground, which was ever fatal to the destruction of the City of Rome. Here will be (say they) the like fight, from hence will they fly, no doubt, as sometimes they did before in the Gauls war, for if the Romans feared that dismal and unlucky day, noted with the infamous name of this place: how much more will they dread the river Albia itself, in memorial of their so great overthrow, than the only bare day Albentis? Certainly, when they are come hither, they will think they see again the grim looks, and hear the hideous voices of those savage Gauls. Thus rolling & tossing,

The Prenetins invade the territory of Rome,

A with themselves these toyish conceits, rising of as vain and foolish presumptions, they relied wholly and repaid their ill hope in the lucky persuasion only of the place. The Romans continually knew full well, that their enemies the Latins, were (wherever they were) the very time as their devoted vassals in subjection, and as for the place now indeed, for them, mortal of boldness and cancel the remembrance of that shameful disgrace, then put them in fear, that any selves came now in their way, they would so fight with them even in that ground, as they

B did at Rome, in the very of their country: as they did the morrow after at Collina: when they home again to tell news how they sped, well or ill. Thus on both sides being resolute and contrate array, within light, "See you not (quoth he) O A. Sempronius, how they have stayed at Albia?

"I pray God, But you, with truly unlooked weapons, and doughty courage set spins to henc, gallop amongst the thicket of their main battel with your horsemen, I with the legions on foot

"will advance mine Engins, and display them in their faces, and charge them betwixt when they are disband on e, and put in fear. Adios now, and adios. O ye gods (the wits of our

C league) and punish them only for their delicts, both in dishonouring your div. e Majesty, and deceiving us in our name, whom they called enemy to witness. Neither horsemen nor footmen could the Prenetins abide, but at the very first shout and shock were the ranks broken. And seeing this, battalions in no place whole and flock were the ranks broken. were in that ominous tear, and arrayed away beyond their own camp, they stayed not turning for life, until by good footmanship they were come within the sight of Prenefte. There all such as well as they could: left peradventure, and chose a plot of ground, to sally in that late their villages should have been used, and after had put themselves within the town, forthwith

D tune to be besieged. But when the Roman Conqueror after the falling of their camp at Albia was come toward them and discovered, they abandoned that Fort also, and got within the town: there were under the leignory of the Prenetins, against which the Dictator warred round: and and got that town also by assault. Then came he to the principal head and very last town of the war, Prenefte, which was not by force won, but by surrender yielded up into his hands. And T. Quintius thus having obtained one victory in a pight field, won two camps and holds of the ene-

E again to Rome. In his triumph he carried aloft the Image of Jupiter, surnamed Emperor, which he brought from Prenefte, and set up in the Capitol, where it was placed and dedicated: a monument of this noble exploit recorded and engraven in these or such like words: T. Quintius Dictator, by the gracious help of Jupiter, and with the help of the gods, won nine towns, so on the 20 day

Then was the assembly holden for electing of Tribuns Military with Coill authority, who were equally chosen from out of the Nobility and the Com. Of Nobles were created, P. and C. Minucius, Manlius, for that in blood and degree they were above the Commens, and for favour more gracious then Julius the province of the Volsians was bestowed extraordinarily, without calling for

F selves ruled, and the Senators also (that would have it to repent afterwards, For without any co-footmen) foraging, and when upon a false alarm that those were best & intrapped they not, bid themselves apart, after to their rescue & convey, & kept not with them till the reporter of these tidings (who being indeed a Latin and an enemy, but disguised in the habit of a Roman soldier, whiles they made resistance with main force only in a ground of great disadvantage (giving & raising another quarter entered the camp of the Romans lying open in the plain, thus in both places,

G dy and resolute valor of the Roman soldiers only, without the help of general and command, Upon which news reported at Rome, at the first it was thought good to chuse a Dictator: but at they knew not how to use a victory when they had it, nor to take the opportunity of the time, whiles it offered it self both the Generals & the army were sent for home from them: & so for the sudden tumult by reason that the Prenetins having solicited the people of the Latins, entered into rebellion again. In the same year the men of Seia made moan of them elves for want of people, and thither new Coloners were assigned to inhabit there.

Albeit the Romans sped but badly in wars, yet the quietness at home was some comfort; which the Tribuns Military chosen from out of the Commons had procured by reason that they were so gracious and revered among those of their own coat and faction. All the beginning of the year following, was at the first on a light fire with hot discord and mutiny, when Sp. Furius, Quintus Servilius the second time, Licinius Menenius the third time, P. Claudius, M. Horatius and L. Geganius were Tribuns Military with Consuls authority. The matter and cause of which seditions broils, were the debts above specified. For the due inquisition whereof, and to know to what sums they amounted, Sp. Servilius Priscus and Cladius Scaevola were made Censors, but flopped they were for doing any thing by occasion of wars. For first, fearful messengers in all haste brought word, and alter, the flight of the Country people confirmed it, that the legions of the Volscians were entered into the confines, and fell to spoiling every where the territory about Rome. Notwithstanding which fear and forraign terror, so little were the civil discords appeased, that contrariwise the Tribuns of the Commons extended their power with more violence to hinder the levy of souldiers, until they had indentured and capitulated with the Senators, that so long as the wars lasted, no man should either contribute and be charged with any impost, or be sued in any action of debt. When the Com. took hold once of this easement and liberty, the musters were delayed no longer. And after they had levied and enrolled two new legions, it was thought convenient that the legions should be divided, and two armies sent forth into the Volscians Country. So F. Virius and M. Horatius, went on the right hand along the sea coast to Antium. Q. Servilius and L. Geganius on the left hand, by the way of the mountains to Ecetra. But on neither side met they with the enemy. Whereupon they fell to forraging the Country, not here and there in scattering wise, as the Volscians had done, after the manner of robbers, at starts upon advantage taken of their enemies discord, and by stealth for fear of their valour: but being a full power, and army of men and justly provoked to anger, the longer they continued there, the fouler work they made. For the Volscians standing in fear, left in the mean while they should be encountered with a power from Rome, had made roads only into the utmost frontiers; But contrariwise, the Romans made stay in the enemies land, the rather to train them forth and draw them to a field-fight. Having therefore burned up, in a manner, all the uplandish houses and granges, and some villages also, and left behind them no fruitful tree standing, nor the fown corn for hope of grain, and driven away whole booties of men, women, and catrel, which they could light on without the walls; they reduced their armies of both sides home again to Rome. In this mean while the debtors had some little respite to breath themselves in. But so soon as all was quiet from enemies abroad, they began a fresh to be sued and troubled by their creditors at home. And so small hope they had to be released of their old usury, that they fell into a new, by reason of a contribution collected toward a wall, which the Censors had set out to be made of square Ashler stone. To yield unto this imposition and burden, the Commons were driven, because there was no muster for the Tribuns of the Commons to hinder. Forced they were likewise through the might and power of the great men, to admit for Tribuns military, all of the Nobility, to wit, L. Emilius, P. Valerius the fourth time, C. Veturius, Servius Sulpicius, L. and C. Quinctius Cincinnatus.

By the fame strong hand also they prevailed so much, that without impeachment of any man, all the younger sort took the military oath, to that they levied three armies against the Latins and Volscians: who joining their legions together, had encamped themselves at Saturnum. One army was gathered for the defence of the City: another to be set out against all sudden wars, it happily elsewhere some tumult should arise: & a third, of all other the strongest, was under the conduct of P. Veturius, and L. Emilius, led to Saturnum. Where, finding the enemies embattled in good array upon a plain & even ground, they charged upon them presently. But ere that they had got the victory evidently in fight, and were but only in some good hope of having a fair day of their enemies, the rain to poured down with huge storms and tempests, that it parted both hosts asunder. The morrow after began a fresh conflict. And for a good while, the legions of the Latins especially, which by long alliance with the Romans had learned their manner of warfare, stood to it as valiantly, and sped as fortunately as the Romans. At length, the Roman horsemen that rood in a-mong them, brake their ranks; and when they were once disarrayed, the footmen displayed their ensigns, and advanced upon them: and look how much the Romans battel set toward, so much the enemies gave backward. But when they began once to taint in their fight, then the violence of the Romans was inmolerable. Thus the enemies were discomfited and scattered: and flying not toward their camp, but to Saturnum, which was two miles off, they were by the horsemen especially beaten down, trod under foot and slain. Their tents were taken and rifled. From Saturnum they dislodged, the next night after the battel was fought and marched in great haste (as if they fled) to Antium. And albeit the Roman army followed them by the tracks hard at heels, yet their footmanship served them better in their fear, than it did the Romans, for all their anger. So the enemies put themselves within the town walls, before the Romans could overtake them, and either cut off the tail of their rearward, or for them to stay. After this, some days were spent in walling the Country. For neither we the Romans sufficiently provided with warlike engines of battery and artillery to assail their walls, nor they well appointed to abide battel in plain field. Then arose some discord within the town, between the Latins and the Antiats. The

Antiats,

A Antiats, of one side wearied with calamities that follow long wars, wherewith all their life time they had been exercised even to their old age, were of mind to yield. The Latins by reason of their late revolt and rebellion (whiles after long peace, their courages continued yet fresh) were more forward and earnest to maintain wars still. But when they saw on both sides that they might do as little was soon ended. So the Latins leaving their fellowship & society of peace, for unhonest & dishonourable (as they thought it) departed from them, and stood out to revenge their own countries, tending to their good and safety, yielded up their town and country to the Romans. But the Antiats being well rid of these Commendors of theirs, to cross into all wholesome

B the anger and furious rage of the Latins, for that they could neither annoy the Romans by wars, had been the first place of refuge, after their defeat and unhappy flight. Neither let they any wholesome Church of Dame Alanta they spared. From which, as well profane as holy churches, only the enee of their own, nor fear of the gods that kept them, but (as men report) a tearful voice heard out of the Temple with heavy threats, unless they held their hands, and kept them far enough from burning the sacred habitations so impiously. In this rage and mad fit of theirs, to themselves yielded themselves to be in league with the Romans, but also became incorporate Citizens of the whole Town. All but the Cattle, was surprized. The Townsmen with their Wives and Children were thither fled: and sent messengers to Rome with certifiat to the Senat of this sudden and unlooked for accident. And with all speed (as appertained to the fidelity of the people of Rome) an army was led to Tusculum: whercof L. Quinctius and Servius Sulpicius, had the besieging and besieged. And whiles of the one side they intended the defence of the walls, on the other side assailed the Cattle, at one time they were afraid themselves, and put others in fear both parties. For it canted the Tusculans of fearful men to become exceeding cheerful: and the

D Latins who made full reckoning to win the fortres out of hand, as being matters already of the town, had but small hope now to help and save themselves. The Tusculans they let up a great shout from the Cattle: and answered it was again with a greater from the Roman army. The Latins were put to it hard on both sides: For neither were they able to abide the violence of the hard under the walls, and assaying to break the bars of the gates. First, they scaled the walls and gart upon them: after, they brake the port-cullis down. Thus the Latins environed with enemies both before and behind, that pressed fore upon them, having neither strength enough left to fight, nor room of ground to make an escape, were slain in the midst between the enemies every mothers son. So when Tusculum was recovered out of the enemies hands, the army was brought back again to Rome.

But the more quietness there was that year without the City by reason of prosperous wars, the more encreased the violence and hard dealing of the Senators within: and the calamities of the Commons grew every day more than other. For they wanted means and were not able to pay for the interest that needs must be paid. When nothing therefore was to be had, to make payment out of their goods, they were adjudged and awarded to satisfy their creditors in their body and name: and so their punishment served in stead of keeping their credit and discharging the confidence to let fall their hearts and stoop to low, that there was not a witty and nimble-headed man and of experience amongst them, that would put himself forth to stand to be a Tribun Military, in concurrence with the Nobles, (which they had to earnethly hot at and laboured for) no, nor so much as to bear and live for any offices of the Commons, so as the Senators now, seemed to have recovered again for ever to themselves, the possession of that dignity, which the Commons, or not joy too much heretofore, had usurped and occupied over their heads. But that this order might, mostly gave the occasion and first footing to an enterprise of much importance.

M. Fabius Ambulstus a great and mighty man, as well amongst those of his own calling, as amongst the Commons (whom he was reputed never to despise, as other did of his condition, as also state) had two daughters married forth: the elder unto Servius Sulpicius, the younger unto C. Licinius Stolo, a man verily of good worth and renowing, but yet a Commoner. And Fabius did now it well to do, that these sisters were upon a time together in the house of Servius Sulpicius, conferring one with another of many matters, it chanced that a Sergeant or Verger of Sulpicius, at his rod at the door. When the younger Fabius not acquainted with those fashions was therat somewhat amazed, her sister making a wonder at her ignorance, laught her to scorn. But that laughter (as womens minds got wont, are soon kindled with a little) set her a work & hampered in her head.

Sextius.

* I forbid. It was the negative voice of

Besides, the train of many that came about her, waiting and giving attendance, ready to know her pleasure and what she would, mended the matter much. I suppose she thought her sister happily wedded, and repented her own marriage: upon an ill and sinister judgment, whereby every man repineth that his neighbor and neerest of kin especially, should go beyond him and do better than he. Upon this discontentment and fresh heart-burning of hers, her father haply seeing her dismal, asked her whether she was well at home? But when she would have turned the cause of her grief another way. (for that it stood neither with her love and kindness towards her sister, to envy her estate; nor yet with the reverent honor that she was to yield unto her husband, to find fault with her own) he with mild questioning came about her, so that he drew from her the truth: so as she confessed her grief to arise upon this, that she was disparaged; and namely, married not according to her quality, but into an house incapable of both of worship and favour. Then Amphylus, comforting his daughter, willed her to be of good cheer, and said, That ere it were long, she should see the same state, the same advancement and dignity at home, which she had been already in her sisters house. Hereupon began he to plot with his son in law, joyning also unto them, L. Sextius, a stout young man, and one that was like enough to come to preferment, but that he was not of noble race. Good occasion and opportunity they seemed to have of compassing some alteration in the State, by reason of the excessive debts that men were grown into: for the redressing and easing of which malady, the Com. had no other hope, but in advancing some of themselves into the sovereign room of government. They thought it needful therefore, presently to address themselves to the execution of these designs, considering that by endeavor and industry, the Com. moners were climbed to that degree already, from whence if they would enforce and put themselves forward, they had but one step more unto the height, and might be equal with the Nobles, as well in honour as in virtue and prowess. And for the present, it was thought good to make them, two Trib. of the Com. in which office they might open a way unto themselves, for other dignities. So C. Licinius and L. Sextius propoled laws, all tending to abate the power and might of the Nobles, and wholly for the good and benefit of the Com. One, as touching taking order for debts: That when so much was defaulted and deducted out of the principal, as had been paid for the use and interest, the residue should be discharged by even portions in 3 years. A second, concerning a proportion and quantity of lands, That no man might hold in possession above 500 acres. The third, That from thenceforth there should be no election of Trib. Military, but of Civil, provided always, that one of them be chosen out of the Com. Matters all of right great weight and consequence, and such as without exceeding strife and contention, could not possibly be carried and obtained. Thus when all those things at once lay a bleeding, and were in hazard to be lost, which the whole world unmeasurably coveteth and lengtheneth after, to wit, land, money, and promotions: the Senators were put in a bodily fear, and began to startle. And laying their heads together both in public consultation and private conference, they could devise no other remedy, but that which in many commotions already they had tried, namely, the stepping between them and negative voice of some of the Tribuns. And so, to cross those bills aforelaid put up by the two Tribuns, they had wrought and made to their purpose certain of their own brotherhood. Who so soon as they saw the wards and tribes called forth by Licinius and Sextius, to give their suffrages, being well backed and guarded with the assistance of the Senators, would suffer neither those laws to be read, nor any other besides (as yearly they used to pass by the voices of the Commons. Thus the two Tribuns aforelaid, having oftentimes, but in vain assembled the people together, and seeing their laws still snipped, as it were, in the head for ever going forward; "It is very well (quoth Sextius) and since ye like so well that ye should have the Commons to prevail so much: we will likewise defend the Commons with the same weapon and no other. Go to now my Masters of the Nobility, proclaim an election for the creation of Trib. Military: I will make it I trow, that this word [* Veto] shall do you elves no good at all: howsoever now ye take so great pleasure to hear our brethren keep that note still, and evermore give that sweet content of music, And surely, those threats proved indeed to good earnest and took effect. For there was no election at all but of Ediles and Tribuns, and those both of the Commons. For Licinius and Sextius being chosen Tribuns again, suffered no Magistrates of the Chair, or of State, to be created. Which defeat and devaluation of sovereign Magistracy continued in the City for the space of five years: whilst the Commons for their part chose the same two Tribuns still, and they again ever laid a bar and put in a caveat against the election of Tribuns Military.

All other wars, as good hap was, were asleep for the time. The Colonies only of Vulturne, upon so long rest and quietness began to be lusty and wax wanton: and for that there was no army of the Romans stirring abroad, they not only made invades sundry times into the territory of Rome, but also assailed the town Tusculum. And when the Tusculans, the ancient Allies and new enfranchised Citizens of Rome craved help, the Senators and Commons both, were moved especially for very shame to succour them. And the Tribuns of the Commons yielded at length, and permitted an assembly for election, to be holden by an Inter-regent: and Trib. Military there were created, L. Furius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius, Ser. Cornelius, A. and C. Valerius. Who found not the Commons so tractable in the mustering, as they were pliable in giving their voices at the Election. Yet after much ado & great contention they levied an army and set forward on their journey: drove the enemies not from Tusculum only, but forced them within their own walls: besieged Vulturne more straightly a great deal, and in more forcible manner, than Tusculum had been by them,

Howbeit

A Howbeit, they that began the siege were not able to win the town. For before that time, were new Tribuns Military chosen, Q. Servilius, C. Varrus, A. and M. Cornelius, Q. Quinctius, M. Fabius. Neither performed these Tribuns any notable exploit at Vulturne. But the State at home found laws aforelaid, were now the eighth time made Trib. of the Commons again. Fulvius also a Trib. for the same laws, which in very deed himself had devised. And whereas at the first, eight of the College or Company of the Tribuns of the Commons, had crossed the proceeding of them: now there were but five left that shewed themselves, and those (as commonly they were to do that tongue, and trunks that others spake by, pretended and made allegations in their prohibition, only as they were schooled and taught their lessons at home: (to wit) That a great sort of the Commons were in the army at Vulturne and absent, and that the solemn Session or Assembly for enacting laws, ought to be adjourned until the return home of the soldiers: to the end that all the Commons generally, might give their voices concerning their own commodity and benefit. Sextius and Licinius with part of their brethren Tribuns, and M. Fabius one of the Tribuns Military, being their own craft-masters, knew well enough by so many years experience, how to manage the people (to hard with interrogatories of every particular that was propoled, that they were tired and tired them out: Demanding, "how they could require to be allowed themselves to possess more than 500 acres a man; whereas the Commons had but two a piece divided amongst them? Whether that every one of them might in equity hold the lands, well-need, or not: upon, and to serve for a place to bury his dead? Also, whether their will and pleasure was that the Commons oppressed with unry, should yield their bodies to bear whols and suffer torment, unless they paid the interest before the principal? And that daily by whom companies they should be fled away from the bar, condemned to thraldom, and Noble mens houses to become goals, and filled and pestered with prisoners? And wherefore a Patrician dwelt, there should be a prison? These indignities and piteous matters to be heard, when they had with a loud voice charged upon them, even before those that were afraid of the like measure themselves; with more indignation and disdain of all that heard them, than they themselves shewed in the interring and delivery: "But these Senators say they (and that they reckoned) will never make an either of getting more land still into their hands, or spoiling, and undoing the Commons with unry, until the Commons make once out of their body one Consul, for to be the mainstay and protector of their liberty. As for the Tribuns of the Commons they were now just nothing less, as who by their privilege of Inhibitions and negative voices, spoiled themselves and others: "threw their own power. And never will there be any indifferent and equal cause taken, long as the Nobles keep the sovereign place of command, and the sword to strike whilst the Commons have only the buckler hand to ward all venues. For unless the government be parted between both alike, the Commons shall never have their due and equal portion in the Com. mon-wealth. Neither is it reason that any man should stand contented with this only, that in Election of Consuls, the Commons are eligible and capable of the dignity: for in case, it be not concluded absolutely, that one Consul at the least should be of the Commons, there will never be any at all. Have ye forgotten already (say they) that notwithstanding an Act made, That there should be Tribuns Military created rather than Consuls, for this intent that Commons might alpire and reach unto the chief place of honor; yet for all that in 14 years space, there was not so much as one of the Commons chosen Tribuns Military? And will any man believe that they will of their own accord confer upon the Commons (when otherwise they may) that dignity in the disposing of only two places, who were ever wont in the making of Tribuns into the Consulship, who thus long have held the (Consular) Tribuneship forwaded as no men might have access thither but themselves? Nay, it must be got by a positive law, which in their Assemblies for Election, by favour and grace might not be obtained. One of the Consuls rooms must be set aside, past all peradventure and question, and that for a Commoner, to enter into. For as much as if it stand still upon a choice, the mightier man will ever go away with the game: clear. And whereas heretofore they have been wont to alledge and say, That the Commons are forced not sufficient and able men to bear the offices of the chair and of state, that now cannot be truly objected. For was the Common-wealth, I pray you more slackly and negligently governed was made Tribuns Military, than it was ruled for those years space, in which there was not a Tribuns Military but of the Nobility? Nay, on the contrary did it will be justified that some of the Nobles were condemned after they were out of their Tribuneship, and not one of the Commons. And whereas not many years past we began to make Quæstors or Treasurers out of the Commons like as we did Tribuns Military, the people of Rome repented never of the choice of any one of them. It remaineth now that the Commons bear the office of Consuls too: That were a foretold of their liberty, that were a strength and sure hold to trust unto. If they were once come and slept to that degree, then may the people of Rome think assuredly and be per-

"swaded, that the KK. are banished indeed out of the City, and their freedom fully established for ever to endure. For, from that day forward shall the Commons be partakers of all those things, wherein the Nobles now surpass them: namely, sovereign rule and authority, martial renown, parentage and Nobility: great ornaments doubtless, unto themselves to enjoy here in this life: but far greater to leave behind them unto their Children and Posterity. These and such like Orations when they saw to be plausible, and willingly accepted, they preferred a new Statute, That in stead of the two Dumvirs for holy Ceremonies and matters of the Church, there might be chosen ten Decemvirs: Provided always, that one part of them should be created forth of the Commons, and another from among the Nobles. The Session for enacting of all those Laws; they deferred until the army was returned, which lay then at the siege before Velitrae.

But the year was come about and fully expired, before the legions were reduced home from thence: and by that means the whole business about these new Laws, hung till in suspense, and was put off unto the entrance of the new Tribuns Military. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, the Commonalty chose the same again, even those twain who had been the proposers of those Laws. And the Tribuns Military were these, T. Quintius, Ser. Cornelius, Ser. Sulpicius, Sp. Servilius, L. Papirius, L. Veturius. Presently in the beginning of the year, they put unto the jump and final trial what should become of those Laws. And when as the Tribes were called, and none of the Tribuns Collegues stepped before to stop the proceeding of the Law-givers: the Nobles were afraid, and ran unto their two last helps, to wit, the highest and absolute office, and the greatest man among them. They thought good therefore to create a Dictator. And M. Furius Camillus was nominated, who elected unto him L. Aemilius for General of the horse. The Law-makers likewise for their part, against to great preparation of their adversaries, armed at all parts the cause of the Commons, with stout stomach and courageous heart, And having assembled an Hall of the Commons, they called forth the wards to give their voices. At what time the Dictator accompanied with a great train of Nobles, full of wrath and menacing frowns, took his place and set him down. And after the matter was canvassed first, by the ordinary conflict of the Tribuns among themselves, whiles some propounded, and others gained the Law with their negatives voices; and that by how much in right the prohibition was the stronger, so much it was overweighed in favour and affection both of the Laws and Law-givers: and when the first Tribes had given their voice ( Mirrogatus*) affirmatively: then Camillus, as much as (quoth he) O Quirites, ye are ruled now by the will and pleasure, and not by the authority of the Tribuns, and as in times past ye obtained the privilege of a negative voice and  Intercession* by your departure and Secession, so now ye make it void and nothing worth, even by the force that ye got by it: I chosen Dictator as well for your sake as for the whole Common-wealth, will assist your privilege of Intercession, and by mine absolute authority maintain this your help and succour, now revered and overthrown. If therefore C. Licinius and L. Sextius, give place unto the negative voice and interceding of their fellows in Office: I will not in a meeting and assembly of the Commons, once intermeddle, nor bring in the authority, of a Magistrate of the Nobles: but if they shall go forward still (notwithstanding all prohibition) to impose and give Laws unto the City, as if it were won by conquest of the enemy, I will not suffer the Tribuns power by their own selves to be defaced and come to nothing. But (all these big words notwithstanding) when the Tribuns of the Commons made but a tush theret, and went never the less forward with their enterprize, then Camillus thoroughly angered indeed, sent his Lictors and Sergeants to command the Commons to avoid the place and depart: Threatning withal, that if they proceeded thus, he would take a Military oath of all the younger people; and lead an army presently forth of the City. This put the Commons in a very great fright, but it set their Captains and Ring-leaders, rather in a greater heat of contention, than abated their courages one jot. And when he saw no relenting on either side, he gave up his office: Whether it were that there was some error in his creation (as some have written) or because the Tribuns of the Commons had put up a bill to the Commons, and they granted it: that if M. Furius (as Dictator) had proceeded to any action, he should have a round fine set on his head of 500000 Astres, I know not certainly. But I believe that he was terrified upon some unlucky signs of the birds, rather than with any such strange Act never heard of before, and without precedent. And hereunto am I induced, both in regard of the disposition of the man, so well given and of so good conscience, and also for that P. Manlius was immediately named Dictator in his stead. For to what end should Manlius have been created Dictator for that broil and stir, wherein M. Furius had taken the foil before? Again, seeing the same M. Furius was Dictator the next year following, doubtless, he would never for shame have resumed that office, wherein the year before he had received the foil and disgrace: to be so overruled, Over and besides, at the same time when as this bill was supposed to have been preferred, concerning his fine: either he might have withstood it too; (whereby he saw himself to be bridled) or else he had not been able to have hindered so much as those, for which this also was proposed. Finally, it was never seen to this day wherein we live, so long as the Tribuns and Consuls with their factions and arts-taking have been at variance and debate with all their might and main, but evermore the authority of the Dictator controlled them all, and put them down.

And begun, there was an assembly of the Commons summoned by the Tribuns, in time as it were of a vacancy or Interregnum: wherein the overture was made and evidently it was seen which of the laws proposed the Commons liked better, and which the Law-givers. For those that concerned tithy and land, they granted to pass; but that other of a Commoner to be Consul they denied and dashed quite. And surely both matters had been dispatched fully and established, and speak to all three directly together, after this, P. Manlius the Dictator favoured General of horsemen, C. Licinius, who had been a Tribun Military before time. The Senators bestowed hereat, as I find in records, And the Dictator was wont to exerce the matter: untoing also, that the dignity of the General of horsemen was no greater then of a Tribun Consul. Now when the election day was published for the Tribuns of the Commons, Licinius and Sextius do demeaned themselves, that by pretending that they would not any longer now continue under colour of refusal, desired and sought for that, which they thought for their nine years they had stood, as it were, in battle array, to alledge and say, "as all in publick: and now together with them, both the laws proposed, and the whole strength of the Tribuns authority, were waxed old and decayed. At the first their Laws were trod ty to the Velitern war: and till of all, the Dictators lightning flashed away the youth of the City thunderbolts shot against them. "Now (say they) neither their fellow Tribuns withstood them, nor forraign wars hindered them, nor yet the Dictator himself, as who for his part hath given a good fore-tokening and prelude of a Consul Commoner, in electing his General of horsemen out of the Commons. The very Commons and none else, are they that hurt themselves, and delay their own goods. Who might presently if they would, have their City, their common Hall, and place of assemblies freed from these Creditors: yea, and their grounds recovered again from the unjust Land-lord: Which benefits and liberties, when are they like to weigh and esteem with thankfull minds accordingly, it is in the very time that they act to accept the Laws devised for their own wealth and good, they cur off all hope of promotion and honour. From the publishers and propolers thereof? For it standeth not with the modesty of the people of Rome, to require to be ealed themselves of tithy, and to be set in position again of the land, wrongfully withheld from them by the mighty men: and then to leave those old Trib, by whose means they have come by those good commodities, to shift for themselves, not only without honor but also without all hope of honor. Let them first therefore set down with themselves, and resolve what they are minded to do: and afterwards in the election of Tribunes, declare the same openly. If they would be willing to speak affirmatively to those Laws, all jointly as they were propounded, then there were some reason to have the same Tribunes again: and then would they enact & establish finally that which they had published. But in case their will was to accept of that and no more than which I served each private man turn then there was made need, or none at all to have them still in office, with them y and grudging of so many. And to be there, neither would they accept of the Tribunship any longer, neither should the Commons have those Laws ratified, which were already granted. When as all the rest of the Senators were struck into their dumps and blank, for the very indignity to feel things thus go: At the last, one Appius Claudius Crassus (the nephew or sonson of that notorious Appius the Decemvir upon a malicious mind and fell Romack, as it is reported, rather then for any hope he had to displease the matter, stood up, and to this effect answered that to stout and peremptory speech of the Tribuns, in this manner. "It can be no strange matter to me, nor unlooked for, O Quirites if that which hath been the only thing at all times objected by seditious Tribuns against our house, I also should hear at this present: to wit, that the whole name and image of Cladius have ever from the first beginning, regarded nothing more in the Common-wealth, than the Majesty and honor of the Senators and the Nobles, and always let and opposed themselves against the good and well-fare of the Commons. Of which two challenges, the one I neither can nor will deny: and with at once taken into the number of Senators, have endeavored and framed ourselves: that it might be said and that truly, that the honor and dignity of that state and degree into which I was your good pleasure we should be incorporated and graced with, was by my augmented: (rather then impaired. And as for the other challenge, this I dare be bold, in mine own behalf, and in the name of my ancestors and progenitors, to aver, O Quirites, that (unless a man would think whatsoever is done for the Weal-publick generally, is directly against the Commons, as if they were meer aliens of another City) we to our knowledge have practised nothing, writing common-ly, and that neither in deed nor word we can be justly charged to have wrought and contrived any thing contrary to your good: although peradventure somewhat hath fallen out cross against your will and mind. But were I not a Cladius, and of that family, nor descended of noble blood, but come one of the Burgeses or Citizens: and knew my self to be but one

"born, both by father and mother, and to live in a free City: could I (think ye) hold my tongue? but frankly I speak and say, that these perpetual Tribuns (God save all) L. Sextius, and C. Licinius I mean, have for nine years (for so long they have played Rex) taken so much upon them, and been so bold as to say they will not permit you to have free voices, neither in solemn assemblies for elections, nor in Scissions and Parliaments for allowing and ordaining Laws? Upon condition (quoth one of them) you shall make us Tribuns again the tenth time, What is this else but to say? That, which other (say for, ye to scorn and disdain, that accept of it we will not, without good hire and recompence And what reward and consideration is this good hire, for which we may have your Worships, our ever-Tribuns? Marry (quoth he) that ye will accept jointly together and at once, all our laws, whether they like you or dislike you whether they be good or whollom, or bad and noisom. Now I beseech you good Tarquins (Tribuns of the Commons) I would have said I were one of the ordinary Citizens, and should find out of the multitude assembled, speak out and say: Pleased it your good grace, Sir, that out of these laws propounded, we may chuse those that we think good and whollom for us, and refuse and disdain the rest. [O quoth he] that may not be, Thou mayst allow, belike, and ordain, concerning many things concerning lands, which tend to the commodity of you all, But now beware of bugs. This monstrous and portentous wonder must in no case be permitted in Rome, that thou shouldst see L. Sextius, and this perilous fellow C. Licinius to be Consuls, which thy heart rieth at, and which goeth against thy Romack, Nay, my either accept of all, or I will propound none at all. [This is it all ones, as if a man should give him that is hunger-bitten, and ready to starve, poyson K and meat together: and bid him either forbear the whollom food to preserve his life, or else to take the deadly bane to hasten his death, But if this were a free State indeed, would not many a one have cried out and said, Avant you and your Tribuns, out upon you with your laws, What Sir? How if your Majesty will not put up and prefer that which is commodious and profitable for the people to accept: is there none think you besides that will propound it? If any Nobleman, or if any Claudius (which they take to be more odious) should thus say: Either take all, or I will propose none at all. Which of you, Quirites, would endure it? why? will ye never regard the sublimity more then the person; the matter rather then the man? But all is well taken and heard quickly, which that magistrate shall say. And wil ye always hear with the wrong or deaf ear, whatsoever any of us shall say to speak? Well, the words are naught, and the speech (without question) very unkind and rude. Now let us see what manner of law it is, that they storm so at, because by you it is rejected. In good faith, O Quirites, much like unto their language. This I require (quoth he) that it might not be lawful for you to make Cof, whom ye wil, for what else demandeth he, who would have it enacted by express terms, that one at least of the Cof, must be a Commoner of Necessity, and leaveth it not unto your choice to make two Noblemen Cof. If we had wars at this day, such as sometime the Tuscan war was, when Postum was master of the Junctis: and kept that piece against us: or such as the Gauls war of late days was, when the enemies were 11, and possessed of all the City here, but the Capitol and fortres only, let case, that L. Sextius should be prick and propounded either with this M. Furius herein place, or with any one other of the Nobles, and propounded either would ye abide that Sextius should be undoubtfully Cof, and Camillus at devotion and in hazard to take repulce? Is this indeed to bestow your dignities indifferently with even and equal hand? That two of the Commons, forsooth, may be elected Consuls, and not two likewise of the Nobles? And that one of them must needs performe be created out of the Com, and in the election of both, the Nobles may be overpriced? What society is this, what community and participation? Will not this serve thy turn and content thee, that wherein thou hadst no title nor interest alone, thou shouldst now have thy part: unless in seeking to have a portion, thou pluck all unto thyself? I fear me (quoth he) if both Consuls might be made of the Nobility, ye would chuse none at all of the Commonality. What is this else but to say? Because willingly of your selves, ye would not chuse unworthy persons and unmeet, I will bind you thereto of necessity, to elect those whom otherwise ye would pass by. And what followeth hereupon but this, that the Commoner who standeth with two Patris, may plainly say, and that truly, he is not by voices chosen but by virtue of a law, and so acknowledged no benefit received of the people, nor be beholden at all to them, for their grace and favour? Thus seek they means to wring your dignities from you, and not the way to sue for them: and would so obtain the greatest, as that they might not be obliged & bound unto you for the least: and had rather get honours and offices by advantage taking and cunning sleights, then by their own virtue, desert, and worthiness. But there is some one that cometh to be prised and looked into, and to be considered as he deserves: who thinks it meet, that he alone among the other Competitors, that contest and stand in suit, should be sure of offices and promotions, and will not submit himself to your censure: who would have your suffrages, of voluntary to be constrained: of free to be thrall and servile. I speak not of Licinius and Sextius whose years of their continual government ye reckon upon, and mark up in the Capitol, as they used sometime, to count the years of the Kings reign. But what is he this day in the City, of so base, so abject and low condition, that by the advantage and benefit of this law, hath not easier access to a Consulship than we and our children have? As for us truly ye may sometime mis of chusing us, would you never so faine: but for them ye must needs, yea, though full against your mind. And thus much concerning the indignity and

A "and unworthiness of the thing: For, dignity and worthiness, I take, to be matters properly to men pertaining. What shall I speak now of Religions, and of the solemnity of the Amplexes, which imply a meer contempt and injury done to the immortal gods? Who knoweth not, that by the approbation of the gods, testified by sight of birds, this City was first founded? at home? And who be they that have to do with these tokens and portages, by ancient custom and tradition from our forefathers? Forsooth even the Nobles and none else, As for the Magistrates of the Commons, none are chosen with regard of flight, flight, and feeding of the birds, but to us, they do so properly belong, that not only those Magistrates of the Nobles, which themselves, without the assent and voice of the people, do nominate an Interrex by means of the birds: yea, and in the private actions of our life, we are guided by them at home, which these Commons use not in their very offices. What then meaneth he else, but to take these Amplexes out of the City, who by creating Commoners to be Consuls, depriveth the Nobles thereof, who only may have and use them? Now let them mock on and scoff at our religions, who our Ceremonies. What makes matter (say they) if those pullets peck or eat not? What if they come somewhat late out of their coop or cage? What if a bird fling ank or crow crows and con-trary? How then? A great piece of matter surely. Small things, I confess they be: but as small as they are, our anxieties by not contemning them, have brought this C. V. to a flourishing state. And we now adays, as if we stood not in need of the grace and favour of God, pollute all holy rites and ceremonies. And therefore let our priests and high priests, our Augurs, and King at sacrifices be created (it skilleth not how) even out of the common multitude. Let us see upon any mans head (it matters not whose, so he come in likeness of a man) the Miter of Jupiter his Flaming, let us commit the keeping of the Amplexes or heavenly shields, and the secret sanctuaries: let us commit the gods themselves and the charge of their holy service to those, unto whom we may not lawfully nor without impiety. Let no laws be published nor Magistrates created solemnly, with regard of birds at all, and of the will of the gods. Nor in the Centuriate assemblies holden by degrees, and Curiae-meetings by the wards and parishes: let not the Senators be Presidents and have their authority and royal assent, let Sextius and Licinius, like Romulus and Tatius reign together, as fellow Kings, in the City of Rome, because they give away to freely, the monies, lands and territories from others. So sweet and favoury it is to of these goodly laws, our fields will be desert and waste, by ejecting and dispossessing the right-ful land-lords: and by the other, all credit in borrowing and lending, in taking and putting forth of money shall be abolished. And then farewell all humane society, commerce and intercourse whatsoever. In these respects therefore, thus I conclude, and would counsel you, in any wise to stop, frustrate and disannul the overture and proceeding of these laws: and in so doing, I pray God bells and speed you well. This Oration of Appius thus far only prevailed: that the time of publication of these Acts, was cut off and deferred. But the same Tribuns Sextius and Licinius, being chosen again the tenth time, propounded this law and had it enacted. That of the five of them were of the Nobles, and five of the Commoners: whereby they seemed to have gained already one good step onward unto the Consulship.

The Commons contenting themselves with this victory, yielded unto the Senators, that for the present without any mentioning of Consuls, there should be elected Tribuns Military. So there were created A. M. Cornilius the second time, M. Geganius, P. Machianus, L. Furius and P. Falerius the sixth time. At what time, when as (but for the siege of Ugentum, which was like to be rest for any foreign troubles, the sudden and unlooked for news of the Gauls war, drove the Romans were at Fy to chuse M. Furius Dictator the fifth time: who took unto him for his General of the horseriver Amio: and that there was: that noble combat upon the bridge, in which T. Manlius in the fight of both armies slew in single fight a Gaul that had challenged him and given defiance and despoil was performed ten years after: and that in this year the Gauls had a battle given them by victory, although the French made them afraid at first in remembrance of their former overthrow. Many thousands of this barbarous nation were slain in field, many also fell upon the sword in their camp after it was won. Some were scattered and fled, and the most (who took the way to Apulia) saved themselves from the enemy, both by lying low, and so far, and also for that upon their decree, that the Dictator should triumph. Who scarcely had made an end of that war, but he was welcomed home with a more hotter and more dangerous Sedition within the City. For after vercome, yea, and forced to accept the Tribuns laws aforesaid. And also in despite of the Nobility and do what they could, there was an assembly held for election of Consuls: in which L. Sextius, the first was created Consul, the fifth Commoner that ever sat in Consul's chair. But the brother Stolus Consul, had

But it fortune'd so, that Gentius, being with great preparation and power set forth against the enemies, was entrapp'd by an Ambuscado, his legions upon a sudden fear unlooked for defeated, himself (the Consul) environed round about, and slain by them, that with not whom they flew. Which tidings being brought to Rome, the Senators were not so pensive and sorrowful for the common calamity, as they tum'd and took on most insolently, for this unhappy expedition and conquest of the Commoner Consul: and muttered in all places these and such like speeches: "Now let them go and create Consuls again out of the commonalty, and translate the Asprens whither they ought not. What? Because the Senators by an Act of the Commons, might be defeated and dissolved of their dignities, could so ungraciously and irreverently a law prevail likewise against the Gods immortal? Who now themselves have taken the matter into their own hands, and maintained their power their deity and Auspices: which were not so soon meddled withal, and polluted by one that had no right thereto, nor lawful title, but both the whole army, and Captain also, were vanquished and overthrow'n: to teach them for ever hereafter, how they make their solemn Elections of Magistrats consulely, without regard of the rights and royalties of noble houses. These speeches both Council-House and common place rung again withal. So the Consul Scurlus with consent of the Nobles, named for Dictator Appius Claudius, who had aforetime in an Oration before the whole assembly of the Commons disavow'd the proceeding of that law; and now with greater authority blamed the mishap of that council, which was by him misliked and reproved. A muster was proclaimed, and a publick Vacation. But before that the Dictator and these new enrolled legions were gone as far as the Hernicks confines, the other army under the leading of C. Sulpicius the Lieutenant, by occasion of an occurrence that fell out there, got a good hand against their enemies. For when as upon the death of the Consul, the Hernicks advanced in scornful and contemptuous manner, close under the camp of the Romans, with a full hope to be masters of the fame: behold, what with the exhortation of the Lieutenant, and what for anger and indignity, wherewith the soldiers stomachs were full, they made a fallie out against them. Whereupon the Hernicks came to far short of their account, that they had no hope to assail; no, nor approach the rampier: and so in disorderly they dismay'd and departed. Afterwards by the coming in of the Dictator with a fresh power, the old army was reinforced double. The Dictator in a solemn audience, having praised the Lieutenant and his souldiers for defending their tents so manfully, both encouraged them that heard themselves so highly commended according to their deserts, and also whetted on the rest to perform the like valorous service. The enemies on the other side were nothing slack to prepare themselves to fight again: who in remembrance of the honour they had already won, albeit they were not ignorant that the Romans forces were redoubled, increas'd their own power also. For the whole Nation of the Hernicks, even as many as were able to draw sword, were called forth to the wars. Eight cohorts by themselves consisting of four hundred in a band were enrolled, even the most able and choice men of all others. This elect and especial flour of their youth and manhood, they fed with hope and encouraged the more to this service, because they had taken order they should have double pay. Freed they were besides from all other labour and Military toil that being thus relieved to intend the fight and nothing else, they should make reckoning and know, that they were to endeavour and strive themselves above the ordinary carriage of souldiers. Placed also they were in the battel, apart from the other ranks: to the end their valour and manhood might be more seen and marked. Between both camps of the Romans and Hernicks, there was a plain of two miles in length: and there in the mid way in a manner, was the battel fought. First, the fight was doubtful on both sides, whilst the Roman Horsemen charged and recharged again, but ever in vain, to see if they could break their battalions. Thus when the service on Horseback, proved less in effect than in attempt, they asked the advice and craved leave of the Dictator: which being granted, they abandoned their Horses, and with a mighty shout, ran forth before the ensignes, and renewed the battel afresh. Neither could they have been any longer endured, but that those extraordinary hands opposed themselves, and received them with equal might of body and valour of heart. Then was the fight maintained between the brave youth and principal flour of both nations. And look what slaughter there was by common hazard of war, as well of the one side as of the other, the loss was greater for the quality of the persons, than the proportion of the number. For the rest of the common souldiers, as if they had flitted from themselves the whole conflict, and broken it to the vanguards only, repos'd their own event and hap in the manhood of others. Many a man on both parts was smitten down and dyed in the place, but more were hurt and wounded. "At last, those Horsemen that dismounted, fell to call and rebuke one another asking what hope remained else besides? If neither on horseback they were able to drive the enemies back, nor on foot force them to give ground and remove them, what third kind of service looked they for? Why leapt they out so lustily and bravely into the forefront before the ensignes? and fought in the place of others? With these words provoking one another, they pluckt up their hearts, and with a fresh shout set forth forward and gave a new charge. First, they compelled the enemies to retreat and lose their standing: then to give more ground: and at length plainly to turn their back and run away. Hard it is to say, being so equally and indifferently match'd as they were, what it was that turn'd the balance and gave the victory: unless it were the perpetual fortune that ever followed both nations, able to advance the spirit and courage of the one, and to daunt and abate the hearts of the other. The Romans had the Hernicks in chace, all the way long, so far as to their camp: but because

A because it was far in the evening, they staid from assailing it. For by reason that it was long ere the Dictator could by sacrifice gather any assured token of Gods favour, he sounded not the battell before noon: whereby it continued until night. The morning after, were the Hernicks fled and their camp abandoned: only some hurt and wounded souldiers were found left behind. But one was discovered, slenderly accompanied, and with few about them) was scattered abroad over the fields, and in great fear straggled all about, and shamefully fled away. And yet this victory of the Romans cost them well the letting on, and spent some blood: for they lost a fourth part of their men: and that which was no small damage unto them, some of the Roman Horsemen also were slain.

The next year following, when C. Sulpicius and C. Licinius C. Iunus the Consuls, were gone with a power against the Hernicks, and finding not the enemy abroad in the country, had by force won Faventinum a Town of theirs: in their return homeward, the Tyburts kept their gates shut against them. And after many complaints and unkindnesses ripped up between them: this last quarrel was it, that moved the Romans by their heralds (after restitution and amends demanded) to send defiance, and proclaim war against the people of Tyber. That Titus Quinctius Poenus was by all authors, Macer Licinius writeth that he was created for the holding of an assembly for election of Magistrates, and that, by the Consul Licinius became when his fellow Consul made halt to withhold and meet with his mighty desire in that behalf. But Licinius Macer in any further matter. Mine own mind giveth me rather, that the Dictator was created because of the beyond the bridge of Anio, in the way Salaria. The Dictator having three miles from Rome with a pusillan army departed the City, received the Military oath of all the younger sorts and tents. In the mid way between them and the enemies there was a bridge: which they would not break down on either part, lest they should be thought fearful cowards. But about the seizing and gaining of that bridge, first, there was many a skirmish: and judged it could not be, considering the equal forces of both sides, who should be masters of it. Then advanced forward set out a throat, maketh this challenge: Now (quoth he) let the bravest gallow that Rome hath, while, both abashed to refuse the challenge, and also unwilling to run upon the present hazard of a single fight. Then T. Manlius, the son of Lucius, even he who released his father from the Tyburts troubles, goeth forth of his quarter unto the Dictator. "Without your leave and express commandment (quoth he) O Noble Sovereign, I would never presume to fight out of my rank. Excellence to give me licence, I will shew unto that best yonder (that so proudly and lustily is come forth leaping before the enemies ensignes, and braving as you see) that I am defended of Name, in this thy durst mind and zeal that thou carriest thee to father and Country: Go on I say, and with the help of the Gods, perform the Roman name to be invincible. Then his fellows and companions: help to arme the young Gentleman. A light footman shield he takes unto him, and a Spanish blade by his side, more handsome to fight short and close. Being thus armed and (as the ancient writers have thought it worth the noting and remembrance) continually to behold, and the two armed Champions were left in his own quarter and ward: they were not equally match'd, if a man should judge by the eye and outward view. The one of them of personage mighty and exceeding tall, his coat armour of many colours and gay, his harness glittering and alldamasked and engraven with gold. The other, a man of a middle height: without any hooping, fusing, and that rather fit and handy, than gaudy to be close anger within, relieving all his fier, enels and eagerness unto the very combat and doubtful suspense between hope and fear, the Gaul like as he had been all about looking on, in sword of his enemy coming against him, held forth his target with a high mountain aloft, he founded again upon his shield, and did no harm at all. The Roman bearing his own sword with the point upward, and with his shield having smitten the nether part of his enemies target, and

"chariot to go up with joy and mirth to the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus. This Oration of Tullius, the multitude seconded with their petitions, calling aloud unto the General on every side, to found the alarm, and command them to arm. The Dictator, albeit he thought the matter in it self good, but not handled in good manner; and for example sake not to be allowed: yet promised to satisfy the soldiers desire. "And calling Tullius secretly apart, questioned with him "what this matter meant, what precedent or custom they had for their warrant? Tullius earnestly besought the Dictator, not to think him to have forgotten either military Discipline, or his own place, nor yet the Majesty of his Sovereign. And whereas he had not withdrawn himself away from the multitude being in a mutiny, nor refused to be their speaker (who lightly resemble those that are their ring-leaders) it was only for fear lest some other should have slept in place, "such as the unruly people in mutinies are wont to set up for their Captains. As for himself, do nothing he would, without the pleasure of the General. Howbeit, he would advise him to look well about him, and carefully to see to it, that he keep his army in order, government, and obedience. And high time it is now, and would not be deferred. For considering their hearts were kindled already, and their blood up, they would be their own carvers, and chuse themselves both time and place, if the General would not grant it them the sooner. While they were thus in sad communication, there hapned two Roman soldiers to take perforce from a Gaul certain sumpter Horses, which feeding without the camp, he was driving away. At whom, the Gauls let flye stones good store. And thereupon rose an alarm from the Roman Corps de guard, and running out there was apace, on both sides. So as now they had grown to a full skirmish and battle indeed, had not the Centurions speedily stilled them, and ended the fray. Upon which occurrence, the credit of Tullius with the Dictator was confirmed: and seeing the case would abide no delays he proclaimed battle against the morrow. The Dictator notwithstanding he had yielded to fight a field, as presuming more upon the courage of his men, than their forces: began to devile with himself, and cast about every way, how by some stratagem he might strike a terror among the enemies. And having a subtle wit and nimble head of his own, this new policy he thought upon: which afterwards many warriors, both of our own country, and of others also, yea, and some even in our time, have used and put in practice. He gave order, that the mules sumpters should be taken off their backs, leaving only two coultre-wheels or coverings upon them, and fetter the muletoes aloft thereon, furnished with the armour of certain captives, and sick and diseased persons. Of these he made well-near one thousand, and joynted unto them one hundred good Horsemen. All these, he chargeth in the night time to get above the camp into the hills, and among the furs and woods, to beset themselves close: and not to stir from thence, before that he gave them a signal. Himself, so soon as it was day light, began with great wariness and confederate care to embattle and arrange his army in length, along the very foot of the mountains: to the end, that the enemy might have the hills full against him. Thus having set out and directed these counterjuit cornets of Horse, to scare the enemies with, who, as it fell out, did more good in a manner than the other forces indeed: at the first sight the vanguard of the Gauls thought that the Romans would not come down on even ground: but afterwards, when they saw them upon a sudden defended, they also, as desirous of fight, ran on forward presently to joyn battle, and began the fight before the Captains had founded. The Gauls charged the right wing more fiercely, so that hardly they might have been abidden, had not by good hap the Dictator been there in person. "Who called upon Sextus Tullius by name, and rebuked him, demanding whether he had given his word unto him, that the soldiers should in that sort fight? What is become (quoth he) of these, that with out-cries and open mouth called for battle? Where are those threats now that they would begin to fight a field without commandment of the General? Lo, your General himself calleth upon you as loud as he can, to fall to your business, and goeth armed before the ensigns in the vanguard: will any now follow after that erewhile would needs lead the way afore? Pierce (I see well) in camp fearful in the field. And no fable it was that they heard him speak. Whereupon for very shame they were so pricked forward, that without casting any paills, or minding present danger, they ran upon the darts and shot of their enemies. This violence of theirs as if they had been welner out of their right wits, at the very first troubled and disordered the enemies. The Horsemen that were sent out hard after them, forced them to turn back, when they were once in disarray. The Dictator himself seeing the battle of one side to shrink advanced forward with the ensigns against the left wing, unto which he saw the main multitude to resort and gather together, and withal begave the sign to them that were within the hills, according as it was before agreed. And when from thence arose a new shout arose, and that they were seen to march side-long over the hill, toward the Gauls camp: then for fear, lest they should be shut out from their hold, they gave over all fighting, and ran by heaps to their camp. Where M. Furius, the General of the Horsemen encountered and affronted them. For he seeing the right wing discomfited had set a compass about, and ridden to the fortifications and munitions of the enemies. Whereupon they fled to the mountains and the woods. Most of them were received by the counterjuit flew of Horsemen, and by the muletoes caught up, and came short home: but many of them as fear drove through into the woods, were (after the heat of the battle was past) cruelly slain and hewn in pieces. Neither was there any one, saving M. Furius aside, that triumphed more worthily over the Gauls, than did C. Sulpicius. He consecrated also in the Capitol a square weighty mass of gold, got out of the Gauls spoil, and compassed it within an enclosure of square stone.

The stratagem of C. Sulpicius the Dictator.

A stone. The same year, the Consuls likewise warred, but with diverse fortune and success. For by C. Plautius, the Hernicks were vanquished and subdued. But his companion F. Furius fought rashly and unadvisedly against the Tarquinians. The loss in the battle received, was not so much, but that the Tarquinians sacrificed three hundred and seven Roman soldiers, whom they took prisoner. This foul and shameful execution, caused the ignominy of the Romans defeat arose, to be washed (to help the matter withal) by the Privernates, and after this loss, was the Roman territory now suddenly inrodes into the Country. The same year also were two more Tribes added, Peupia and Pulcheria. The votive solemn plays or games likewise, which Atreus King the Dictator had vowed, were then set forth and performed.

Then never before was the first law put up to the people by P. Petilius, a Tribune of the Commons, and that by the consent and approbation of the Senators, against the exorbitant and ambitious standing for dignities. By which law men supposed, that the ambition principally of certain persons now risen and of the first head, who were wont to haunt fairs and places of great resort for that intent, was repressed and kept under. But the year ensuing, when C. Marius and Cn. Manlius were Consuls, M. Duellius and M. Memmius two Tribunes of the Commons, went through with a law and got it enacted, which was not so well liked of the Senators, as concerning Utrius of one in the hundred, but that the Commons were so much the more forward and better contented, to grant and accept it. Over and besides these new wars the year before intended, the Falisci were declared new enemies: and that, for two quarrels pretended against them. One, for that their youth had served against the Romans under the Tarquinians: the other, because they had not delivered again those Romans which fled unto F. Furius, after their defeat and This Province fell to Cn. Manlius. But Marius had the leading of an army into the Land of the Privernates, which by reason of good peace was unloiled yet, and in very good state, and thereby enriched his soldiers with good prizes. For, to the plenty and store that there was found, he added his own bounty and liberality: in that he set out nothing for the common Treasury, but lay strongly encamped before their own City: and when he had assembled all his soldiers together, "Now (quoth he) I give unto you the enemies camp and their City for a booty. To you selves bravely and courageously, with assured hope of victory, to battle they go. There, even before the ensigns in the vanguard, withal assured hope of victory, to battle they go. There, even Behold, Noble General (quoth he) how this army performeth their word given unto thee: and therewith laying down his Javelin, with drawn sword confronteth the enemy. Then follow the enemies to flight, followed the chase and drove them into the Town, And at their first scaling the Walls, the Town was rendered up into their hands. So he triumphed over the Privernates. By the other Consul there was no worthy exploit done, but that as he lay encamped before Surium, he proposed a law to pass by the Tribes, (a course never taken before, and without example) concerning a twentieth part or vicetime, to be levied of their goods that were made free. The Lords of the Senat (because by that Act there accrued no small revenue to the Exchequer, that was now wanted) allowed thereof and gave their assent. But the Tribunes of the Com moved not (so much at the quality of the law in it self, as at the dangerous precedent given, or ordained under pain of death, That no man ever after should in making of laws withdraw the people apart: For, if that were once by law permitted, there would be nothing, were it never so peo- legance, and were at his devotion. The same year was C. Licinius Stolo at the suit of M. Papius was possessed of a thousand acres of Land, and under colour of freeing his son, he had deluded the statute in that case provided.

After this, the two Consuls M. Fabius Ambustus the second time, and M. Popilius Lenas the second time made two wars. That which Lenas fought with the Tyburins was performed with ease and facility. For having driven the enemies into the Town he foraged their fields. But in the other war, the Falisci and the Tarquinians, discomfited in the first battle the other Consul, and their greatest fear arose upon this occasion. For, their Priests carrying afore them light burning torches, and snakes besides, went after a linnick and frantick manner, and with so strange and uncount a shew troubled and disordered the Roman soldiers, and with so strange Gyrant the soldiers, as if they had been distressed, besides themselves, and astonished, dismayed fearfully and stumbled upon the munitions and fortifications of their camp: But after, when as the Consul, Lieutenants and Colonels mocked and rated them, for being scared like children with these vain bugbears: for shame suddenly they took heart again, and like blind men ran upon those very same things, that before they had fled from. And so after they had dispatched this vain device and preparation of their enemies, they fell upon the armed men indeed, camp, with a rich booty returned victors, both recounting in their military merry ditties and songs.

songs, the foolish preparation of the enemy, and also condemning their own fearfulness. After this, the whole nation of the Tullians arose, having for their leaders the Tarquinians and the Falisci, and came as far as Salina. Against which fearful danger, was C. Martius Rutilius chosen, the first Dictator that ever was of the Commons: who named for his General of the Horsemen a Commoner likewise C. Plantius. But the Senators thought this a shameful indignity, that the Dictatorship also should now be chosen in common: and did all that could possibly to hinder, that there should be nothing decreed toward the war, nor any preparation made for the Dictator. But so much the sooner, and with more readiness, all that the Dictator proposed, the Commons granted. So he departed from the City, and marched on both sides of the Tiber (transporting his army in boats and planks fastened together) to what place soever he heard the enemies were gone: and surprised many foragers of them, as they wandered and straggled one from another, in the fields. He set upon their camp also, and wan it: and after that he had taken eight thousand prisoners, and either slain or chased all the rest out of the Roman pale: he triumphed, by the suffrages of the people only, without the approbation and assent of the Senators. And for almost as they would not in any case have an assembly for Election of Consuls, held either by the Dictator a Commoner, or by the Consul: and because the other Consul Fabius was banished abroad in the wars, and not returned; therefore, the matter fell again to an Interregent. So there were Interregents one after another, Q. Servilius Hala, M. Fabius Cn. Marcius C. Fabius C. Sulpicius L. Aemilius Q. Servilius, and M. Fabius Ambulius. During the second Interregent, there arose some variance, for that both Consuls were Patritii, of the Nobles. And when the Tribunes interposed themselves, and crossed those proceedings, Fabius the Interregent, alleged a Law of the twelve tables in these terms, That whatsoever the people ordained or granted last, the same should be good, and stand firm and ratified: and in suffrages and voices of the people, were comprised their grant and ordinance. But when the Tribunes, for all their gain saying and stepping between, could prevail no more, but to prorogue the * Comices for the Election, there were at length two of the Nobles created Consuls, C. Sulpicius Petius the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola: who the same day they were chosen, entered into their office. Thus in the 400 year after the foundation of the City, and the 35 after it was recovered from the Gauls, the Commons lost the Consulship again, when they had enjoyed it nine years. And two Consuls of the Patritii, upon the Interregent, began to govern, to wit, C. Sulpicius Petius the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola. The same year was Emulum won from the Tyburtins, without any memorable warfare exploit: were it that, under the conduct of both Consuls there jointly together, the war was managed, as some have written: or that about the same time the Tarquinians Country was by the Consul Sulpicius over-run and wasted, whilst Valerius led forth a power against the Tyburtins. But more ado had the Consuls at home, with the Commons and Tribunes. The Consuls thought now, it concerned them in trust and credit, as well as in virtue and valour, that as they being Patritii both of them, had received the Consulship, so they should make over the same again to twain of the Nobility: and either wholly to give up their interest and title for ever, if so be the Consulship should now become a Commons dignity: or else to keep it wholly in their possession, whereof they were first seized intirely, in right of their ancestors. On the other side, the Commons fumed and stormed in these and such like terms, "What should we live any longer? and why are we accounted citizens? In case, that which was first got by the virtue and power of two only persons, L. Sextius, and C. Licinius, we cannot now all of us together hold and keep? Certainly, better we were to endure the KK, and Decemvirs again, or any other heavier and more fearful name of absolute and Lordly Empire, than to see both Consuls of the Nobility: and that we, may not both rule and obey in turns, but that the one part settled in the place of rule for ever, should think us, the Commons, born for nothing else but to obey and serve. The Tribunes themselves were nothing behind to set forward these troublesome mutinies. But when the people are up once altogether and in commotion, the principal leaders are hardly seen above the rest in the action. And when as they were come down into Mars field fitty times N to assembly, by ever to no purpose and effect, and that many Comitial dayes of assembly were passed over, only in lewdious troubles: at the last, the Commons being overmatched through the stiffness and obliquity of the Consuls, took the matter to grievously to the heart, that when the Tribunes brake forth into these speeches; "Now farewell freedom for ever: now are we driven, not only to forbear coming into Mars field, but also to abandon and forsake the City, taken captive and oppressed by the Lordly rule of the Nobles and therewithal departed the Commons "with sorrowful cheer did the semblable, and followed after. The Consuls being thus left destitute of one part of the people, yet nevertheless went through with the Election, as few as they were there remaining. And Consuls there were elected of the Nobility both, M. Fabius Ambulius the third time, and T. Quinctius. In some annals or yearly records, I find Coff. M. Popilius, instead of T. Quinctius.

In that year, were two wars performed with prosperous success. And the Tyburtins were fought withal until they yielded. From them was the City Assula, won by force: and other Towns had tasted of the same fortune, but that the whole Nation laid arms aside, and submitted themselves to the Consul his mercy. He triumphed over the Tyburtins: otherwise the conquest was mild and gentle enough, without extremity of execution, but the Tarquinians were cruelly dealt withal: and many a man of them slain in field. Of the prisoners that were taken, whereof

A whereof there was a mighty number, there were 358 of the Noblest and greatest Gentlemen chosen out, and sent to Rome. The rest of the common sort were put to the sword. Neither did they better at the peoples hands that were sent to Rome. For in the midst of the Truce were they all beaten with rods and beheaded. This execution made quittance with them, forasmuch as the Romans in the market place of the Tarquinians, this goodnature in war caused the banishment of them to seek for peace and amity. Their Embassadors were contentedly answered by the Senate, and to upon covenants they were received into society. But the Commons spied not to what home in twelve to one, in the hundred: yet the poorer people were well eased by bringing it down from their privat streights, that they were driven unto, never troubled their heads with the musing of the both Consuls of the Nobles nor with the Assemblies and Elections, nor other publick affairs. Still Petius the fourth time, and M. Valerius Publicola, the second time.

Now when as the City was earnestly amused upon the Tullian war, by reason that the news were, how that the people of Cere, for very pity and compassion, and in regard also of commonquity, took part with the Tarquinians: behold the Embassadors of the Latins turned them clean against the Volscians. Which Embassadors brought word, that there was an army levied already from thence and in arms, even now upon the point to invade their borders: and would from them enter the territory of Rome, and spoil as they go. The Senat therefore thought good to neglect neither business, and gave direction, that to both places certain legions should be appointed, and the Consul to call for their several Provinces and charges. But afterwards the greater care was taken for the Tullian war, upon intelligence given by Sulpicius the Consul his letters, whose commission for Sale-pits and part of the booties carried away into the confines of the Caritis: and that the youth of that people were doubtless employed in the driving of that booty. Whereupon Valerius the Consul, who was opposed against the Volscians, and encamped in the marches of Trifinium, was called back from thence, and commanded by the Senat to nominate a Dictator. Who the Horsemen, contenting himself with his Consular army, by the authority of the Senat, and the peoples suffrages, proclaimed war against the Caritis, and sent them defiance. Then were the Caritis afraid of war indeed, and not a more, as though there had been more force in their menacing bare words, to denounce and signify war, than in their own deeds, who by their encamping, had provoked the Romans to war, than in their plainly that they were overmatched and unable to make their parts good: then repented they that they had made their wait and station of armour or war: but every man labouring what he could, that Embassadors should be sent, to crave pardon for their treips and offence. When their Embassadors should be sent, they were from thence put over to the people. And then they were ought the Gods, whose sacred Images they had received in the French war and devoutly kept and cherished. That the Romans now in their flourishing estate, would take that pity and compassion of them, which they in times past had of the Romans, in their calamity and hard distress, and which they of Veii, they called upon the Flamins and Vestal Virgins. And turning to the chappels chaity and religiously had received and given incensement unto, laying in this wise, "Would any man believe we had deserved no better, but thus of a sudden, without cause given, to be reputed enemies? Or suppose we had done somewhat smelling of hostility, would any man impute the it rather to deliberate counsel, than to some fit heat and folly? And that we would amend our new misdeeds and shewd turns? and chime to make the people of Rome their enemies now in their adversity we had embraced? Beforeseeing them not to term that whole friendship in rather were to be called force and necessity. For the Tarquinians lay they considerate advice, which of our critical Perils, to assist them only in fetching of that booty, which now to heavily is laid to our charge. Whom if you please to have them yielded, we are ready to deliver them: if to be punished they shall suffer accordingly: most humbly craving, that their City Cere, the very sanctuary of the people of Rome, the harbour and habitation of their Priests, the place of receipt for the Roman sacred images and reliques they would grant unto them safe from the calamity of war, and exempt from the slander thereof: and the rather for the devoted Vestal Virgins sake, so kindly interceded, and for the love of the Gods, by them to devoutly honored. The people were moved, not so much with the justice and equity of the present cause, as for their old debts among the Acts of the Senat. Then were the forces diverted against the Falisci, who were tained likewise with the same offence. But the enemies would no where be found. They waited therefore over their confines: & forbore to assault their Towns. So they withdrew their legions to Rome. The rest of the year was employed in repairing their walls & Towers: and the Temple of Apollo was dedicated.

dedicated. In the very end of the year, the contention between the Senators and the Commons brake off the Election of the Consuls: whiles the Tribuns stiffly denied to suffer any assembly therefore to be holden, unless it were according to the Law Leximia. And the Dictator again was as stoutly and stiffly bent, to abolish wholly out of the City the Consulship, rather than it should be indifferent for the Nobility and common people. Thus by adjourning the Election, the Dictator left his office, and the matter grew to an Interregnum. And the Interregents, finding ever the Commons maliciously set against the Senators, succeeded one after another unto the eleventh Interregent: and all the while continued the discord and variance. The Tribuns they called on for the maintenance of the Law Leximia. The Commons, they had an inward grief that stuck neerer to them, upon the excessive injury that still increased; and each man's private care and grievance, brake out in their public contentions and debates. The LL. of the Senat weary of these troubles, commanded L. Cornelius Scipio the Interregent for the time being, for concord and unity sake, in the Election of Consuls to observe the Law Leximia. So P. Valerius Publicola had joyed with him in fellowship of government, Caius Martius Rutilius, one of the Commons.

All debts cleared in Rome.

Now whiles mens minds were inclined one to concord, the new Consuls labouring to ease also this matter of injury, the only ill or bone (as it were) between, that seemed to hinder the uniting of their hearts, and impeach the general agreement; took order publicly for the payment of debts, by creating five officers or Quinquerviri; whom of the deepening and disposing of the public monies, they called Menfarii. And surely, for their equity and careful diligence, they derived in all monuments and records to be remembered and renowned. And these they K were, C. Duellius, P. Decius, M. Papirius, Q. Publilius, and T. Aemilius; who underwent and managed this matter, so intricate and difficult to be dealt in: so grievous and combersome to both sides for the most part, but evermore to one at the least. Which they performed both with different moderation otherwise, and also with some cost and defray of charge, rather than any loss and damage to the State. For the long debts more entangled, rather in regard of the debtors slackness and negligence, than their want of ability, either the City out of the common stock crossed out of the book, by letting up certain counters or tables with ready coin in the public Hall (provided, that there were good security unto the City by sureties and cautions put in beforehand) or else the goods of men valued at indifferent and reasonable prices discharged. So as not only without any wrong done, but also without the complaint of both parties, a mighty debt of I. debts was satisfied and paid.

After all this, a vain fear of the Tuscan war, upon a false Alarm given, that their twelve Nations confpired and were confederate together, caused a Dictator to be chosen. So C. Julius was named in the camp: for thither to the Coss, was the patent of the Senats decree sent. And to him was joyed as General of the Horsemen, L. Aemilius. But all was quiet without the City: Within the City the Dictator gave the attempt, that both Consuls should be created of the Patricii: which brought the government for the time to an Interregnum. And the two Interregents that were in that while (to wit) C. Sulpicius and M. Fabius, obtained that which the Dictator had reached at in vain; namely, that both Consuls might be created of the Nobility: for now the Commons were more pliable and tractable, by reason of the fresh benefit received in the easement and satisfying of their debts. So there were chosen C. Sulpicius Petens, he, who was the former of the twain that gave over the Interregnum, and T. Quintus Pennus. Some there be that give to Quintus the addition of Coss for his surname [and of Caius for his forename.] Both of them went forth to war; Quintus against the Falisci, and Sulpicius against the Tarquinians. Who, for that they could never meet with the enemy in open field, by burning and spoiling made war with the fields rather than with the men. By which lingering continuance, as it were of a languishing consumption, the stubbornness of both Nations was so well tamed, that they made petition first to the Consuls, and by their permission after to the Senat, for a truce, and obtained the same for the term of forty years. Thus the care was laid aside of the two wars, which seemed so neerer at hand. And whiles there was some rest from Arms, it was thought good because the payment of debts above said, had changed the owners and masters of many things, that there should be held a general Selling of the citizens. But, when there was an assembly summoned for the choosing of Consuls, C. Martius Rutilius professing himself to stand for a Consulship, even he that had been the first Dictator of the Commons, troubled the peace and unity of the States of the City. This he went about (as it seemed) in a very undue and unreasonable time. For, both Consuls were then of the Nobility, as it fell out, who gave it forth that they would not admit him to be a Competitor, nor propound his name at the Election. However, both he by earnest preformance in his resolution obtained that which he went about: and also the Tribuns with all their might endeavouring to recover their right, which was lost in the Election of the Consuls, set to their helping hand. And as the countenance and Majesty of the man himself, seemed worthy of the highest type of honor: so the Commons were right willing, that by the time man who had opened the way unto the Dictatorship, the Consulship should draw to that side, and be in part conferred upon them. Neither in the assembly was there any variance in the Suffrages, but that, together with Maelius Nepes, Martius should be created Consul. This year likewise had a Dictator, M. Fabius, not for any fear of war, but because the Law Leximia, for the choice of Consuls, should not be revived and observed. The General of the Horsemen unto the Dictator was Q. Servilius. And yet for all the Dictatorship, the agreement of the Senators together, was in the Election of the Consuls

A Consuls no more force then it was in the choosing of the Consuls. For Popilius Lenus was Consul of the Commons, and L. Cornelius Scipio of the Nobles. And the commoner Consul, by good fortune, proved more famous of the twain. For when upon tidings brought, that a mighty army of the Gauls were encamped in the Latine country, this Gauls war was laid extraordinary upon Popilius, because Scipio lay grievously sick. Who having loved an army, and commanded all the younger men, to meet him in their armour at Mars his Church, without the gate Capena, and chamber] and after he had chosen out of them, fully four legions, and esligues out of the Aerarium [City souldiers unto P. Valerius Publicola, the Pretor: and moved the LL. of the Senat to enroll another army to be in readiness, against all uncertain occurrences of war, what need loever the City B should have. And now himself being at all points thoroughly furnished, setting forward to meet the the enemy. Whole power because he would know, before he had trial thereof with the utter-that he could come unto. The Gauls, a fierce kind of people and by nature eager of fight, having discovered afar of the Roman ensignes, embattelled themselves forthwith, as ready to bid battle.
But when they saw the Roman army not brought forth into the plain and even ground, but that they were strongly defended, not only by the height of the place, but also with a ditch and palisado, and (supposing them to be smitten with fear, and the lister therefore to be aisled, for that they were at that instance busily occupied about their other fortifications; with an hideous noise C looener (they were the Triarii of the rearward that made these other fortifications) but the spear men of the vanguard, and the Principes of the middle ward, who stood ready armed in guard for the defence of the pioneers, made head and received them with fight. Bides their valour, the higher ground was their vantage: so as all their darts and spears light scorn vain, as commonly they do that are slung and lanced on level ground) but stuck all fast as being poised with their own weight: so that the Gauls being surcharged with darts either sticking through their bodies, or fast let in their shields, and to weighing them down; having also run themselves upon the hill; first, as doubtful what to do, made stay, afterwards, when pro-lasting of time had discouraged themselves, and encouraged their enemies, they were driven back and fell one upon another; and D in that confusion made greater havoc and worse, then the slaughter was by the enemy; and crushed they were to death, more in that crowd and thrust, then were slain by sword. Yet were not the Romans sure of victory: for when they were come down into the plain, there was a new piece of work to begin, and a fresh trouble to stand. For the Gauls, by reason of their numbers, little feeling such a loss (as if a new army had started up in sight, out of the ground) stirred up their fresh souldiers and unloosed, against the enemy in his victory. Whereupon the Romans made a stand and bided their opportunity: both because they being already wearied, were to abide a new conflict; and also for that the Consul, while he laid about him with the foremost, without regard of his own person, was wounded well near the left shoulder with a pike, and thereupon for a while was departed out of the battell. By occasion of which lagging, the victory had like to have been lost again: but that the Consul when his wounds were dressed and bound up, came back again E with speed to the foremost ensignes, and said: Why stand you till this? ye have not to deal now, with the Latins or Sabins your enemies, whom after ye have conquered by the sword, ye may make of enemies friends and confederates: but upon very savage beasts we have drawn sword. I will have their blood, or they ours. I from the camp ye have driven them back: chased ye have them multitude down the hill side: over the bodies of enemies lying along, now ye stand: and the plain
"also with their dead carcasses, as ye have done the hills already: and never look that they will "flee, so long as ye stand still. You must advance your ensignes, and charge the enemy afresh. With these exhortations they fell to the second fight, and forced the foremost ranks and files of the Gauls to lose ground: and then with pointed close battalions of footmen, they brake through in to the heart of the main battell. Whereupon the Romans people being disordered, took in F neither certain directions to follow, nor Captains to command, turned their force upon their fellows, were scattered here and there about the plains: fled in this pursuit beyond their tents, and made toward the fort of Alba; which among many his that fled of even height, took in their mouming above the rest. The Consul followed the chase no farther than that camp: both because his new labour, considering the enemy had gained the hills tops, and to reduce it to another point, and hurt made himself unworldly, and also for that he was unwilling to put his tired army to when he had given the whole pillage of the camp to his soldiers, he brought back to Rome his army with vi- ory, and enriched with the spoils of the Gauls. The Consul his wound laid to Rome his ar-which was a cause also that the Senat wished and longed for a Dictator, to hold the assembly for for the Election of Consuls, whiles the other were sick.

the law Licinia, had got for his reward a Consulship; which was more shameful and infamous, in regard of his private seeking for it, (for being Dictator he had made himself Consul) than for any public harm and injury. This year for many and sundry troubles was very famous. The Gauls from the Alban woods (for that they were not able then to endure the cold of winter) ranged all over the Campanian and sea-coasts, and wasted the country. The seas likewise were dangerous by reason of the Greeks navy. All over the tract along Aniurn, and the river of Lawrentium, even to the very mouth of Tyber. So as the rovers and men of war by sea, and the land robbers of the French, met both together, and struck once for all a dangerous battell: and then departed, under the French upon their standing camp, the Greeks back unto their ships: both doubtful, whether they had won or lost. Amid these troubles, the greatest fear by far, arose from this, that the Latine Nation held certain Diets and Councils at the grove of Ferentina; and when the Romans demanded soldiers from them, flat answer was made, That they must no more think to command them whose aid they stood need of. And as for the Latins, they were resolved rather to bear arms in defence of their own liberty, than fight for the maintenance of the dominions of strangers. The Senat being grieved and perplexed as well for these two foreign wars, as also for the revolt of their confederats, seeing no other way, but to keep them in by fear, whom loyalty would not restrain, commanded their Consuls in their mustings, to extend and strain to the utmost the whole strength of the State: for now that their Allies failed them, they were to trust upon their City forces only. From all parts therefore, the youth as well without in the country, as within the City were taken up, and ten legions (as men say) were enrolled of soldiers, amounting to 4200. foot and 300. horse in a legion. Which puissant army, if now at this day any foreign wars were toward, these mighty forces of the people of Rome, which the whole world is hardly able to contain, if they were united and brought into one together, would not easily make again: so great are we grown in wealth only and superfluous delights, to which we strive and apply our minds.

Among other heavy occurrences of that year, Ap. Claudius one of the Consuls, in the very preparation of the wars, departed this life. Whereupon the whole government was devolved upon Camillus. To which sole Consul, either for his quality and worthiness otherwise (not meet to be controlled by the absolute command of a Dictator) or for the lucky presage of his name so fortunate in all the tumultuous wars of the Gauls, the Lords of the Senat thought it not decent and convenient that there should be a Dictator adjoynd. The Consuls having ordeined and appointed two legions for defence of the City, and parted the other eight with the Pretor L. Pinarius, bearing in mind his fathers valour and manhood, undertook the Gauls war himself, without casting lots therefore: commanding the Pretor to keep the sea-coasts, and to put the Greeks back from landing on the shore. He went himself down into the country of Pompinum, and because he was not willing to give battell in the champion, unforced therunto; and thought the enemy might be wearied out well enough by keeping him short, for foraging and fetching in booties, who of necessity was driven to live of prey, chose a convenient place for a standing camp. Where, as they passed the time quietly in their wards, as a settled Garrison: there cometh forth a mighty Gaul in person tall and beg, for armour brave and glorious: who clattering his shield and spear together, and thereby making silence, gave defiance and challenged by his interpreter the Romans to a combat, man to man. There was one M. Valerius a Collonel of footmen, and a very young man, who thinking himself nothing less worthy of that honour than T. Manlius, having first known the Consul his pleasure, advanced himself forth apart from the rest, armed at all points. But this conflict (as touching the prowess of them) was less notable than the other, by reason that the hand of God came between and took a part. For as the Roman was ready to joyne and cope, behold suddenly a raven (set upon the crest his of morion, even full in the face of his enemy. Which at the very sight, the Collonel took joyfully as a token of good luck sent from heaven. Afterwards he prayed devoutly, that the God or goddesse whoe soever, that sent unto him from above that augural foal, to preface and forefigure the future event, would be favourable and gracious unto him. And lo, (a wonder to be spoken) the bird not only held the place still, which it first light upon, but also, as often as the champions buckled and cloied together, mounting up with the wings made at the eyes and the face of the enemy, with beak and claws both, so long, until Valerius killed him. For the Gaul being affrighted at this so strange & wondrous a sight, both his eyes dazzled, and his mind was unrightly troubled. Then the raven took his rite, flew on high quite out of sight towards the East. All the while the camp on both sides was quiet hitherto. But after that the Collonel began to rifle and disarm the Body of the slain enemy, neither could the French keep themselves within their Stations, nor the Romans contain, but run with more speed unto their Conquerour champion. And to about the bodie of the Gaul that lay along dead, began some skirmish, and thereof grew a sharp and cruel battell: for now not only the companies of the next quarters, and corps de guard, but also the whole legions on both sides, came a-broad and fought. Camillus commanded the soldiers, joyous for the victory of the Collonel, joyous also for the gods, to be favourable and ready to asie, for to go to battell: and shewing very often unto them the Collonel, set out bravely and enriched with the spoiles of his enemy. Follow this brave gentleman, good soldiers (quoth he) and about the dead champion of the Gauls killed their whole troops, and lay them along. In this fight appeared the help of God and manevitably: and they fought it out with the Gauls, and had no doubtfull conflict: both armies

A armies had to conceived and deeply imprinted before hand in their mind the future event of these two battles that had fought together. Between the formost, whose concourse had raised others, there was a sharp conflict: but the rest of the multitude, turned back before they came to the volley of darts. And first they were scattered along the Volscian and Falern countries: but afterwards they took their waies toward Apulia and the lower Adriatick sea.

The Consul having assembled the soldiers to an audience, solemnly before them all, commended the Collonel, and rewarded him with ten oxen and a coronet of gold. Him self, by direction from the Senat, to attend the war by sea, joynd camp with the Pretor. And there, because though the cowardice of the Greeks that would not come into the field, the war was like to be long and lingering, he nominated, by the authority of the Senat, T. Manlius Torquatus for the Dictator, to hold the Election of Consuls. The Dictator having named for his General of horsemen, A. Cornelius Cossus, held the Election, and with exceeding favour of the people, declared for Consul one like himself, and tracing the steps of his own vertue and glory, declared for Consul (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence: a young man, M. Valerius Corvinus (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence: a young man, I say, three and twenty years old. Corvinus was adjoynd companion in government a Commoner, M. Popilius Lenas the fourth time. Camillus performed no memorable exploit with the Greeks, for neither were the Greeks good soldiers on land, nor the Romans at sea. At the last being kept from landing, and in Greece this fleet consisted, is not certainly known. Of what people, or of what nation Carians or potentates of Sicily, above all other. For all Greece beyond them, at that time wearied and discharged, and that both a road there was peace, as also at home quietnesse, through the unity of the times then they should be gladd with too much joy, beheld a pestilence arose in the City and contrived the Senat to command the Decemvirs, to overlook the books of Sibyls: and by direction thereof, was a Leisferne celebrated. The same year there was a Colony desyn out of the Antians, to people Saturnium, and the town was repaired for them, while the Latins had come of purpose to live for society and amity. The time left continued still both at home and abroad, when T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Plautius left continued still both at home and abroad, which was before alter one in the hundred, became now but half so much. The injury was depicted & ordered into three years by even portions, so as a fourth part should be paid out of hand. And albeit some of the Commons (for all that) were pinched therewith, yet the Senat was persons. The greatest matters were well eased, in that they forbore to collect the tribute and to mulier soldiers.

The third year after that Saturnium was reedified by the Volscians, M. Valerius Corvinus the second time Consul with C. Perillius, upon news of Latins, that Embassadors from Aniurn went about to the nations of the Latins, soliciting them to rise up in arms, was commanded to make war upon the Volscians, before the enemies forces were greater: who put himself on his journey with a fierce army toward Saturnium. Whither when as the Antians and other Volscians were come to meet him, with a power provided aforesaid, against any preparations from Rome, presently without any stay they joynd battell, as being through a deep hatred and long hatred, litiously bent one against the other. The Volscians, a nation more hally to rebell, than hardy to fight, being defeated in a battell, fled amain and highed apace to put themselves within the walls of Saturnium. But when the walls were not able to save them, for that the town being environed and besided the common fort not meet for service, that yielded themselves. The town was raised down and burnt; only they spared the firing of Martius church. And the whole lackage and spoil was belowed upon the soldiers. But there were not comprised within this booty, the 4000 captives, which the Consul in his triumph caused to be led bound before his chariot: and after that sold them, & brought a round sum of money into the treasury. Some write, that this number of captives, were sold slaves. And that is more like to be true, than that they should be sold, who yielded themselves. After this followed Consuls, M. Fabius Dorsio, and Servius Sulpicius. The action of that one State and City, had been the resolution of the whole Latine nation: and by their maintenance, they had been the resolution of the whole Latine nation: and by their life had been a time of great troubles and sudden tumults, he nurtured without any respect of the multitude, and therewith proclaimed a Celebration of all courts & law: and the legions of plaudites rather than of warriors, so that in the last battell, that war was dispatched, howbeit the Dictator, because they not only made the quarrel and waged first but also offered fight without temple to Juno Moneta: and after he had obtained that they should be vowed for, and therewith vowed to perform his vow, so soon as he was returned home to Rome with victory, gave up his Dictatorship, according to the magnificence of the people of Rome. The place was appointed and set out on the [Capitol] hill, even the very plot of ground, where sometime before stood the dwelling house of M. Manlius Capitolinus. The Coll. having implored the Dictator his army in the Volscian war, surprised at unwares the town Sora out of the enemies hands. The Temple of Moneta was dedicated the year after it had been vowed, when C. Martius Rullinus the third time, and T. Manlius Torquatus the second time, were Consuls. Immediately upon the dedication of that church, there ensued a strange wonder, like unto that old marvel of the hill Albanus ; For it rained stones, and in the day time it seemed to be dark night. And the books of Sibylla being perused (for that the City now was mightily given to superstition) the Senat. ordered that there should be a Dictator named for the ordaining of certain feasts and holy daies. So P. Valerius Publicola was chosen, and with him, Q. Fabius Ambustius General of the horimen. Order was given, that not only the Tribes should go in solemn procession with their prayers and Litanies, but also the nations that bordered upon them : with a precise direction unto them, upon what daies every one should make supplication. That year (as it is reported) there passed heavy judgments and the Sentences of the people against the Vilers, with whom the Ediles had commenced suit. And without any notable cause to be remembered, they grew to an Interperion. Upon which, that something might be thought thereby done, both Consuls were made : the Nobles, M. Valerius Corvinus the third time, and A. Cornelius Cossus.

Now from hence forth will we follow

Now from hence forth will we treat of greater wars, both for the puiſſance of the enemies, and also for their far distance: as well for their spacious countries they inhabited, as long tract of time that they continued. For this year began the Romans to bear arms against the Samnites, a nation powerful in wealth, and valiant in field. After which war, fought on both sides withalacker-K (the good Lord) the wonderfull stirs and troubles, and how often the Romans fell into extremities of perils, that their Dominion and Empire might arise upon this greatness and high estate, which hath much ado to hold its own, and stand maintained. But the cause of the Romans war with the * Samnites, being in society and amity linked together, arose first from others, and not upon any quarrel between themselves. At what time as the Samnites warred unjustly (as being more mighty) upon the * Sidicins: they as the weaker and forced to flee for succour unto the richer, banded with the * Campanians. Who bringing with them a greater name, than power (in deed) to aid and assist their Allies, & flowing in riot and superfluous delights, hapned in the country of the Sidicins to be foiled & defeated by the other, who had been injured and hardened by continuall use of arms and to L. afterwards drew upon their own heads, the whole violence and poile of the wars. For the Samnites letting the Sidicins alone, went to the head, for set upon the Campanians, as it were the very forefetter and callie of defence for all the borders. And wel they wilt that there they might win victory as easily: but riches & honour at their hands they were to achieve muchmore. And when they had gained and held with a strong garrison, the his called * Tifutina: where they were adjoining, and commanded the City Capua. From thence they descended with a foursquare ranged battell into the plain that lyeth between Capua and Tifutina: where a second field was fought: in which the Campanians had the overthrow, and were beaten within their wals. Having therefore no hope near of them, and seeing the strength of their youth greatly decayed, they were constrained to seek aid of the Romans. Whose Embassadors being admitted into the Senat, and having audience given M them, spake much want to this effect, If the people of Capua, most noble Senators, hath sent us in ambassy unto you, to crave at your hands friendship for ever, and succour for the present. Which amity if we had requested in our propriety, well might it sooner have begun, but knit had it been with a weaker bond and not so durable. For then, remembering our selves to have ended league and society on every ground, and in equal equality we had you: friends haply we should have been as now are, but bounden and devoted unto you, we had never been. But now, in case by your commiseration and pity we be gained and won, and in our distresse, by your aid, helped and relieved: we must needs affectionately embrace a benefit from you received, unless we would be thought unthankfull wretches, and unworthy of any helpether of God or man. And albeit the Samnites, have been before us interlined in friendship and confederacy, yet we think that no N sufficient bar, but that they may also be received into the same. Only thus much it ought to make for them, as to be preferred before us in antiquity of time, and degree of honour. For in that distance between you and the Samnites, there is no expresse clause, no caveat or proviso contained, against the making of any new confederacie. And surely, always heretofore ye have thought it as good enough of your friendship, if the party who sought the fame, were but willing and desirous to be your friend. We Campanians (albeit our present condition suffereth us not to speak magnificently) giving place to no nation but your selves, either for the stately port of our Cities, or gooddoctee, and fruitfullnesse, of our soil, in entering into your acquaintance, shall not a little, I suppose increase and better your good estate. And first for the Aequians and Volscians, those eternal and perpetual enemies of this City, they shall not so soon at any time O shall find out their heads, but we will befreight upon their jacks. And look what ye first shall find in your hearts to doe for our sake, the same will we always doe for your Empire and honour. And when those felicities are beneclouded that are between you and us (which your vertue and fortunat felicity, promitteth will be shortly) then shall your dominions reach all the way in a continued train, as unto us. A pitifull and lamentable case it is, that our present fortune is such to us to confesse: To this exigent and hard terms of extremity are we Campanians driven (right honourable) that subject we must be, either to our friends or to our enemies. If ye

 " to lay the truth, we fought in shew and semblance of word for the Sidicins ; but in very deed

 " robbed and spoiled most wrongfully by the Samnits ; we well foresaw, that when the Sidicins
 " were once let a burning, the same fire would soon be driven and reach unto us. For now are not

 " will maintain. Therefore my LL. of the Senat, here we yield up in your hands, and to the " wholly devoted as vassals unto you. At which words they all held up their hands unto the " gods, shed tears plentifully, and fell down upon their knees in the very entry of our our evasion. Being commended by the Consul, and having received that troop and guard which he demanded, he marched close through the woody palls, and was not detected by the enemy before he approached the place that he went to get. And whilst they all were amazed thereat and wondered, and wholly turned their eyes to himward, he both gained the Consul some time to withdraw his army into a more convenient and open ground, and possessed himself of the hill top, and there rested. The Samnites, whilst they turn their engines to and fro, (as men that lost the vantage of both sides) could neither make after the Consul, but through the same valley, wherein a while before they had him under their shot, nor yet erect their squadrons, and march up that hill, which Decius over them had already gained. But being more angry with those, that thus had disappointed them of the fair means they had of a brave exploit, and considering withal the necretnesse of the place, and their small number which were gotten thither, they were one while of mind to environ the hill round with armed men, and to keep Decius from the Consul; another while, to make them way, that when they were come down into the valley, they might let upon them. Thus whilst they were in doubt what to do, the night overtook them. Decius at the first, was in good hope to fight with them from the higher ground, as they mounted up against the hill; but afterwards he marvelled much, that they neither began to charge upon him, nor yet when they were disappointed and put by that purpose, through disadvantage of the ground, fortified themselves with trench and rampier, and other pioneers work. Then calling the Centurions unto him, "what unskillfulness (quoth he) of military service, what supine slackness and sloth is this? how got these lords the victory of the Sidicins and Campians? Ye see their engines waving buter and thither: one while budged they are in one together, another while advanced and displaced at length. As for munitions & fortifications, no man beginneth any; and by this time we might have been entrenched round about. But if we stay here longer then for our vantage, we might be counted lazy lubbards like them. Come on then, go with me, that whilst day light serveth, we may see in what places they quarter their guards, and what way we may get from hence and escape. All this went he to espie and discover himself in person, clad in a common soldiers jacket, leading with him the other captains in the habit of their soldiers; to the end that the enemies might not take mark of the Generall himself, how he went about to view them. After this, when he had disposed the sentinels and corps de guard, to all the rest he commanded a watchword to be given, that when the trumpet sounded the second watch, they should come all unto him armed, and make no noise at all. When they were thither assembled with silence, as he had commanded, this himselfe my tallow soldiers (quoth he) must ye hear me speak, and forbear all giving assent by uttering your voices (as soldiers else do) When I shall have delivered my mind to you, let as many as like thereof, go softly on the right hand, and not speak a word: and look what side is greater, that courtie shall stand and take place. And now listen what my conceits, and what I would have done. The enemy hath not invited you here, as men either fled away for fear, or lagging behind for sloth and idleness. The place have ye won by manhood; by manhood must ye from thence escape. In coming hither, ye have already saved a brave army of the people of Rome: and now by breaking out from hence, save your own lives. Worthy you are that being but a few, have overcome many: ye should not stand in need your selves of any mans help. With that enemy ye have to deal, who yesterday through their idleness sloth, overstepped their happy opportunity to defeat our whole army: who were so blind, that they saw not this bill of great importance even over their heads, before it was by us gained: who being so many thousands, could neither debar us from climbing up, as few as we were, nor when we had got the place, compass us about with a trench, having to much day as they had. These enemies, whom ye have thus deluded & beguiled, whilst they were awake, and had their eyes tight, ye are to deceive when they are fast asleep, say, you must doe so indeed; there is no other remedy. For at that passe we are now, that I am rather to flee you, in what terms of extremity ye stand, then to advise you to the execution of any good counsell. It is no consulting at this time whether ye should here stay, or depart hence; first that besides your weapons, and hearts letting up rest upon their weapons, fortune hath left you nothing at all. And die we must without doubt for hunger and thirst, if we dread the sword point more than besitteth hardy men, and valorous Romans. One way there is therefore, and but one way of safety, even to make a brave fall through hand and way. This must we do, either by day or by night. And that doubt is soon cleared, if we look for the morrow day, what hope have we, but that the enemy will cast a ditch and bank even round about us: who already as yet lying under this little rising, have compassed it with their very bodies. Now, if so be that the night be a convenient and favourable time for irruptions and sallies, as in truth it is: then, this hour of the night certainly, is of all other the fittest. At the second watches found ye are come hither, at which time all men are in their most sound and dead sleep. Amid their bodies being fast asleep, shall ye go. Either by silence deceive them unawares, or if they perceive you, affront the with a sudden outcry. Do but follow me, as ye have done already, I will follow the same fortune that guided me hither. Now as many of you that think this good counsell, and a courtelike to speed well, make no more ado but pass on my right hand. So they all passed, and followed after Decius as he went through the quarters void of watchmen and wardens. Now were they escaped the mids of the camp, when a soldier, as he clambered over the watchmens bodies, lying heavily asleep, chanced to stumble at a shield, which gave a sound again. Whereat the watchman being awakened, raised his next fellow

A low; and they being start up, call up other, not knowing whether they were enemies or fellows, whether the garison of Decius on the hill was broken forth, or the Consul had surprised the camp. Decius then, seeing his soldiers could not pass clear and undetected, commanded them to let up a fire; so as they could neither take weapons readily, nor make head against them, nor yet pursue this time slain the warders whom they met, and in confusion, the Roman garison had by was somewhat of the night to come: but now they seemed to be late, and the Consul's camp as yet quoth Decius on forward in this courage of yours, O hardy Romans: This your passage and return to and fro, all ages shall extoll and praise. But for the full light and view of it to great valour, glorious a return of yours into the camp, let us here rest, and wait for day. His words were obeyed; and to soon as the day brake, he dispatched a messenger afore unto the Consul: and to with exceeding joy they made speed to the camp. And when it was known in the camp by the all, were themselves returned safe: then every one came forth to meet them as fast as they could, with praises and commendations, calling them both all & some, their favours, praising the immortal gods, and giving thanks, ye, and extolling Decius to the sky. This was the triumph of Decius in cast his eyes upon him, and raised him a Coronell, equal to the Consul in all kind of honour. When he was come to the Pretorium, the Consul by sound of trumpet, called all the army to an audience, and as he entered into a discourse of the deserved praises of Decius, Decius himself then perceiving the Consul, to let aside all other things, and whilst the occasion and opportunity was offered, he urged him effectually, to give an alarm to the enemies, both while they were amazed with this scare by night, and also by scattering about the hill, as it were in their wandering alway in the forest. So the Legions were sent out after him to make fresh pursuit of the camp, and by means of the espials better acquainted with the forest, they were conducted by a wider and more open way toward the enemy, whom suddenly they surprised, so charged, and most unarmed, and could neither rally themselves, nor retire into their trench, they drove them at full with fear into their camp, and take arms, nor retire into their trench, and troubled; they were matters thereof also. The noise was heard all about the hill, and called every man to flee out of his hold. So a great part of them took their heels before the enemy could slay: and the camp rifled & spoiled. The Consul having achieved this exploit, called an assembly: and not only finished the praises of Decius, as he before began, but also amplified them with fresh commendation of this new service. And besides other military gifts, he rewarded him with a crown of gold, a hundred oxen, and one special white one, (fat and fair above the rest with gold horns. The soldiers who together with him held the hill as he said, had given unto them for a reward, a double proportion of corn, and for the present one ox a piece, and two single liveries, his head a wreath of green grass, in token of a delivery from siege, and with notable shouts and loud cries approved this gift. Another chapter or garland, also, in token of like honour, did he sacrificed that chosen white ox unto Mars; and thus being adorned with these ornaments of honour, soldiers, who had accompanied him in that exploit and service. To the same soldiers the legions gave a pound measure of wheat meal, and a sextar of wine, a piece. All these particulars were performed and done with great cheerfulness, and seconded with shouting and acclamation of the soldiers, to figure their good liking and general assent.

A third battle was fought at Suessula: wherein by M. Valerius, was put to flight the host of the Samnites. Whereupon, the whole manhood and flower of their youth that remained at home were sent for and assembled, determining to fight it out and trie their fortune once for all. I can fill you hereof come from Suessula Capua: and from thence carriers and polts were dispatched longing to the camp, with a strong guard, he marched forward in great haste, and not far from the enemy, took a little plot of ground to encamp in; as having besides their horses of service, no it without further delay they were to fight) embattled themselves. But seeing none to encounter them, they came with banner displayed to the very camp of the enemies. And there to look as to view the circuit of the camp, in how far compass they had fortified, guessing thereby how few up the ditches, to cut through the banks, and so presently to break into the camp. And when in that rashness had the war been decided and dispatched, but that the captains held in the violence of the soldiers. But for as much as their own number to great, required good store of victuals victuals, and was both by their lying before Suesina, and also by their long stay there without fight brought to scarcity well-need of all things: it was thought good, that whiles the enemies kept within their hold as affrighted, the soldiers should be sent about the country foraging. In which mean time they supposed that the Romans likewise, would have spent all, who were thither come lightly appointed, and had brought no more corn with them than they could carry to their shoulders, besides their armour. The Consul having espied the enemies stragling over the country, and their guards fearfully manned, after a brief exhortation to his soldiers, led them forth to give an assault upon their camp. Which when they had won at the first shout and onset, and killed more of the enemies within their tents, then either upon the gates or upon the rampier: he caused the engines that he had taken, to be brought together into one place: and leaving there two legions, I for a guard and defence, with a straight charge, that until he came again, they should forbear to rise and make spoil, he went forward in order of battell. And when the horsemen which he made out afore, had like hunters driven the scattered Samnites, as it were, within net and toil, he fell upon them and committed an exceeding great slaughter. Forfrighted as they were, they knew neither at what signall they should rally themselves together, nor whether they should make speed to the camp, or be further away. But so great was their fright and flight both, that there were brought to the Consul, 40000 shields, more indeed then there were men slain: besides 170 engines, together with those that were won in the camp. Then returned he unto the enemies tents, and belloved the whole pillage there, upon the soldiers. And such was the happy successe of this war, that it both caused the Falisci being in truce, to succumb to the Senar, for league: and also K turned the Latins, who had prepared their forces already from warring with the Romans, to wage war upon the Peligni. Neither relled the face of this so fortunate a victory within the marches of Italy: for even the Carthaginians also, sent their Embassadors to Rome, with gratulation, and a present of a golden crown weighing twenty five pounds, to be set up to Jupiter's Temple within the Capitoll. Both Consuls triumphed over the Samnites: and Decius followed after, all goodly to be seen, with his giste and worthy praises: whiles the soldiers, as their manner was, with merry jests and rude ditties, magnified and renowned the name of the Colonell no less than the Consuls.

After this the Embassadors of the Campains and the Suesinians had a day of audience: and upon their humble request it was granted, that thither should be sent a standing garrison to winter L there, for to stop the excursions and invasions of the Samnites. But Capua, even then no good place for military discipline, wrought an alteration in the soldiers there: who having once got a taste, and taken a delight in a world of pleasures of all sorts, quite forgot their own natural country. For they of the garrison, began to lay plots and devise how to get Capua from the Campains: even by the same wicked practise, by which themselves had won it first from the ancient possessors
 "and inhabitants, saying, "It made no matter, and they were but rightly served, in case their own "predecessors example, should return upon their own heads. Again, why should the Campains,
 "not able to defend themselves, nor maintain their liberties and goods, be LL of the most plentiful
 "country of Italy, and of a City answerable and correspondent therunto, rather then the victorious army, which with their sweat and blood had repelled and expelled the Samnites from them? And M
 "was it any reason, that they who had yielded to be vassals unto them, should enjoy that fruitful
 "and pleasant tract, while they themselves wearied with fighting, struggled full and wrestled in a "pestilent air, and dry barren soil, about the City of Rome, and within that City, endured the let-
 "ted, inveterate and insupportable mischief & plague of duty, that furnished them daily more and more?
 "While the projected conspiracies were contrived in secret conventicles, and as yet not broached and divulged to all mens knowledge, the new Consul, C. Marius Rutilius came in place: whose lot it was to be LL Deputy of the province Campania, leaving his fellow Q. Servilius in the City, who having intelligence by the Captains and Colonels, of all the particularities of those designes: being a wise man, both for his old age and long experience (as who was now Consul the fourth time, and withal had been Censor and Dictator) thought it best to dissemble the matter, and N to make void and frustrate the present heat and outrage of the soldiers by deferring and prolonging their hope, as if they might put in execution their plots at their best leisure, whensoever they pleased. He raised therefore a rumour, that the garrisons should in the same towns winter against the year following. [For divided they were into sundry Cities of Campania: to the web begun at Capua, was spread from thence through all the forces.] By means of this good respect to believe themselves and advise of their matters, the mutiny for the present was well quieted. The Consuls then led forth the soldiers into the summer places of abode and repose, and purpose while he had the Samnites in quietness to cleanse the army by the cashiering, & discharging those busie bodies and troublesome spirits: pretending colourably, and saying, That some of them had served already so long as the law required, others were well now leapt in years, or waxen feeble and their strength decayed. Some had their passports limited, and were sent home: at the first one by one singled out, afterwards, certain whole cohorts or bands, as having wintered far from their dwelling places, from their goods and substance. Under a pretence and colour also of military services and employments, whiles to me were dispatched one way, some another, a great part of them were rid clean away. All this multitude, the other Consul and the Pretor kept still at Rome: desiring this cause, and that, of delays and sowing behind. And verily at first, they being not aware of this delusion, were not unwilling to visit home. But after that they perceived, that Consul.

A neither they who were dismissed first, returned again unto their colours, nor any in a manner discharged else, but such as had lien in winter garrison at Capua: and those especially, who of them were the authors of the conspiracy: first they marvelled, and afterwards feared in very deed, that their complots were revealed and come to light, and that now presently, they should be put to examinations and tortures, abide arraignment and judgement, be executed secretly apart one by one, and such like speeches low they and whisper secretly, that were in the camp, when they saw the principall authors of the mutiny, who were the sinews and strength thereof, by the wily policy of the Consul to be dismembered from them. One cohort of them, being not far from Ardea at that time down at Laurela, in a narrow passage or wood between the sea and the mountains, to intercept and stay, whomsoever the Consul sent about this or that pretended business as is shewensaid, of a full army, but only a head and Captain. And disordered as they were, they went robbing and spoiling, as far as the Alban country, and under the hill of Alba, they encamp themselves within a trench and rampier, and under the hill of Alba. They thought themselves safe, that either wittingly would venture upon to great and dangerous an enterprise: or to whom C tomorrow, whiles they reasoned still about this point, and fully debated the matter, some of the wandering and vagrant foragers of the Country thereabout, bring certain intelligence, that Titus Quintius implied himself in husbandry, and held a farme in Tusculum, minding neither the City, nor dignities of state and Common weal. This man was come of noble lineage, and having served with great credit and honour in the wars by a wound received, was time of a leg, and gave over soldiery, determining to lead the rest of his life in the country, frequented far from all consideration about chusing a Commander, little trusting any one there present in place. And who should be sent for as far as from Rome? What Senator or Commander was so D therefore to use force and to bring him to it by fear. So, in the dead time of the night, they thought that were sent thereto, entered the farm house, and finding Quintius sound and fast asleep, they awakened him: propounded unto him either rule and honour, or else present death: and no man between, in case he made stay and refused to go with them: and to they baled and brought him to their camp. Incontinently he was saluted L. General at his first coming. And when the man was affrighted at this sudden and wonderful occurrence, they enaue him with the ornaments and ensignes to that honor belonging, and will him to lead them as their commander to the City of Rome. Thus having plucked up the standards, in this heady fit of their own, rather then upon any advice or counsel of their captain, they march in warlike manner with an army toward Rome, within eight miles of the City, upon the cauley or street way, now called Appia Fia: and had ap-proched immediately in that train to the very City, but that they heard there was a power com-E ing with Lucius Aemilius Mamercus General of horsemen. So soon as they were come in interview of another, and took knowledge of the armor and ensignes: as the remembrance of their native country wrought with them their straight waies a mitigation of their mood, they were not yet to fac-ine: and the uttermost rage and maddell fit that ever they proceeded unto, was counted their cession and departure away from their own countynen. And therefore both captains and soldiers on either side sought means to meet together, and draw to imparale. Quintius for his part, who has against the late Cornelius likewise for him self, as one that with loving affection embraced all his fellow-citizens, but the soldiers especially, and above all others those of his own army that fought F in his banner, came forth to a parle. And forthwith as soon as he was once known, he had no lesser reverence done of unto him of the adverse part, than silence and audience given of his all, as nine own particular patrons, when I took my leave of the City, I adored and worshipped in this will, craving humbly upon my knees at their hands, to vouchsafe me the honour, not "have been, and will be know else where, to win glory and walkie renown: From

 "not yee then, being a whole army, all of the Romanes, surcease this unkind and im-
 "pious warre? And thou T. Quintius, howsoever thou art come there to stand, whe-

 "amongst the hindermost: say, with more honesty than thou shalt, and shew thy natural coun-

 "O souldiers (if need there be at all of mee) yee have a much better captain for peace than

 "Volscian nor Samnite, but a Roman, even your owne Consul sometime, souldiers, and

 "And what is it then we ought and should desire? Why then let us not anger and "hope aside, two false motives, two deceitfull guides and counsellors; and betake
 "our selves and all wee have to a man of approved truth and fidelity? These words being "liked well of all (as appeared by a Generall shout) T. Quintius went forth before the "enignes in the forefront, and pronounced that the souldiers should be at the Dictator his "devotion and pleasure: beleeving him to consider and undertake the cause of poor and "wretched citizens: and having taken it into his hands, to maintain and protect the same, ac"cording to that faithfulness wherewith hee used to governe the Commonweale. As for "himselfe privately, he would not intend ought for his owne security: neither repoled
 "he hope in any things else but innocency. The souldiers indeed were to be capitulate, as "once heretofore the Commons, and a second time the legions had done with the "Senators: namely, that their revolve and pry rebellion might not be laid un"to their charge, and their hurts and utter undoing. Then the Dictator, after hee
 "had first commended Quintius, and willed the selfe to be content and of good cheer, rode "poll to the City, and by the advice of the Senators, preferred a bill unto the people "in the grove Petelinus: That the mutiny and insurrection should turne no man to fear "and danger. He belought the Quinties also of this much favour beides, That nei"ther in just nor earnest, this should be laid in no mans will. The same time there was "proposed beides, a sacred military law under pain of death. That no souldiers name
 "once entered into the muster after his booke, should be raised out against his will: With "this branch annexed over and beides, That no man who had been sometime a co"lonell or Tribune, should after have the leading of bands, and be a Corporall. This was "followed hard and urged by those of the conspiracy, in regard of one P. Sabinus, who in maner
 "each other year had been either a Colonel, or chief Centurion, whom now they call Primi"pilis. Him the souldiers spighted much, and were maliciously set against, because he had alwaies bare to Sabinus: then Sabinus himselfe brought the Senators that they would not regard his ho-

 As unreasonable a demand was this also, That of hostium (p. 9.) (and that was triple at that time) that the souldiers began to take one another by the hands and embrace with teares: and that a

The Latines, together with the Capuans revolted: and the Latines having sent their Embassadors to the Senat (of Rome) offered and presented peace, upon this condition only, that they would create one of their Consuls out of them. This Embassie thus declared, Annus their Pretor who had audience in the Capitol, in going down from thence, took such a fall, that he died in the place. T. Manlius as-his ownson to lose his head, because, contrary to his express commandment, he had night as with the Latines, notwithstanding his good success in that cause. At what time as the Romans were greatly depressed, and like to lose the field, P. Decius their Coll, with Manlius devoted and offered himself to present death for to save the Army: and setting spurs to his horse, rode into the midst of the enemy: he died himselfe, when T. Manlius returned into the City, there was not one of all the youth came forth to meet him, and so he was honour. Minutius, a profess, of the Coll, was condemned for his insolent incontinent life. The Ausonia was being subdued, a Colony was planted in Cales, and another the next in Fregelle. Many Roman dimes were detected of praifing poison: and most of them were forced to drink of their own piss, whereof they died presently. Whereupon was the first law made to order the Burgeois of the City of Rome, The Palestrina was conquered and afterwards sold, and educt dred upon Compulsion. Quintius Publilius who blocked them within their walls, was the first man that had his Commision renewed, and continued still in government, when the ordinary time was expired, and by means of the Consuls had triumph entered into him. The common people were delivered from the dangr of their creditors, by occasion of the fifth left of one of them, L. Papirius who was delivered from and against nature abused C. Publilius, a debtor of his. When L. Papirius the Dictator was returned from his Army into the City, for to take the Auspices away, by reason of some error supposed in the former, Q. Fabius the General of the horsemen, having in his absence offered the opportunity and advantage of performing a worthy exploit, gave battell contrary to his Dictator and put the Samnites to the worse, for Rome. And when his cause would seem to punish him accordingly, Fabius made an escape and fled to the people. This book containeth also the fortunate exploits against the Samnites.

Now was C. Plautius Consul the second time, with L. Emilius Mamercus, when as the Sertines and Norbans brought tidings to Rome of the Privernat revolt, with complaints of harms sustained at their hands. News came likewise, that an Army of Volscians, under the conduct of the Antians, were encamped at Saturnium. Both these wars fell by lot to Plautius. Who taking his journey first to Privernum, forthwith bad them battle: and with no great conflict gave his enemies the overthrow. The Town was won and restored again to the Privernats, with a strong garrison therein placed, but two parts of their Lands were taken from them. The Army thus having obtained victory, was conducted thence to Saturnium against the Antians. Where was a cruel battle fought with much bloodshed on both sides: and when as the tempestuous and stormy weather parted them asunder, before that either side was enabled to victory, the Romans no whit wearied with that conflict so doubtful, addressed themselves to fight against the morrow. But the Volscians having taken a view and account what men they had lost in fight, were not of like mind to adventure the hazard again: and therefore as vanquished men they dislodged by night in disorder, and fearfully took their way to Antium, leaving behind them their wounded, and part of their baggage. Great store of armour was there found, both upon and among the slain bodies of the enemies, and also within the Camp: Which the Consul promised to dedicate to dame Lus, and so he foraged and spoiled the confines of the enemies, even as far as the sea coast. But against the other Consul Emilius, who was entered into the Sabellian land, neither were the Samnites encamped, nor their Legions opposed any where. Whiles therefore with fire and sword he wasted their Country, the Samnites Embassadors come unto him, craving peace: but being by him pitched off to the Senate, after they had audience given; they let fall their stout stomaks, and requested peace for themselves with the Romans, and liberty to make war against the Sidicins: which petition they enforced with more reason and equity. First in that they had entered into amity with the people of Rome, during their prosperity; and not as the Campains in their adversity: again, they were to take arms against the Sidicins: enemies always to themselves, and never friends to the people of Rome: who also, as neither in peace (as the Samnites) used for friendship and alliance, nor in time of war (as the Campains) fought for aid and succour: and finally, were neither under the protection of the people of Rome, nor yet their vassals and subjects. When as T. Emilius the Praetor had consulted with the Senate about these points demanded by the Samnites, and that the LL. thought good that the league with them should be renewed: the Praetor in the name of the rest, made answer to the Samnites, "That neither the fault was in the people of Rome that the confederacy between them was not perpetual: neither galled them, but forasmuch as they were weary themselves first, and repented of the war commenced through their own default, the league might yet be newly made again. Touching the Sidicins, they would be no hindrance, but that the Samnite people, might use their liberty and do what they thought best, either for war or peace. The M League being thus concluded and confirmed and they returned home, presently the Roman Army was brought from thence upon receipt of a years pay, and corn for three months, according to the capitulation covenanted with the Consul, in consideration of a truce granted, until their Embassadors were returned.

The Samnites, with the same forces which they had employed to withstand the Roman war, went forth against the Sidicins with undoubted hope, speedily to win the City of their enemies. Then, had the Sidicins before made an offer to yield themselves unto the Romans, but seeing the Nobles to reject them as coming too late, and wrestled as it were perforce from them in their last extremity, they tended the same to the Latines, who were already of their own accord risen up and had taken arms. The Campains likewise (for ready and forward were they to bear in mind an injury of the Samnites, rather than a good turn of the Romans) forbore not to join in this quarrel. Thus was there raised a mighty power of so many Nations banded together, under the conduct of the Latines and invaded the borders of the Samnites, where more hurt was received by rodes than skirmishes. And albeit the Latines in fight had the better hand, yet were they well content for as aiding to many conflicts, to depart out of the enemies country. Which gave the Samnites leisure to send Embassadors to Rome, who before the Senat complaining, that they endured the same measure still, being now allies, which they had abidden before when they were enemies: besought most humbly, "that the Romans would be satisfied with that victory of the Campains and Sidicins, their enemies, which they had got out of the Samnites hands, and not suffer them to be trodden under foot by those Nations, the most distrid and cowards of all others: touching moreover, if so be the Latines and Campains were under the dominion of the people of Rome that they would command them by virtue of their authority to forbear the Samnites country: and if they refused to obey, then to challenge and keep them in by force of war. To these demands they framed a doubtful answer, as being loath and ashamed of the one side to confess, that the Latines were not at their devotion, and siding again on the other side by reproving and provoking them to turn away their hearts, and to follow them for ever. And this was the answer. As touching the Campains, their case was otherwise, who were not by covenants and conditions

A "ditions in forme of League, but by voluntary and simple submission under their protection: and therefore they should be quiet whether they would or no: but as for the Latines, by any capitulation comprised in their accord, they were not prohibited to levy war with whom they list, so it estranged and alienated the Campains for fear, and made the Latines more stout: so the Romans now would give them the head, & yield any thing into them, and therefore under a colour of preparing war against the Samnites they summoned and held many Comices one after another: and in all their meetings and consultations, their Princes and chief men came after themselves did nothing but plot and practise war with the Roman. In which they were partly aided by the Campains had their hand as deep as the rest, even to bear arms against the whole who had been their protectors. But although they did what they could to keep all close of purpose, and were diligent backs) yet nevertheless this complor was discovered, and intelligence thereon, given at Rome, by Heronipus were the Consuls commanded to resign their Magistracy before the ordinary time, that so much the sooner there might be new created against so great a danger and preparation of war, but here role a scruple of conscience, that the altemly for Election should be hidden by them, whole government was thus shortened and abridged. Whereupon they proceeded to an Interceded Consuls, T. Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P. Decius Mus.

In that year, it is recorded certain, that Alexander King of Persia, arrived in Italy with a Navy: who, no doubt if he had sped well at his first entrance, would have proceeded farther and ward upon the Romans. In this age flourished Alexander the Great in glorious conquests, who being this man his fathers son, and a warrior invincible, whiles he achieved feats of arms in another part of the world, happened to die in his best time and prime of his youth. But to proceed forwarder revolted: yet, as though they were carefully briefed about the Samnites only, and nothing in tended them: they sent for to Rome ten of their chief Peers, pretending to give them in charge what their pleasure was to have done. At that time the Latines had two Praetors or Provosts, L. Annus of Sapia and L. Numitius of Circia, both Roman Colonies. By whose means, besides Sapia and Vellere, being also Colonies of Rome, the Volscians were solicited likewise to take arms. And thought good it was, that those Latine Praetors by name, should be cited with the rest. No fore they went, and there declared how they were conveyed by the Senat of Rome, demanding their advice what answer to make as touching those matters, wherewith, as they supposed, they should be charged. When some were of this opinion, some of that: then Annus spake and said: "Although I myself have moved you to resolve upon an answer, yet I think it concerneth us more in our main estate, to determine what to do, than what to say. And when we are grown to a resolution once of our affairs, and what cometh to take, an case matter will it be to frame words fit for the purpose. For if even now already under a shadow and pretence of us to frame words fit for the purpose, we can abide and find in our hearts to endure bondage, what standeth in the way, but that having abandoned and betrayed the Sidicins, we be obedient not only to the Romans commandment, but also to the Samnites? and answer the Romans in these plaints, That at their beck only, and if they do but nod their head, we will presently lay down all arms? But if at length, the desire and longing after liberty do touch our hearts, and give an edge unto our spirits: if there be a league between us: and if confederacy ought to be nothing else but a society and equal fruition of liberty and privileges: if, I say, we may now glory and vaunt, whereof sometimes we were ashamed that we are of kin to the Romans, and of their blood: if they sometimes we are locating, by the addition whereof they redouble their forces, and which the Consuls in leaving or forsaking their proper wars, will not part and sever from their own: why is there not equality in all things else? Why is not one of the Consuls a Latine? why is there not equality in ces, there also is part of rule and command. And certainly even this in itself is not a matter of so great honour unto us as who have granted and confessed Rome to be the head of Latium: yet by long patience and continual sufferance only, we have brought to pass that it might seem honourable. But if ever ye wished to see the day wherein ye might participate in government and recover your liberties again, so that time is now come presented unto you by your own valour, and the gracious goodnes of the immortal gods. Tried their patience ye have in denying foultries: who doubt not but that they were in a great choler and angry at the heart, when we brake a custom of two hundred years prescription and above: yet nevertheless this grief have they put up and given us one foul word. We wared upon the Peligians in our own name and quarrel, and they, who aforesometimes allowed not us the liberty to mix as to defend our own marches of our selves, nothing gain said and crossed it, that the Sidicins were taken out our mercy and protection that the Campains revolted from them and sided with us, that we led an army against the Samnites their confederates: they heard and knew well enough, and yet they stirred not one forth of their City. How come they to be so calm and quiet, but upon a privacy and knowledge both of our puissance and of their own weakness? I am able to avouch by the report of men of good credit, that when the Samnites complained themselves of us, they had such an

"sweat again of the Senat of Rome that it plainly appeared that they themselves pretended not to require that Latium should be under the Roman Empire. Do ye but take upon you, and lay claim unto that which they secretly yield unto you yourselves and repose it at your pleasure. Now if any man be afraid to be the speaker, Lo here am I, who profess to be the man and to say thus much not only in the audience of the people and Senat of Rome, but also of Jupiter himself, who is resident in the Capitol namely, that if they will have us to be of the League and confederates, they shall admit from amongst one of the Consuls, yes, and a part of the Senat, As he with great spirit and boldness, not only advised this, but promised also thus to do; all that were present with a general applause and assent permitted him to do and say whatsoever he thought expedient for the common good of the Latine nation, according to that trust which they reposed in him. So soon as he was come to Rome (with other Embassadors) he was admitted into the Senat, and audience given him in the Capitol. Where when T. Manlius the Consul, by the authority and direction of the Senators, had dealt with him and the rest, not to make war upon the Samnites their confederates: Annus raging like a conqueror, as if he had won by force and arms the Capitol; and not as an Embassador, who was to deliver his mind and message safely, by the protection of the Law of Nations, began in this sort: "The time required (quoth he) now at length, O T. Manlius and ye Senators of Rome, not to treat and deal with us in any affairs by way of authority and commandment, namely, when you saw Latium by the favour of the gods to flourish exceedingly both in men and munition, as having subdued the Samnites, confederate with the Sidicins and Campanians, and now also combined with the Volscians: and besides, even your own Colonies and townships too, have made choice to submit themselves to the Latines rather than the Romans. But so much as you cannot find in your hearts of your selves, nor see how to make an end of your proud and outrageous Lordship and tyranny; We, albeit we are able to restore Latium unto her ancient freedom by force of arms, yet for kindred sake will be content to offer indifferent articles and equal conditions of peace, forasmuch as it hath pleased the immortal gods that we are equal unto you in power and puissance. Inprimis, there is no remedy now, but your two Consuls must be one a Roman, and the other a Latine: Item, that the number of Senators be elected as well out of the onenation as the other, Item, that we become one people incorporate, and one Common-wealth. And to the end that there may be one imperial fact, and one name of all, and therefore we or you must needs yield, we are content of Gods name (and to the good of both nations may it prove) that this City and State of yours be counted the better and more noble: and let us be called all by the name of Romans. By good hap it so fell out, that the Romans also had for their Consul T. Manlius to match him, one as stout and hot as the other: who could not contain his anger no longer, but openly said, "That if the Senators were so far overleer and besides themselves, as to take conditions of a Setine, he would come with his sword by his side into the Senate house, and what Latine soever he saw there in council, he would not fail but slay him with his own hand in the place. And therewith turning to the Image of Jupiter: Hearken (quoth he) O good god Jupiter, Hear this wickedness and indignity: hear O Justice and piety to Godward, Wilt thou abide to see, O Jupiter, in this thy holy and sacred temple, wilt thou endure, as taken captive and trodden under foot to see Consuls of M aliens & a Senat of forreiners? Are these the covenants, O ye Latines, which Tullus King of Rome made with the Albans your forefathers? or which L. Tarquinus after him, concluded with you? Remember ye not the battel at the lake Regillus? Have ye so forgotten indeed, both your own calamities and overthrow of old, and also the good turns and benefits received at our hands? When this speech of the Consul was seconded with the indignation also of the Senators, it is recorded, that when they called upon the gods, witnesses of those covenants, and reiterated their names oftentimes. Annus in mockery of those protestations, was over-heard to despise and scorn the power and godhead of the Roman Jupiter. But this is certain, that as he in heat of anger stepped hastily to the entry or porch of the temple, and went apace, he fell down the stairs, and so hurt his head that dashed against the bottom of the stairs, that he swooned withall, and lay for dead. But N albeit all writers agree not, that he yielded up his last breath thereupon, I also will leave it doubtful, as I find it: as also this, that in the very changing of him with breach of covenants, there poured down a tempestuous storm, with many mighty thunderclaps. For as these and such like things may be very true, so they may be prettily devised and invented on set purpose to represent & shew the wrath and vengeance of God. Torquatus being lent by the Senat to give the Embassadors their dispatch, seeing Annus there to lie along, cried out aloud, in the hearing both of the Senat and the people, and said, "No force, it is well, and as it should be; thus begin and bless, O ye immortal gods, our just and rightful war. Surely there is a God above, there is a power divine and deity in heaven, thou art no feigned and imaginary god. O mighty Jupiter & not in vain have I allowed thee in this place as the father both of gods and men. Why stay yethen, O Roman Quirites, ye likewise my LL. of the Senat, to take arms in the name of the gods, having them already as your liege to be your Leaders? I for my part shall soon go overthrow and lay the Legions of the Latines along on the earth, as ye now see their Embassador, lying here at the stairs foot. The words of the Consul, received with great applause of the people, animated and enkindled them in such sort, that had not the careful diligence of the Magistrates been more (who by commandment of the Consul accompanied the Embassadors as they went) than the ordinary life conduct of the Law of Nations, they had not escaped the rage and fury of the multitude.

A The Senat also gave their assent to this war, and the Consuls having levied two armies, and passed through the country of the Marians and Pelignians, and joyntly unto them the Samnites dy come together. There, as the report goeth, the Consuls both of them in their sleep had a vision: and there appeared unto them, one and the same shape of a man; personage much greater and more lately than the ordinary sort of men, who should deliver these words unto them, "That bute to the internal spirits, and to Mother Earth: and of the other the chief General only. And look of whether army the said sovereign General should devote and offer unto their internal spirits; and to Mother Earth, the Legions of the eneemies, and his own person withall, that part night-vision, it was thought good and agreed (for to divert and appease Gods anger) that certain sacrifices should be slain, and also if the same shewed in their inward, as appeared in their sleep, then one or other of the Consuls should fulfill the destinies, and accomplish fatal appointment, and settled already in their minds, then the Consuls calling together the Lieutenant Colonels to a Council, and openly declaring before them all the pleasure of the gods, (to the end, that they agree between themselves, that of whether side the Roman battallions began first to give back and retreat the Consul of that Army, should devote and betake himself to die for the people of Rome and the Quirites. It was debated also in that assembly, that if ever at any time before there had been war managed by severe rule and government, the military discipline should new be renewed and redoubled, for that they were to fight against the Latines, suting altogether to them in time, in these two armies soldier with soldier, Centurion with Centurion, Colonel with Colonel, under the same colours and ensigns. By reason whereof, to the end, that by no error the soldier should be mistaken or deceived, the Consuls made proclamation through the Camp, That no man should fight with his enemy out of his own rank, and place appointed unto him. It for as soon as the Consuls to discover the coats of horsemen, which were lent out every way of his Cornet and Troup, was passed above the eneemies Camps, near, as he was within an arrow's leading of Geminus Metus a Knight, both for birth, and also for his noble feats of arms highly esteemed in his country. He spying the Roman horse, and knowing the Consuls, advancing before them, and of especial mark above the rest (for all Noblemen and of quality were well enough known one to another.) What, will ye Romans (quoth he) with one Cornet of horse fight it with the Latines and their confederates? What shall your Consuls, what shall two Consul armies do the mean while? Marry (quoth Manlius) they will be here time enough for you, and with them more than all mens forces in the world. And we who at the pool Regillus I say, who only can do your bellies full, will here also quit our selves so, that never after ye shall have any great joy and pleasure to encounter and joyn battel with us again. With that, Geminus, riding forth as he was on horseback, a little from his company, Wilt thou then (quoth he) still that day come wherein me in the mean time; that by the proof and event of us twain, it may henceforth appear, how far the Latine men of arms, surpasses the Roman? The young man his blood and courage was soon up either upon anger and choler, or for very shame to refuse the combat, or be aule God F would to have it, and it was his destiny that could not be avoided. Forgetting therefore his single fight: wherein it skilled not much, whether he had the better or the worse, for as great odds thereby in the main trial of the quarrel. Thus when the rest of the horsemen of both parts the plain field that lay between, they ran their horses in full career one against the other, with sharp and deadly spear in rest. Manlius with his lance aloft did over and raised the Morion of his enemy, and Metus with his spear lightly touched, and passed by the horse's neck. Then having turned about their horses, Manlius came upon him first with a second charge, and to redoubled the push, that he thrust the others horse in between the ears. At the snort of which wound the horse reared and mounted with his forefeet, and with great force shaking his head cut his rider, at the throat, so that the spear-head came forth at his ribs, and nailed him fast to the ground. And having disarmed & despoiled him rode back to his own troop: and both together with exceeding joy, halted to the Camp, and so to the Generals Pavilion, even to his father: full little knowing his fatal destiny, and what was to befall unto him, whether he had deserved praise, or in reward danger of punishment. That all the world, quoth he, (O father) may be persuaded and report truly that I am descended indeed of your blood, and your undoubted son. Lo here I am, who being defied and challenged to fight man to man, have killed mine enemy a man of arms: see here the spoils of him slain are dead. Which is soon as the Col heard, presently he could not abide to look on his son but turned away, and by sound of trumpet, commanded the host to a public audience. Which being assembled in great number, Forasmuch (quoth he) as thou, T. Manlius, without regard of Colli, authority, or dread of thy fathers majesty and power over thee, against our Edict and express commandment, hast fought with the enemy, and that without thy rank and place; and as much as lay in thee, hast broken the discipline of war, whereby to this day the State of Rome hath stood maintained, and hast brought me thy father to this hard point, that I must forget either the Common-weal, or else mine own welfare, mine we will abide rather the punishment and smart for our own misdeeds, than the whole state, to her great prejudice and damage should pay for our folly and transgression. A fearful and dolorous example will we afford: but good & profitable to all youth for ever hereafter. As for me verily, both the inbred love and affection of all fathers to their children, and also this shew and proof of thy valour and knight-hood (although seduced with deceitful appearance and vain resemblance of honour) moved me not a little: but since that, either by thy death the Colli commands must be established, or by impunity thy disobedience for ever disannulled, I would not with thee to relapse (if there be any) of my blond in thee) but by thy punishment to reprove and set up again the military discipline which this day thy default is slain down and minate, Go ye hence, and bind him to a stake. At this so cruel a sentence, they were all amazed and in an ecstasy, that were present: and as if they had seen the edge bent against themselves, for fear more than for any modesty or reverence, they were quiet. So when they were come again to themselves, as if their spirits had been recovered after some deep impression of a wonder which had afflicted them, they stood still with silence, but so soon as the poor wretch his head was chopp'd off, and his blood seen to gush and spin out, then began they all of a sudden to speak freely and complain with open mouth, so as they forbore neither lamentations nor curses: they covered the youth his body with his own victorious spoils, they erected a funeral pile of wood over his corps without the trench and rampiers, set it on fire, and burnt him accordingly; and to wish as great love and affection as soldiers could shew, performed their last duty unto him, and solemnized his obsequies. Thus the commandments of Manlius were not only dreadful for the present, but gave an heavy and fearful precedent for the future to all sovereign Commanders of an Army. Howbeit, the rigour of this punishment made the soldiers more dutiful to their Captains and Leaders: and besides that, the rounds and sentinels, and the set corps de guard, were every where more carefully looked unto and observed: even in the very hazard and extremity also of the battle afterward, that austere severity did much good. For their fight was much like unto a civil war. So little, or nothing at all in a manner, differed the Latines from the Romans Common-wealth, but only in heart and courage.

Aforetime they used Roman long large shields, covering their whole bodies; but in process of time, after that they became Stipendiaries and to take pay, they bare shorter targets. And whereas aforetime they had their battalions thick and close together, like to the Macedonian Phalanges, afterwards they began to range their battel into bands more loosely and distinctly, and last of all, they were divided into thinner orders and squadrons: every light order or squadron contained threecore soldiers, two Centuries, and one Port ensign. The forefront of the vanguard were javelins called Hastati, in fifteen squadrons, distant some little way one from another: such a squadron had twenty soldiers lightly armed, and all the rest a sort of Targeteers, and those were called light-armed, who carried only a spear or javelin to fight with at hand, and other darts to lance from them aloof. This forefront contained the flower of youths, that grew up as apprentices to war-service. Then followed after them of stronger and riper age, as many bands or squadrons, which were called Principes: whom there followed hard at heels, thirty squadrons, all targeteers or shield-bearers, with brave armour above all others. And this battalion of thirty companies they called Antepilem (avant-darters) for that the other fifteen orders or bands were placed hard before the ensigns. And of these, every band consisted of three parts: and each of them they called Primum pilum, and it was composed of three banners or pannones: and every such banner contained 186 men. The first Pannone or banner conducted the Triarii, who were old soldiers of approved valour: the second, those that were called Rorarii, of less puissance both for age and prowess: the third, such as were named Accensi, who were of least account and trust, and therefore they were cast behind unto the tail of the battallion. When the Army was thus ordered in battel array into these bands & squadrons, the javelinsers formost of all began the fight: if they were not able to discomfit the enemies, than they with steady footing and soft pace retired back into the void places between the squadrons of the Principes, who received them: then began the Principes to enter into the battel and to maintain fight, and were seconded by the Hastati or Javelinsers. The Triarii remained standing all this while firmly, about their ensigns, setting on their left legs afore them at length, with their Targets on their shoulders, and their pikes or javelins sticking on the ground, with their heads somewhat bending forward, much like as if their battel were fortified with a Pallisado or rampier of pales and sharp flakes. Now if those Principes had not good success in fight, they retired themselves by little and little from the forefront to the Triarii. And hereby grew the proverb, that when a thing was at a dead lift and in distress they would say, We are come to the Triarii. Then the Triarii standing up right, so soon as they had received the Principes and Hastati, into the void place between their files, presently drew in their ranks

A ranks and files close together, and shut up as it were all waies of passage and entrance, and with ward the enemy. And this most of all feared and terrified the enemies, when thinking to these same increased in number.

Now were there commonly four Legions enrolled, consisting of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse to every legion. As many more were added unto them, and took, numbered out of the Latines, who at that time were enemies to the Romans, and had ordered their battel after the same manner in all respects. And they knew well enough that not only on each wing, another, if the arraeas were not broken, were to encounter, Two Principes or chief Centuries, there were amongst the Triarii in the one army and the other. The Romans, each side not to strong, well, howbeit a good soldier otherwise, skilful and of great experience, they did not to strong, be able at all times they had the same conduct and equal place of charge. The Roman not greatly trusting to his own strength, was permitted even at Rome by the Col, to draw unto him an auxiliary Centurion whom he would: who might protect and defend him late from an enemy that should have to deal with him hand to hand. And it happened that the young man by him elected, not far from the foot of the hill of Janus, in the very way that leadeth to the Capitol, was fought Centurion before they came into the field killed their beatis for sacrifice. The Roman Souldier (as it is reported) shewed to Decius the head of the Liver on the inner side wounded (as it were) and cut off: otherwise in all respects, his sacrifice was acceptable to the gods. As for Manlius he had as good signs of Gods favour in his, and all was might be. That is to wit, he was arranged as laid before they marched into the field, Manlius led the right wing, Decius the left. At the first they fought on both sides with equal forces and like courage and heat of blood. The Latines, retired to the Principes, in which trouble and fearful disorder Decius the Colli called aloud to Manlius. We have need of Gods help (quoth he) O Father, Where art thou, the public robe embroidered before called Prætexta, to cover his head, and to put forth his hand under his robe at his chin and landing upon his javelin, with both his feet, to pronounce these words: god, the gods Novensiles and Indigetes; ye gods (besides whose power extendeth over us, and our enemies) O Manes the infernal gods, you Invicti, you I worship and adore, your pious, I beseech and favour crave, that ye would prosper all power and victory unto the people of Rome, and Quirites, and put to fear, flight, and death the enemies of the people of Rome, and Quirites, and put words, for the weal public of the Quirites, the Arms, Legions and aids of the people of Rome, I take with me unto Manes the infernal spirits, and Invicti and Tellus, the Legions and aids of the Quirites, and with all speed to tell him, that his colleague was devoted for the army. Him self retired after a Gabine fashion, and aimed at all pieces, mounted on horseback and forde into the midst of his enemies. Of both armies he was seen to carry with him much more lately and venerable in rank, and chief from his own people upon the enemies. All terror and fear he carried with him, and afterwards entered within into the whole army. This was noted and seen most evidently, that with some untoward aspect and influence of a planet, but so soon as he was slain and over his corpse, his armor was mangled away and avoided. The cohorts of the Latines, out of their been discharged and freed from their religious fear and fumble of conscience, and as if they had fresh. For both the Rorarii advanced forward and ran among the ranks of the Antepilem, and thereby re-enforced the Hastati and Principes, and caused them to fight more stoutly; and the Triarii kneeling on their right knee, waited till the Col gave them token to arise. Afterward, in giving heed of the final end of his compulsion and of right as pious word, was compunged as well with plains and tears as with due praises to worthy and memorable death for a while done, relieved in heart and fresh, unto the last path of extremity, he biddeth the Triarii from the hind-places, forthwith the Latines, supposing the enemies had done like like raised their Triarii. Who so soon as they were compelled their points, and yet by meer force repulsed their enemies; thinking now all had been done.

and the victory achieved as being come as far as to the utmost skirts of the battalions: "Then, H" quoth the Consul to the Triarii, sit now fresh and lusty as ye are, against the wearied, mindful of your country, parents, wives and children, mindful of the Consul, who for your victory hath taken his death. The Triarii all hearty & unfeigned, were not so soon risen up, showing themselves in their bright and glittering armour, but there began on a sudden & unlooked for, a new skirmish and conflict. For they receiving the Antipiani between their files, set up a shout and outcry, troubled & disordered the Principes of the Latines, gored their faces with their javelins, flew the principal flower and strength of their best & foremost men and passed untouched in a manner through the other bands, as if they had been disarmed: yea, and brake through their pointed and close battalions, with so great a murder, that scarcely they left behind them a fourth part of their enemies I alive. The Samnites also under the foot of the hill, being seen a far off in battle array, smote a terror among the Latines. But among all either Citizens or Allies, the especial commendation of that service rested in the Consuls: of whom, the one turned all the threats and dangers from the gods both above and beneath upon himself alone; the other in that battle shewed such valour and policy, that it is confessed both of Romans and Latines, who have written of that journey and commended it to posterity, that of whether army T. Manlius had the conduct: that way doubtless would the victory go. The Latines after their defeat and flight retired to Minerva: their camp presently upon the battle was won, and many a man there surprised alive and cut in pieces, but the Campains especially. That day could not the corps of Decius be seen, for that the night came upon them as they fought for it: the morrow after it was found among a mighty company of slain enemies, overwhelmed with swords, darts and javelins: and with all honour and solemnity according to his death, performed by his brother Consul were his funerals.

This also amongst the rest, seemeth worth the remembrance and to be inserted in this place, namely, That it was lawful for Consul, Dictator, and Pretor, whensoever they sacrificed and went to the Devil the Legions of their enemies, for to vow and offer withal, not themselves in any case but any Citizen whom they would: provided always that he were one of the enrolled legion of the Romans. [And if the man who is thus added and destined to death, hap to die, all is well, and as it ought to be: But if he die not, then was the image of him seven foot high or above buried in the ground, and a purging or propitiatory sacrifice was slain in his stead: but wherefore it chanced that I made to be so interred, whether it was lawful for any Roman Magistrate to set foot and come. But if a man would needs offer and vow himself to death, as Decius did, and die not, he shall not purely perform any sacred duty, or do sacrifice, either for himself or the City, that hath once thus taken himself. If he will beguile and offer his armour to Vulcan, or to some saint whomsoever he listeth, it is permitted and lawful for him so to do, either by way of sacrifice or other offering as he pleaseth. As for the weapon or spear over which the Consul standing on both his feet, made his prayers and invocations, it is not lawful the enemy to seize thereon: but if he fortune to win the spear, a propitiatory sacrifice must be offered to appease Mars, to wit, a swine, a sheep, and a Bull. And albeit the records both of all divine and humane customs and traditions, make no mention hereof, and are now grown out of use and remembrance: by reason that we prefer new and foreign ceremonies, before the old ancient rites of our own country and ancestors, yet I thought not amiss to make report hereof, even in those very M words and terms as they were used, delivered, and pronounced.

In some writers I find, that the Samnites having waited to see the effect of this battle, came to aid the Romans when all was done and past. Also, that there was succour a coming from Lavinium unto the Latines, but not before they had the overthrow: by reason that they spent a great time in deliberation. And when as now the foremost enemies and some part of the army was gone forth of the gates, and news came of the defeat and slaughter of the Latines; as they turned their banners and returned into the City, it is said, that their Pretor or Provost, named M. Minius, spake these words, "That so small a way as they had gone, must cost them dear, and full sweetly would the Romans be paid therefore. Such as were remaining of the Latines after the battle, and were scattered asunder in many and divers waies, when they were rallied together, shrowded themselves for safety in the City Veio. Where, in their Councils and assemblies, Nunius their General, averred, and assured them, that Mars indeed was common, and the hazard indifferent to both parties, as having made an equal massacre in the one army and the other; and that the bare name only of victory went with the Romans: for otherwise, they carried away with them the fortune of men vanquished, and sped no better than they. For (saith he) The two royal pavilions of their Colours polluted and defiled: the one with the parricide of his own brother, the other for the death of the Col, who had vowed himself to die: all their forces in manner slain: their Javelineers and principals killed: a bloody slaughter committed both before and behind: the Standards: and only the Triarii at the last upshot renewed the fight and for all upright. And albeit (quoth he) the power of the Latines also be shrewdly abated, yet for a fresh supply, either Lavinium or Volsci are nearer than Rome. And therefore if they thought good, he would with all speed raise the lusty flower and chosen manhood both out of the Latines and the Volscians, and return again with a fresh army to Capua: and with his sudden coming unlooked for, surprise and defeat the Romans, expecting as then for nothing less, than a second battle. So by dispatching his careful and diligent letters into all parts of Lavinium and the Volscian nation (by reason that they who had not been present at the battle were sooner induced to give rash credit) there was a supplementary army in great hast levied, enrolled, and assembled together out of all quarters.

This

A This host as it marched, T. Manlius the Consul met at Tifernum: place between Senigallia and Adria. And before they could chide out a plot of ground to encamp in, they bestowed their carriage and baggage on heaps of either side: till to a battle presently and made a final and conclusive of all the war. For the enemies were brought to low that as the Consul led his victorious Army to waste their Country, all the Latines yielded themselves to him: and this their rendering the Campains likewise followed. Thus Lavinium and Capua forfeited and lost part of their Territories. The lands of the Latines with the Privernates laid thereto, and the Territory of Adria, which becomons of Rome. Two acres in the Latine Country, with a supplement of three fourth parts out of the Privernates land to make up the whole: and three acres in the Territory of Faleria, with addition of a fourth part to boot for amends, became it was so far off, were assigned to a man. The Laurens only, of all Lavinium, and the horizon of the Campains, escaped this punishment and with the Laurens should be renewed: and from that time whithersoever year is it renewed, after the tenth day of the Latine holidays. Those Campain horizons were made free citizens of Rome: and for a monument and memorial thereof, they set up and staid a brazen tube at Rome in the Temple of Castor. The people of Capua were enjoyed to pay yearly a brazen tube at Rome in the they were a thousand and six hundred in all) 45. Deniers.

Thus after the war fully determined, and both rewards dealt, and punishment inflicted according to each mans desert, T. Manlius returned home: whom the elders only, for certain, went forth to meet on the way: the youth, not only then, but ever after, during his life, adhered, and with curses detested him. The Antians made certain roads into the Territories of Hostia Antiana and Salerno. And for that Manlius the Consul was not able himself in person to intend and manage that war, by reason of sickness, he nominated for Dictator L. Papirius Cursor, who as it happened was at that time Pretor: by whom was named for General of the horsemen L. F. Papirius Cursor, who achieved no worthy and memorable exploit. After this year thus renowned for the victory of so many and so puissant nations, and wishal, for the noble and famous death of the Consul, and for the government of the other, albeit stern and rigorous, yet notable and renowned, there succeeded Consuls, T. Aemilius Mamercus, and Q. Publilius Philo, who met not with the own private business, and studious to maintain a tide and faction in the Common-wealth, than to advance the State of their Country. Howbeit, the Latines (who rebelled for anger that they lost their lands) they discomited in the plain of Fenestella, drove them both out of their Camp, and forced them to leave the field. Where, whiles Publilius (by whose governance and conduct that victory was achieved) received the surrender of the Latines, the flower of whose youth was there slain and killed up Aemilius led his Army against Pedum. As for the Pedans they had named Numius Antium. Where the Roman Consul, albeit he had the better hand in skirmish, yet for that there remained behind a new piece of service about the City it self Pedum, and the Camp of their Confederates which was adjoynd, close to the Town: all of a sudden he gave over the war unfinished, because he heard that triumph was decreed unto his brother Consul. He also himself returned to Rome, and called earnestly for triumph before victory. At which untimely and covetous desire of his, the Nobles being offended, denied statly: that unless he either forced P. Antium by assault, or won it by composition he should not triumph. Hereupon Aemilius being discontented and alienated from the Senat, bare his Consulship afterward like to the seditions Tribunes, for so long as he was Consul he ceased not to charge and accuse the Nobles before the people, and his Colleague no whit gainst him as being himself one of the Commoners. He took occasion of these accusations upon this, that the lands in the Latine and Falerne Countries, were divided in the time of the Consuls government, had decreed that a Dictator should be declared against the Latine rebels: Aemilius (whose turn it was at that time to govern) nominated his own companion in office to be Dictator, by whom Junius Brutus was named General of the horse. This Dictatorship was popular and altogether framed to the humour of the common people: both by reason of slandrous and accusatory Invectives made against the Nobles: and for that it enacted three Statutes, most favourable and pleasing to the Nobles: and for that it enacted bility: first, That the AEds devised and enacted by the Commons, should stand adverse to the Nobles or Citizens of Rome: secondly, That all laws which were proposed and to pass by the Quintus of the Centuries, before the scrutiny began, and their voices gathered, the Nobles should allow and approve: thirdly, That forasmuch as they were come thus far already, that both the Censity, inasmuch as the Nobles thought verily that there was more lost at home this year by their Consuls and Dictator, than gained to the Empire abroad, by their victories and warlike exploits.

In the year following when C. Furius Camillus and Q. Menius were Consuls, to the end that Aemilius the Consul of the former year, might be more notably reproached for the quitting and letting slip of a victory that should have been achieved in his year, the Senat began to mutter therefore a countermure and platforms and rolling frames, mounted against the walls: but as good hap was by an opportunity that fell out, they had no use of their munitions and fabrics: for M. Fabius a Roman prisoner, taking advantage of the negligence of his keepers upon a festival holiday, and making means to break his bonds, let himself down by a long cord, laid at one end to a pinacle or battlement of the wall, and slid by the arms, among the munitions and fabrics of the Romans: who so periwaded and prevailed with the General, that he caused him to give an assault upon the enemies, now being fast asleep, as having filled their bellies with wine and good meats. So that with as little ado as the Aulians and their City surpris'd, as they were alone vanquish'd in fight. A great booty of pilage was there got: and after a garrison placed at Cales, the Legions were brought back to Rome. The Consul by decree of the Senate triumph'd: and that Artidius should not be without his glory too, both Coiff, were appointed to lead forth an Army against the Sidians: but before they went, they appointed by a decree of the Senat, L. Aemilius M. Aemilius to be Dictator, to hold the election of Consuls. Who named Q. Publilius Philo for his General of horsemen.

In this Election holden by this Dictator, there were created Consuls, T. Veturius, and Sp. Postumius. Who albeit there remained some part behind of the Sidians war yet to the intent they might gratifie the Commons by some good turn, and prevent their longing before they spake themselves: propos'd an Act concerning the bringing of a Colony to Cales: and when as the Senate had ordain'd that two thousand and five hundred men should be enrolled and assign'd thither: they created Triumvirs for to bring them thither. and to divide the lands, namely, (also K) Duellius T. Quintus, and M. Fabius. After this, the new Consuls having received the army of the old, enter'd into the enemies confines waiting all before until they came to the very walls of their City. Now for that the Sidians had assembled a puissant army, and seem'd themselves fully resolute and bent upon utter despair to put all unto the last adventure, and to fight it out to the last man, Moreover because it was noised that all Sannium was risen up in arms: by authority from the Senat, the Consuls appointed P. Cornelius Ruffinus Dictator, and M. Antonius was nominated General of the horie. But hereupon grew again another fupple, that there was some error escap'd in the creation: so they reigned up their places, and because there ensued also a plague hereupon (as if all their Auspices for elections of Magistrates had been touch'd and infected with that error and default) the managing of all affairs fell to an Interregnum, Which being now enter'd L upon by the fifth Interregnum, M. Valerius Corvinus, then Consuls were created, L. Cornelius the second time and Cn. Domitius.

When all things else were at quiet, the rumour of the Gauls war was soife and hot that it was taken for a very Tumult. Whereupon it was thought good, that a Dictator should be created. And M. Papirius Crassus was nominated, who had P. P. Verus Publicola for General of the horsemen. When they had mustred the souldiers more strenghtly and with greater regard than would have been for war near hand, the souldiers who were lent out, brought word that all was well and quiet among the Gauls. But insuspect it was that Sannium now the second year was ready to drop out of their allegiance and seek a change. Whereupon the Roman army was not withdrawn out of the Sidians country. Howbeit the war of Alexander King of Epirus drew the Samnites into M the Lucians country, which two nations uniting their forces, gave the King a battle, as he made rodes from Pistia. In which conflict Alexander having got the upper hand, enter'd into a League and amity with the Romans: although it was much doubted with what faithfulness he would observe the same, if all his affairs prospered as well. The same year was a solemne Levy or Numbring of the people of Rome held: and the new Citizens were matriculated and enrolled. And therefore two Tribes were annexed. Mela and Capita: the Levies that ordain'd them were Publ. Philo and Sp. Postumius. The A. errans became Roman Citizens, by an Act propos'd by L. Papirius the Praetor: by vertue whereof they were enfranchis'd Denizens: but without the privilege of giving voices. There were the As for this year both at home and abroad.

The year next following (were it through the unkind diltemperature of the air, or by some wicked practice of man) was infamous when M. C. Iulius Marcellus and T. V. A. Aruns were Consuls, I find the surname of this Consul to vary in divers Chronicles. In some Fluccius, in others Patrus. But it matters not much whether be true, I rather trust I could willingly have wish'd (and yet all Authors do not record it) that it had been falsly recorded that those persons who by force and poison were made away, whose death hath defamed that year with the note of a peltence. But yet as the thing is left in writing, I purpose to deliver it. I left that I should seem to derogate ought from the credence of any writer. When as the chief personages of the City died upon like diseases, and after one and the same manner of symptoms a certain chamber-maid presented her self to Q. Fabius M. Aemilius (being for the time an Edict of State) and profess'd to bewray the cause of that public and contagious malady. I might be assur'd by faith: promise from him that by the utterance thereof, she should not come to harm nor trouble. Forthwith Fabius deliver'd the matter to the Consuls: and the Consuls made relation thereof to the Senat: by the consent of which State assurance was made accordingly unto the party aforesaid, to reveal the matter. Then she declared that by the lewd and mischievous wickedness of women the City was thus afflicted: and namely, That certain Dames of Rome, even their own wives, boiled and tempered rank poisons (to kill their husbands) and if they would follow it presently they might be taken in the manner. So they went straight waies with the wench, and found some women as they were

A seething and preparing venomous drugs; yea and some poysoned confections already put up. Which were brought into the market place, and about 20. of those dames, with whom the poysons were found, were sent for by a Sergeant. Two of them Conchus and Sergus, both noble widdowes and whollom for the body of man, were by the chamber-maid aforesaid confuted, and enjoyned to drink thereof, that they might displove her, and make her a liar, and to have devised that the people were avoided aside to make them way. Now when as in fight of all the World, these two Dames had propounded the matter to the rest there in place, they also refused not: and presently were their complies apprehended, they all perished by their own mischievous practise. Then their Wives: of which 170. were condemned, Never afore that day was there any inquisition nor process at Rome, about poysoning and forcery. So as the thing was taken for a prodigious wonder, and imputed rather to their minds, belov'd and bewitch'd, then to any felonious intent of theirs. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City, calling to mind and fear, hind the old Chronicles, departed the City, which was a spike or great nail driven and fixed by the Dictator: and that the ceremonial satisfaction, brought again in good time, and therefore it was thought good, that for the salting or sticking up of such a nail, there should a Dictator be created, So Cn. Quinctilius was nominated, who named L. Valerius General of horsemen, who so soon as the nail was fastned gave over their places.

Consuls then were created, L. Papirius Crassus the second time and L. Plautius Venus. In the beginning of which year, there came from the country of the Volcians as Embassadors to Rome, the Fabratens and Lucans, making request that they would take them into their protection, promising that if by them they were defend'd from the forces of the Samnites, they would become loyal and obedient subjects to the people of Rome: Then were Embassadors sent from the Senat, nations, Which embassage sped well and took place; not so much for that the Samnites desired peace, as because they were not as yet ready prepared for war. The same year began the Prison Verinus war. The confederates whereof, were the Fundans, and their Leader likewise a Fundan, at Rome. His dwelling house stood sometime in mount Palatine, even the very same, but also the building was pulled down, and the ground forfist and consecrate, was called Veneri Prati. A. Pirius went forth with a power, and routed near from his very camp, But Verinus neither had the wit to keep himself within his trench against a mightier enemy, nor yet the heart to encounter the gate of the camp, whiles the souldiers had more mind to flie backward, than march forward. And encounter the enemy: without either advice or confident courage he sought: and with as little ado, and without any question of the matter he was vanquish'd: so by reason of the shortness of the way, and the easie retire into the camp he found no great trouble to save his souldiers from much slaughter. For in the very conflict, few or none in a manner were slain, not many in the press of the rout and tail of the flight, at what time as they rushed into their tents to defend themselves within a wall rather than a trench. Plautius the other Coiff, having army into the Fundan country. The Senat of the Fundans also conducted his Coiff, having met him, saying: 4 They were not come as Orators to entreat either for Verinus, or for those that took his part: but for the people of the Fundans: who that they were innocent and not culpable for this war, Verinus himself hath plainly proved and declared, in that he chose Pravertum to be his place of retreat and refuge, and not the City Fundi, the very place of his nativity. And therefore at Pravertum in the enemies of the people of Rome were to be fought for, as the Romans. As for the Citizens of Fundi, they were at peace with Rome, nay, they were Romans in heart, and carried thankfull remembrance of a benefit received: they entreated therefore and besought the Consul to forbear hostility with a gentle people: assuring him that their Linds, their City, their own Bodies, their Wives and Children were and should be at the devotion of the people of Rome. The Consul after that he had commended the Fundans, and sent G letters to Rome that they remained firm and fast in their allegiance, turned his way to Trivernum, But before he dilodg'd (as Cludius wrothly) the Consul excus'd those that were the heads of the conspiracy, and thice hundred and fifty of those rebellious conspirators were sent prisoners to Fundan people, desirous to be excus'd and discharged, with the punishment of the needy and hie sort of people. Now when as Pravertum was besieged and invest'd with two Corniall Armies, the one of the Consuls was called home, to hold the Election of Magistrates. That year were erected in the great race called Circus, the Barriers from whence the horses and their charriots are.

he now being entered into Sannium, should be called away from the chief push of the war, he should nominate a Dictator to be President of the Election of Magistrates: Who named M. Claudius Marcellus, and by him was appointed for General of hostie Sp. Posthumus. Yet for all this, was no assembly for the said election, holden by the Dictator. For it came in question, Whether he were rightly created or no. And the Augurs being hereabout consulted with, pronounced, "That the Dictator seemed not created aright. But the Tribuns discredited and made suspicious, and infamous, by their accusatory speeches, this their sentence and declaration, saying, That neither it was ealie to know the fault and error in the creation, seeing that the Comiti nominated the Dictator in the beginning of the fill night, neither had the Consul written to any man publicly or privately thereof, nor yet was there any person could come forth and lay, that he either law or heard ought, that might mar and interrupt the Auspices, nor yet could the Augurs sitting at Rome, guess and divine, what error had hapned to the Consul in the camp to lay off. And who saw not (say they) that the Augurs found fault herewith, because the Dictator Elect, was a Commoner? These and other such allegations were (to no purpose) by the Tribuns given out. For the matter grew to an Interregne, and the forelaid Election being put off and adjourned for one cause or other; at length the fourteenth Interregent, L. Emilius created Consuls, C. Petilius, and L. Papirius, furnished Magillanus or Censor, as I find in other Chronicles.

In that year it was recorded, that the City Alexandria in Egypt was founded: and that Alexander the King of Epirus was murdered by a certain Lucan, a banished person, to verifie the Oracle of Jupiter Dodoneus, which had foretold his death. For when he was sent for into Italy by the Tarentins, he had warning given him, [To take heed of the Acherusian Waters, and the City Pandusia, for there it was his destiny to end his days:] and therefore, with more speed he passed over into Italy, to be as far off as might be, from the City Pandusia in Epirus, and the river Acheron; which issuing out of Molossis into the lower Meers and Lakes, dischargeth it self, and falleth into the Therapontic Gulf. Howbeit (as commonly it is seen when men seek molt to flee and avoid their fatal death, they run headlong and plunge themselves into it) he, having oftentimes vanquished and overthrowen the legions of the Brutians and Lucans; won by force Heraclea Colony of the Tarentines, and Consentia in Lucania, and Sipontum, and also Acerina a Colony of the Brutians, and other Cities afterwards of the Messapians and Lucans: sent into Epirus three hundred Noble houses and families, whom he meant to keep as hostages: he encamped not far from Pandusia, a City situate near to the Confines of the Lucans and Brutians. And there he held three his (some what distant asunder, from whence he might make excursions and rodes into every part of his enemies country: and he had in ordinary about him almost 200. banished men of the Lucans, for his sure trusty guard: who notwithstanding (as the natures are of such for the most part) changed with every wind, and carried mutable minds according to the variety of fortune. Now it fell out, that the continual rains which overflowed all the fields, had foreclosed and stopped the passages three ways between his armies, so as they could not help one another: whereby those two garrisons where the King was not in person, were surprized by the unexpected coming of the enemies: who having put them all to the sword, turned their whole forces to besiege the King. M From whence, there were by the Lucan exiles, messengers sent to their own countreimen: who in the name of the rest capitulated, that if they might be refreshed again, they would deliver the King either dead or alive into their hands. Howbeit he himself with an elect number of men, made a noble and hardy adventure, and brake through the midst of the enemies: and encountering the chief Commander of the Lucans hand to hand, killed him outright: and having rallied his men near together, who were scattered asunder in flight, he came at length to a river, which by the fresh ruins of a broken bridge, that the violence of that water had born down, shewed passage. Which as the army passed over at an unknown and blind foord, one soldier wearied with fear and travel, cursing and detesting the unlucky and abominable name of the River, forsook to say, Thou hast not thy name * Acheron for naught: which word when it came open to the King, his N ear, he presently began to think and muse of his final end: and there slayed still in a deep suspence whether he shall pass over or no. Then Saturnus, one of the Kings servants and liegemen, asked him why he lingered and made delay, being in to great a peril and jeopardy as he was? and flewed him withal, how the Lucans intended to play false with him, and sought opportunity to forelay and do him a mischief. With that the King looked behind him, and espied them afar off in a troop coming against him: whereupon he drew his sword, put his horse to it, took the River, and rode through the midst thereof; and when he was now so far passed that he was ready to take the land one of those banished Lucans launched a dart aloof at him, and thrust him quite through. Whereupon he fell down dead with the dart sticking in his body, and the stream carried it down as far as to the Corpe de guard of the enemies. Where his breathless corps was shamefully misused and mangled. For they having cut it cross the middle, sent the one half to * Consentia, and kept the other with themselves still, to practise a thousand villanies upon it. And as they slay and flung things it at afar off, a certain woman being amongst this outrageous multitude (saying beyond all measure of anger and malice that mans heart can devise or beleve) That her husband and children were prisoners, and in the hands of the enemies: but she hoped with the Kings body, howsoever it were abused and martyred, to redeem them again. This slayed them from farther mangling thereof: Thus all that was left of the Kings body, by the means of one only woman, was burnt at Consentia: and his bones sent back afterwards to his hither Olympus, and from thence conveyed to Epirus, unto Claypara his wife, and much concerning the woful and unhappy end of Alexander the King of * Epirus. Whole fortune albeit was such, that he came short, and was cut off before he intermed in the Roman war, yet became he warred in Italy, let it suffice that briefly by the way I have touched his story.

The same year was there a Lecliffment at Rome, (which was the first after the foundation and Building of that City) for the pacifying of the same gods as heretofore. Afterwards the new Consuls by the ordinance and direction of the people, sent defiance and proclaimed war against the Sannits. And as they themselves made greater preparation every way than against the Greeks for they had besides new aids, whereof (as then) they least thought of: The Lucans and the Aprians (nations which to that day had no dealing nor commerce at all with the Romans) became their liege and loyal Allies, offering men and munition toward that war. Whereupon they were by the Romans had good succels and received into their amity. At the time time also they became Masters thereof, for three towns: all there yielded unto them, first coming of the Consul, to wit, Alife, Calli, Rufinum: the other territory be des at the C achieved, the other enterprise also of besieging the Greeks, was well followed and at the point of an end. For over and besides, that by certain sences and blockades between the enemies forts and forces, one part was cut from the other; they endured also within their own walls, non-h more misery and calamity, than the enemy menaced and threatened with out-and-as if they had been suffered infinite villanies, and indignities in the persons as well of their wives as of their children, when it was noised abroad, that there were new succours coming from Tarentum and the Sannits: they supposed that for Sannits, there were already within their walls more of them than D the other, hoping by their means that they might as well withstand the outrages of the Sannits and Nolans, as the Romans their open and professed enemies. Last of all, of many inconveniences Charilaus and Nymphius two great men and the chief personages of the City, having laid their heads and plotted one with the other, to part the matter between themselves, that the one minister ready means to render the City according to their desire, to and some opportunity, and who presented himself unto Phile, and said unto him, "To the good and happy fortune be it said and done of the Palatopolitans and the people of Rome, I am determined to deliver and render the City into your hands: in which Action, whether I may be thought to have E "trayed or saved my country, it resteth only in the truth and fidelity of the Romans. As for my self privately, I am come neither to incite, nor yet to crave ought at all: but publicly in the behalf of the City, I would rather by way of petition request, than article and capitulate, thus "much, That if this enterprise intended, speed well and take effect, the people of Rome would "think and consider, in what affection, endeavour and jeopardy, our City returneth again into "their amity, rather than upon what folly and rashness, it brake their allegiance and revolted. Then, after he had been bidden welcome by the General, entertained with good and gracious words, and highly commended, he received 2000. soldiers, to keep, surprize, and to seize that quarter of the City, where the Sannits were lodged, and which they held: of this regiment and F garrison, I. Quintus a Colonel had the conduct. During this time, Nymphius also did his parts him to this point, That for as much as all forces, were either about Paleopolis, or in Sannius, he would permit him with the fleet to call about to the Roman coasts, for that he intended to force the better to deceive the enemy (quoth he) I had need to go by night, and therefore the Ships Sannits besides the necessary garrison of the City, was sent to the shoar. Where whilst Nymphius in the dark, and amongst the multitude that hindered one another purposefully spent time in before, was by his associates received into the City: and having filled the highest places of the town ken given them by their Captains, kept themselves still and quiet. The Nolans then, at the backside of the town, escaped and fled by the high way, that leadeth to Nola. And the Sannits being excluded out of the town, as they had a more readier mean to flee for the present, to they found it, after they were past danger, a more shameful disgrace. For, they were dismissed and naked men, they had left all the good they had amongst the enemies, and returned home spoiled, poor and needy and served for a laughing stock and derision, not only to other nations, but also to their own neighbors and countreimen. Albeit I am not ignorant that there is another opinion, when by it is given out that Palapolis was by the Samnites betrayed: yet as I have credited and followed herein such authors, as me thinks it were hard if they should not deliver a truth; for so I am induced the rather to believe that the Neapolitans returned into amity with the Romans, because of the league extant in their name (for unto them afterwards the State and chief part of the Greeks was translated.) Unto Publius was decreed a triumph, for that it appeared clearly and was believed constantly, that by his siege the enemies were tamed, and so contrived to come to a composition and surrender. Two special favours happened to this man above all others before him: namely the prorogation of his government not granted to any man afterwards and triumph after his Magistracy was expired.

Upon the tail of this war, arose another with the Greeks of the other tract or coast. For the Tarentines having born the Neapolitans in hand a good while, and fed them with a vain hope of help, when they heard once that the Romans were possessed of their City, complained themselves like men forsaken, and not as those who had forsaken others, much blaming the Neapolitans, and with anger and envying against the Romans. Disquieted also they were, for that news came that the Lucans and Apulians (for both these nations that year began to contract alliances) were under the protection of the Romans. For now (say they) they are well near come unto us, and shortly we shall grow to this pass, that we must acknowledge the Romans for our Lords, or have them our heavy friends. And verily the trial and hazard of our estate, dependeth only upon the Samnites war, and the event thereof, which is alone, and the same nothing mighty, remaineth now; since that the Lucans are gone and revolved to the Romans: who yet might be reclaimed and moved to shake off the society with the Romans, if any fear were wrought and practised to sow some discord and dissention between them. These devices and overtures took place and prevailed with such, as were desirous of change and novelty: in so much as certain of the Lucan youth (better known, than trusted and reputed honest, amongst their countrymen and fellow Citizens, hired also for a sum of money) whipped one another with rods, came naked into the assembly of the Citizens, and with open mouth cried out aloud and said, that for precluding only to come into the Roman camp, they were by the Coss, thus scourged, & escaped narrowly the losing of their heads. The thing it fell piteous and unseemly to behold, as bearing a shew rather of wrong done unto them, than of any malicious & subtil practice by them intended, stirred the people up, to force their Magistrates with their unseemly entreaties to assemble a Council. Some standing round about the Senat in counsel, call hard for war against the Romans: others run up and down to raise the multitude of Peasants to take arms and in this stir and uproar, which was able to disquiet and amaze even those that were best minded, a decree passed; that the league with Samnites should be renned, and Embassadors dispatched forthwith, to the same purpose. This was a sudden change: and as it had no colour of cause, so it carried little credit with it amongst the Samnites, who for the Lucanians to give hostages, and to take garisons into their fortresses: and they, blinded with anger, and moved with flattery, refused nothing. But shortly after began the fraud to appear and it was felt namely, after that the authors and devisers of these false promises and flanders, were retired to Tarentum: but having put themselves out of all and being not at liberty to dispose of their own affairs: they had nothing else left them, but like fools to repent in vain.

That year happened to the Commons of Rome another beginning of their liberty, in that they were no more either bound in chains, or held in thralldom by their creditors. Which privilege against poor debtors was altered, by occasion of the filthy lust and notorious cruelty of one Uluar. And Lucretius was the man unto whom C. Publilius for his fathers debt, became bound, and committed him to this prisoner: whose tender age and lovely face which might and should have moved pity, inflamed the mind of this lustful and shameful commonly for making full account, that the prime and flower of his youth should satisfy and pay for the interest of the debt, he first began to allure and entice unto him the youth with wanton & unchaste speeches: afterwards seeing that his ears absorbed to hear such filthiness, he led to minatory words, & ever and anon put him in mind of his present condition when he stood but half of all perceiving by him, that he stood more upon his honor and freedom by birth, then respected his hard estate by fortune, he caused him to be stripped naked and whipping near to be presented unto him. The poor stripping thus piteously rent and torn, ran forth into the open street, & complained of the filthy lust & cruelty of his creditor. Whereupon, a number of people, kindled as well with pity and commiseration of the stripping, and indignity of the injury, as also in regard of their own estate, and of their childrens care running into the Forum or common place, and so from thence in a long train to the court of the Council. The Consuls upon this sudden uproar were forced to call a Senat, and as the Senators entered into the Council chamber, they lay all prostrate at their feet: as they passed by, one after another & shewed unto them the young mans back and sides in what taking they were. And that one day by occasion of the outrageous enormity of one person, brake the neck of that mighty bond, whereby, to that day the creditors had their debtors in danger unto them. For the Consul, had in charge, to propose unto the people, that from thence forward, no person whatsoever, unless he had committed some heinous fact, and until he were first therefore, should be either kept in fetters and gages, or thrust upon the rack, Item, that for lent money, the goods of the debtor and not the body should be obliged. So that they that in bondage, became released and enlarged: and order was taken for the time to come, that none should be imprisoned by their creditors again.

The time year, whilst the Samnites war of it self alone, besides the sudden revolt of the Lucans, together

A together with the Tarentines the hatches thereof, held the Senators of Rome in care and perplexity enough: behold over and above all this, the Vettin people, as a forerunner to their troubles, joined and bonded with the Samnites. Which new occurrence as for that year it rather maintained this discourse amongst men in their ordinary talk every where, than diminished cause or interest second time, and Jun. Brutus Scaevola, thought no one thing more important than it, and needed not to be treated of in the Senat, with the first. And albeit the thing were but new, and the need, yet to greatly were the LL. hereabout troubled, that they feared no less to begin to take in hand, then to neglect it altogether, and not to see it: doubting, lest if they were left unquished, the war the rest for fear of the like measure, might be provoked to anger, take arms, and enter into a general rebellion. And all, and every one of them, namely, the Marians, the Pelignians and Mamucians, were inlets of arms comparable and equal to the Samnites every way which nations they never to little. Howbeit, that part prevailed and took place, which for the present seemed to carry more courage and valor, then sage advice and wisdom: but the ill use and end shewed, that Fortune favoured Fortitude. So the people by authority and direction of the Nobles decreed was, against the Vettins: the charge whereof light by lot upon Brutus, and Scaevola fell to Camillus. To both places were the armies conducted: and by the care and industry employed in the defence of the marches and frontiers the enemies were impeached: for joining their force together, howbeit the Consul Brutus Camillus, who had the greater and weightier charge laid upon him, for to nominate a Dictator, for to manage and conduct his affairs, declared the noblest warriors in a couple hardly of great name and highly renowned for their worthy acts, atchieved in this their felts between them; whereby they grew well near to the utmost terms of contending, one to overcome with like fortune and happy success. For he foraged and waited their country: and by piling, rising, and turning their houses and corn, forced them against their will into the shed of his own men) that his enemies not only fled into their camp (but not without blood now to their ramparts and trenches, they were constrained to steal away into their towns, mingling for to save themselves, as well by the natural situation of the places, as the strength of their good walls. In the end, he made thank upon those walled Cities, purposing by force to win them. And first he gained Armin, by skaling, either through the exceeding courage of his few soldiers, or their anger being so chafed as they were at their hurts received: for that first they overtopped the pillage of both Cities to his soldiers. Neither gates nor walls could stand in their way, and kept them out. But into Samnium the journey was undertaken by the Dictator with doubtful success and uncertain knowledge of the will of the gods. The default and terror which rose to him, effected rage and anger of the chief leaders, who fell out deadly one with another, for Appian the Dictator, advised by the Aspicius, that had the custody and charge of the sacred Pylae, went back to Rome to take the Aspicius (or the presage by the bird-flight) again: and straightly charged his General of horse to keep himself close within his hold, and in no wise to give the enemies battle during his absence. But Fabius after the Dictators departure, advertised by the signals that came, whether it were, that being a stout and lusty young Gentleman he took too room in Samnium, F an indignity, that although seem to rest in the Dictator only: or that he was imbrued with the good opportunity of doing some brave exploit (I wot not) but he was imbrued with the good of battle, for Fabius (that was the places name) & there fought a field with the Samnites, could not have been better managed. For neither Captain failed his soldiers, nor soldiers their dry times, nor ed and recharged again, and could not with force break the enemies array: much in have a kill, but a time made they all about over armour and men. The women to be of the charge of the horse, advanced the engines against the enemies that put in dismay: and given y then and men (by report) were that day slain. In some author I find, that twice in the residue of one battle. In some Chronicles, that the whole matter is passed over and let out alone. The General of the horse having gained mighty mauls of spoil, as otherwise he could not make, upon his great slaughter & mischief gathered together into one heap all the enemies armor made a fire of it, & burned them: were it that he had made some fish-vow to one of the gods: or (as I list rather to believe) it was a motive of Fabius himself, that the Dictator should not reap the fruit of his glory, and entice his name thereunto in pomp carry those spoils before him at his triumph.

The Oration
of Q. Fabius to his fellow soldiers.

Moreover, the letters of this victory by him sent to the Senat, and not a word thereof to the Dictator, were some proof, that he was not willing to impart and communicate his praises with him. But certainly, the Dictator took the matter in to ill part, that when every man else was joyful for this noble victory achieved, he only shewed anger and sadness in his very countenance. Whereupon suddenly he dissolved the Senat, and departed in great haile out of the court, giving out and often iterating these words; Then hath the matter of horsemen in deed as well exerted and overthrown, both Dictators Majesty and military discipline, as defeated the Samnits legions, if he can to go clear away and escape unpunished, with so manifest contempt of my express commandment. Whereupon, full of threats and indignation, he hatined to the camp, and I took long journeys: yet could he not prevent the bruit of his coming. For, there were Vant-errurs that potted from the City before, to bring word that the Dictator was coming, full of revenge, and set upon punishment, and at every second word almost, commending the late exemplary justice of T. Attilius. Then Fabius immediately calling an audience, beought the souldiers, that with what valour and vertue they had defended the Common-wealth from most deadly and mortal enemies, with the same they would protect him from the outrageous cruelty of the Dictator, himselfe (I say) by whose conduct and fortune they had gotten so glorious a victory. "For now," coming he is (quoth he) for envy out of his right wits, and beside himselfe for anger at another mans manhood and felicity, furious and horn-mad: and all is no more but this, that in his absence, forsooth, we have sped well; who witheth rather in his heart, if he could change the course of fortune, that the Samnits had won the victory than the Romans: and nothing is to K rise in his mouth, as, That his commandment was contemned: as who would say, he forbade not battel with the same mind, wherein he now grieveth that we have fought. For as then his will was good, even for very envy to hinder and suppress the prowess of another, and went about to take weapons away from most forward souldiers, desirous of fight, that in his absence they might not lay hand to their sword: to now, see how he fretteth and lumeth in great choler at this, that without L. Papius, the souldiers were not disarmed, dismembred as it were, and maimed: and for that Q. Fabius forgot not his place, but bare himself as General of the Cavalry, and not as a Servant and follower of the Dictator, standing at receit, and waiting at an inch when some under Captainship would fall, that he might step into the place. What would this man (think ye) have done, how would he have fretted, if (as the fortune and I doubtful chance of war oftentimes goeth) we had been put to the worse and lost the day; who now that the enemies be vanquished, the field is well fought, the State is well served, as by the most singular Captain in the world, better it might not be, thus menaceth execution to me the General of the horse, even in the honour of my conquest? Neither is he (my masters) cruelly bent and set upon mischief against the General of the horse more then against the Colonels, the Centiniers and common chiefes: nay, he would (be ye sure) if he had been able, have ragged and fared as bitterly, yea, and executed his ire and furious rage upon all. But because he cannot, now he dischargeth his gall upon me alone. For even as envy, like a flaming fire, leecheth and mouneth up to the height, to runneth he upon the chief Captain, and aimeth at the head of this worthy exploit. If he had once extinguished him, together with the glory of M. this brave service, then like a Conqueror and Lord over a poor captive army, whatsoever he might by law execute against a General of the Cavalry, he would attempt and extend, upon the simple souldiers. Make reckoning therefore, that in standing fast to me and in defence of my cause, ye uphold the liberty of all. For in case he shall perceive once, the same agreement of the army in the maintenance of the victory, which was well seen in the battel, and that ye all have a care and regard of the life and safety of one, his stomach will come down, his heart will relent and incline to clemency, and a milder sentence. To conclude, I recommend my life, and whole estate to your vertue and faithful protection. Then from all parts of the audience they cried into him aloud & bade him take a good heart: for so long as the Legions of the Romans were safe, there should no person do him harm or injury. Soon after came the Dictator, and presently N by found of trumpet summoned a general assembly. And the publick Crier after an Oriez made, called by name for Q. Fabius General of the horse. Who so soon as he was come from a lower place where he was, and approached neerer the Tribunal, (then quoth the Dictator) "I demand of thee Q. Fabius, since that the rule of the Dictator is sovereign and highest above all others; whereunto the Consuls, endowed with kingly puissance and government do obey, yea & Prators created with the same authority that Consuls are whether thou esteem it meet and right, that a General of horse should be obedient to his commandment or no? I demand likewise, whether I my self, knowing that I took my journey and went from home with doubtful and uncertain Assurance, ought to have put the mainstay of the Common-wealth in hazard against the order and religious observation in that behalf; and not rather, to go again to take new Auspices, that I might adventure & attempt nothing so long as I stood in doubt of the grace & favor of the gods? And withal, this I demand, whether the General of the horsemen could be freed exempt & discharged of that cruple of conscience, which checked and stayed the Dictator from execution of his charge? But what mean I to make these demands? seeing that if he had departed without saying one word, yet thou shouldst have framed thy opinion and applied thy mind according to the interpretation of my wil and pleasure? Why sayest thou nothing? Answer me I say. Forbid I thee not expressly to do any thing in my absence: Forbid I not thee to fight with the enemies? How us.

A "How dost thou in contempt of my commandment, whiles our Auspices were uncertain, "whiles our consciences were unresolved and with scruples troubled, against Military customs and statutes, against the discipline of our ancestors, and against the will and direction of the gods: how durst thou, I say, be so hardy as to encounter with the enemy? To thee interrogatories "make answer directly. Answer I charge thee, to all these points, and nothing but this, and at the peril of thy life, not a word besides. Now come Sergeant and do thine office the while. To which several Articles, when Fabius could not readily answer point by point, one while complaining that he had him for his accuser, who was the judge of his life and death: other whiles crying out aloud, that sooner might his life be taken from him, than the glory and honor of his Bactes: and as he justified and excused his own self, so he began again to challenge and accuse the Dictator. Then Papius being in more heat of choler than before, commanded the General of the horsemen to be stripped out of his cloaths and uncaked, and the rods and axes to be brought forth ready. With that, Fabius calling earnestly for the help of the souldiers, wishes the officers were a tearing and renting his cloaths from his back, made means to retire himself into the ranks of the T. Attilius, who began already to make a mutiny and uproar in the assembly. From whence there arose an outcry over all the audience. Some were heard to intreat, others to threaten, the Dictator they might be known and noted, beought his Majesty to spare and pardon the General of the horse, and not with him to condemn the whole army. They that were latest off out upon such a rigorous and merchiefs Dictator. And a little thing more would have made them mutiny: nay, within the very compasses of the Tribunal all was not clear and quiet. The Lieutenant of the matter until the morrow: to give his choler some time to cool, and allow space and respite to consider of it with advice and counsel: saying, "That if Fabius had plaid a youthful part enough. Besides, heing him not to proceed to the extremities of utmost execution nor to let fall such a brand and note of ignominy and shame upon the young Gentlemen himselfe, so rare and gallant a Knight: or on his father, a most honourable and excellent personage, nor yet upon the D noble house and name of the Fabii. But when they saw how little they prevailed by their prayers, and as little by any reasons they could allege; then, they admonished him to have a redom, thus to put more fire to the hot stomach of Souldiers enkindled already, nor to administer more matter of mutiny: and if such a thing should happen, no man would impute the blame to Q. Fabius, who fought and humbly craved pardon of punishment, but to the Dictator: if he overcame with choler, should blindly so far pass himselfe in wilful peevishness, as to provoke the outrageous multitude against himselfe. Finally, that he should not think, how they libelled thus for any affectionate favour they bare to Q. Fabius: but were ready to take an oath, that they thought it not late for the State and Common-wealth that he should proceed at such a time, E to execute the rigor of Justice upon Q. Fabius. By these and such like remonstrances, when as his mood against Fabius they were commanded to go down from the Tribunal. And when as the Crier had assaid to make silence all in vain, for that by reason of the noise and tumult, neither the Dictator his voice nor any of his apparitors and halberds about him, could be heard, the night came upon them and ended the contention, as it had been a battel in field. The General of the horse was commanded to appear on the morrow. Now when as every man gave it out and avowments, and that the more he was dealt withal the worse he was: Fabius privily stole out of the camp and fled to Rome. And by the means of his father M. Fabius, a man who had been already F the Chief Consul and Dictator, the Senat was called together immediately. And as he was in the midst of a sudden, there was heard before the Council House door, a great noise and hurrying of the Dictator, whiles they made way and voided the prels, and no marvel: for the Dictator himselfe was come with a revenging mind. For so soon as he had heard how Fabius was departed out of the camp, he followed after with his light horsemen. Then began the bell to be rung aloud, body of the Senat began to enterpole themselves by way of mediation: but all their intreaty notwithstanding, he persisted still in his implacable anger. Then slept forth M. Fabius the father, F G as much as (quoth he) neither the authority of the Senat nor mine old age whom you seek to make children, nor yet the valor & noble courage of the General of horse by your own self chosen and nominated, can prevail; nor any humble prayers which are able to appease the fury of the enemy: my oftentimes yea, and to pacify the wrath and indignation of the gods: I implore the lawful help of the Tribuns and to the whole body of the people I appeal. And since that you challenge and except against the judgement of your own army, and of the Senat, I offer and give unto you that judge, who only is of more force and puissance, I am sure, than your Dictator selfe. I will see, whether you will yield to this appeal, whereunto the Roman King Tull. Hostilius give place. Then out of the Council house they went straight to the Common place of audience: and unto the sick soldiers, recommending their care unto them particularly by name. This being a thing in itself popular, he handled and ordered with such dexterity: that by curing their bodies, their minds also and hearts were much sooner gained and reconciled to their General. And nothing made more for the speedy recovery of their health, than their thankful acceptance of that care and diligence of his. When he had thus refreshed and repaired his army, he encountered once again the enemy with assured hope of himself and his soldiers, to obtain a final victory; and so dismissed and put them to flight, that the Samnites after that day, durst never fight again with the Dictator. Then the victorious army marched, as any hope of booty and pillage guided and directed them: and as they overran their enemies country, they found no force nor resistance, either in open host, or covert ambush. This also encouraged them the more, and cheered their hearts, for that the Dictator had by proclamation given away the whole spoil among the soldiers: so that their privat gain whet them on against their enemy, no less then the common anger and publick quarrel. The Samnites tamed and subdued by these losses and overthrows, sued to the Dictator for peace: with whom they capitulated, and made offer to allow unto every soldier one livery, and the full wages of one year. But being commanded to go to the Senat, they made answer, That they would accompany the Dictator, recommending and putting their cause and whole estate to his faithful protection, to his virtue and goodness only. Thus the Army was withdrawn from the Samnites, the Dictator with triumph entered the City: and when he would have resigned up the Dictatorship, the Senat ordained, That before he gave over, he should create Consuls, So, C. Sulpicius Longus the second time, and Q. Emilius Cereanus were elected.

The Samnites not having concluded peace, (for that they varied about the conditions, and were to treat farther thereupon) yet brought with them from the City of Rome, true for a year, which they observed not faithfully: so soon were their stomachs up again to make war after they had intelligence, that Papirius was out of government, Whiles C. Sulpicius, and Q. Emilius (or Aulus as some Chronicles have) were Consuls, besides the reviving of the Samnites, there arose a new war also from the Apulians. Both ways there was a power sent, Sulpicius his lot was to go against the Samnites, and Emilius against the Apulians. Some write, that upon the Apulians themselves no war was made, but contrariwise, that the confederate States of that Nation were defended from the violence and wrongs of the Samnites. Howbeit, the low estate of the Samnites at that time, hardly able to maintain and defend themselves, maketh it more likely and credible, that the Apulians, were not warred upon by them, but that the Romans made war with both Nations at once. But no memorable act or exploit was there performed: only the Apulian country, and Sannium was wasted: and the enemies no where at all to be found, but at Rome there hapned a scare by night, which raised every man so suddenly out of their first sleep, and so affrighted the City, that presently at one instant the Capitol and the Castle, the Walls and Gates were full of armed men. And when as from all places there was running, and crying alarm, the morrow morning at the break of day, there appeared neither author, nor cause of this fear.

The same year the Tuscians were judicially convened before the people of Rome by process, and that by a law that Flavius preferred. This M. Flavius, Tribune of the Commons, exhibited M a bill of Encliment to the people that some punishment might be inflicted upon the Tuscians: For that through their assistance and Counsel, the Veliterns and Privernats had taken arms against the people of Rome. The Tuscians with their wives and children resorted to Rome. Which multitude having changed their apparel, and clad in poor array and habit, as prisoners at the bar, went about from Tribe to Tribe, falling down upon their knees to every man. Whereupon pity prevailed more to obtain pardon of punishment, then the goodness of their cause to the purging of their guilt. So all the Tribes except Pollia, dismissed and made void the Encliment aforesaid. But the sentence of the Tribe Pollia was, That as many as were of age and undergrown, to wit, fourteen year old and upward, should be scourged and put to death, Item, that their wives and children, by martial law, should be sold in open port-sale. And for certain it is reported, that the Tuscians took to deep an anger against the authors of so hard a censure and cruel doom, that they have carried it in mind even to our fathers days. For in despite thereof no Candidate, or Competitor for an office of the Tribe Pollia, was ever wont to get the voices of the Tribe Papiria. The year following, whiles Q. Fabius and L. Fabius were Consuls, A. Cornelius Arvins Dictator, and M. Fabius Ambrosius General of horse, having taken a straighter levy of soldiers then ordinary, for fear of a greater war in Sannium (for it was reported that the whole manhood and flower of the youth were taken up and waged out of the countries adjoining) led forth a goodly and puissant army against the Samnites. But they pitched their camp so carelessly in the enemies ground, as if the enemy had been far off: and the Samnit legions came on a sudden so proudly, that they set forward the trench and rampart, and encamped close to the Corpo O de gard of the Romans. Howbeit the night approached so fast, that they were hindered for saying the Camp: but they gave it out plainly, they would do it the morrow after by day light. The Dictator seeing that he must fight neerer than he expected or hoped; for fear lest the straightness and disadvantage of the ground, might prejudice and hinder the valour of his soldiers, leaving fires thick burning in the camp, for to disappoint the sight of the enemies, in the still night with silence leadeth forth his legions: but yet could he not for the nearness of their camp escape, but be criped of them. The horsemen forthwith followed upon them in the tail, and

A and pressed hard upon the army in their march, yet in such sort, that before it was day, they would not fight, nay, the very footmen were not all issued out of the camp before day light. At length when it was broad day, the Horsemen adventured to charge upon the Romans and partly by playing upon the tail of the hindmost, and partly by skirmishing in places that were hard to be passed over, they hindered their march and kept them behind. In the mean while their Infantry also overtook the Cavalry, so as now the Samnites with all their forces came upon them. The Dictator seeing he could not go farther without his great loss and disadvantage, commanded his men to fortify even in that very place where he stood: but forasmuch as the light Horsemen of his enemies were overtopped all about, they could not possibly go to provide stakes to make a parapet or rampier, nor begin to call a trench. When he perceived therefore that he neither could go forward, nor stay and fortify, he removed all his baggage out of the ranges, and let his men in this most of all hearted and encouraged them, were not behind either in courage or in forces. But the enemies retreat was the disadvantage and for that they being ignorant that the occasion of upon fear; and therefore they in terrible manner followed after them, as if the Romans had fled the Samnites now a long time had not been used to abide somewhat as the first shout of the Roman army when they give the charge. But verily that day, from the third hour unto the eighth, it is said that the battal flood to equal and indifferent. That neither the shout and cry was redoubled, nor heard the second time, after it was once let up at the first buckling: nor the engines were set forward, or withdrawn backward, but remained where they first were: nor the engines were set with his shield, without breathing or looking back, still fought a-front: the same noise, one resolution to die or fight it out, and not to give over before utter weariness or dark night. Now began the strength of men to fail, now the spear point and edge of the sword, began to turn and whittle what time all at once the Samnites Horsemen, hearing that the carriages of the Romans with one fear reported to the Dictator: Let them alone (quoth he) let them remember themselves with and carried clean away. Whereupon he sent for the General of Horsemen See ye not (quoth he) O M. Fabius, the battal abandoned of our enemies Cavalry? They stand still and are encumbered usually hapneth to any multitude busy in pillage) find them you shall (no doubt) few on horseback, and as slow with weapon in hand: and whiles they are loading their Horses with spoil, will let me alone with the charge of the legions and footmen: have you the honour of the Horsemen service. Then the Cavalry ranged into a Squadron, as exquisitely and skillfully as possibly down, and making a miserable massacre of them in every place. For being (as they were) among packs and fardels which they cast from them suddenly, and now lay against their feet to stumble on as they fled, and in the Horses way, that were amazed and afraid, they were not able well, and whelmed all come to naught, then M. Fabius wheeling about his wings of Horsemen, to fetch a compass, set upon the Infantry at their backs: Whereupon arose a new fearful cry, which caused the hearts of the Samnites to tremble and quake. The Dictator withal, seeing the foremost of the enemies fighting in the front, looking back ever and anon, their engines out of order and all their battalions waving and sloping to and fro; called hard upon his soldiers, and exhorted them to re-engage and renew the battal again with him. Thus with a fresh and new shout, they advance the Standards, and set forward the engines: and the farther they march on, the more perceived they the enemies to be troubled, and induray. And now by this time, the Horsemen also were within the sight of the foremost in the vanguard: and now by this time, the Horsemen bands and companies of his footmen, making sign with hand and voice as well as he could, shewed and made demonstration unto them, that they saw the colours and targets of their own fellow Horsemen. Which when they once heard, and saw withal: presently as if they had forgot the barrel which they endured almost a whole day, and felt no smart of their wounds, they beset themselves against the enemy as lustily, as if they had newly come out of their tents, fresh G and in heat, and seen but now the signal, and heard the found of trumpet, to a battal. Now were the Samnites no longer able to sustain the terror of the Horsemen behind, and the violence of the footmen before: but were either slain in the mids between, or stricken about in flight. Such as stayed and were environed about, the footmen slew: those who fled, were trodden under the Horse feet and killed: among whom, the General himself left his body on the earth. This battal above all other: so quelled and daunted the hearts of the Samnites, and smothered their forces, that in all their Diets and Councils they muttered and gave out, That it was no marvel that they

direct them, nor an apical to discover the coasts: but like beasts were driven blinded into a trap or pitfall: and one looked upon another beholding the armor that within a while they were to deliver up, viewing their right hands, which anon should be unarmed, their naked bodies exposed to the mercy and devotion of the enemy. They felt before their eyes, the gallows prepared by the enemy for them to pass under, the cornes and reproachful taunts of the Victor, his proud and disdainful looks, and how they (disarmed) should pass in a long train and go through the armed enemies: then afterwards, the piteous spectacle of the way which they must go, and the shameful dismarch of their disgraced army: briefly, their foul and dishonourable return through the Cities of their allies unto their country and parents, whither they themselves and their ancestors oftentimes had gone in triumph. They were the only men, which without wound, without dint of weapon, without battle fought, were discomfited and vanquished: who might not so much as draw their sword, and never came to joy or encounter with their enemy; having armour, having strength of lim, having hearts given them in vain. As they brayed out with great discontentment and anguish, these words, the fatal hour of their reproach and shame was come; which by proof and sensible experience, was to make all matters more heavy and woful, than they conceived and imagined in their minds aforehand. First and foremost were they commanded all, to go forth without the trench disarmed, and in their single garments: then were the hostages presently delivered, and had to ward: after this, were the Sergeants and Officers willed to depart from the Consuls: whose rich coats of arms, when they were plucked from their shoulders, moved such pity and compassion even in them, who a while before with all cursing and banning, judged them worthy to be delivered bound hand and foot into their enemies hands, for to be mangled despiteously and cut in pieces: that every man forgetting his own estate, wherein he stood, turned away his eyes as it were from an abominable spectacle, and could not endure to behold that disgracing and disgraging of so great state and Majesty. The first that were put under the gallows, were the Coss, well-near half naked: and according to their degree and place, so was every one in order put to the shame: and afterward, the legions one after another. The enemies in their armor stood all the while about them, scornful, mocking, and making a game of them: many had swords and daggers set against their hearts, in menacing wise, some were hurt and stabbed to death: namely, such as with their countenance and grim looks above the rest, for the indignity of these things, offended the conqueror. Thus were they sent with shame enough under the gallows, and (that which was more grievous than the thing) even in the sight and view of their enemies, they were not so soon got out of the forest: but although they seemed but then as plucked out of dark hell to see the day, yet the very light itself was worse than all kind of deaths, when they beheld so illfavoured an army and uncleanly. And therefore, albeit they might have reached to Capua before night, yet being doubtful of the faithfulness and protection of their allies, or else dismayed for very shame, they cast their poor and silly bodies upon the ground, about the high ways not far from Capua. Whereof, when news came to Capua, the just and due pity which they took of their allies, overcame the inbred arrogance and pride of that people by kind, immediately they sent unto the Coss, the ensigns and ornaments belonging to their place of authority, the Dictors and Sergeants with their rods, they sent armor and Horses, apparel and victual also for the soldiers bountifully: and as they came near to Capua, the whole Senat and people went out to meet them, and performed all duties of kindness and hospitality, both private and publick, that could be devised, and as meet was and requisite. And yet neither the courteous usage, nor the pleasant countenances and lightsome speeches of their allies, could draw from them any words, no, nor so much as make them to hold up their heads and eyes, and to look again upon their friends, when they yielded them all these comforts they could. So as, besides their grief and sorrow of heart, a certain baseness and shame forced them to shun all communication and conversing with men. The morrow after, when as certain young Gentlemen of the Nobility were returned, who had been sent in convoy from Capua, to accompany them and bring them to their way, as far as their liberties and confines: they were sent for into the Senat-house, and being demanded by the ancients and elders, what news they reported, that they seemed unto them much more heavy and cast down than before, so silent and in manner dumb, they marched along: that noble mind and courage of the Romans was now mute and dumb, their hearts clean done and gone together with their armor, not able to greet again, no, not to give a word to those that saluted them, not one of them for fear able to open his mouth, as if still they bare that yoke and gallows upon their necks, under which they went. That the Samnites had indeed not only a brave victory, but also a perpetual over them, and the hand of them for ever; and had now won not Rome, as the Gauls aforetime, but also (which was a more hardy and warlike exploit) had conquered the Romans courage, stoutness, and valour. As these news were reported, and audience given thereto, with such assent, that every man lamented now the Roman name, as desperate; and concluded generally it was in the counsel of these their faithful confederates, that they were past recovery: one Offilius Calpurnius, the son of Offilius, a man right nobly born, renowned for his valiant Acts, and besides, very grave and reverend for his age, spake by report in this manner and said, That he took the matter far otherwise than they all did: for that stubborn and resolute silence, (qd, he) tho' eyes fastened to wittily on the earth, those deaf ears to admit all solace and comfort, that shame of theirs to look up and behold the light, were expels and certain tokens of them that rolled and rolled from the very root and bottom of their heart, a huge heap and mass of anger & despite. Either (qd, he) I know not the nature of the Romans, or else that stillness & silence will

A will shortly cost the Samnites, woful cries and doleful groans: and the remembrance of this Caudine accord, will be more heavy and dolorous a good deal to the Samnites than to the Romans: for, as for them, they will ever find their hearts and courages again, wheresoever they shall hap to encounter: but the Samnites shall not meet every where with the Caudine straight for their purpose. And now by this time was this shameful overthrow and disgrace known at Rome. Intelligence with news more heavy and sorrowful for that ignominious peace, than for any peril and danger they heard, that they had so shamefully yielded themselves, all that preparation of aid and succor was discharged and sent away: and presently without any order from publick authority, they gave themselves every one to all manner of mourning and lamentation. The shops all about the market place were shut up. A general vacation began of it self, and pleading in all courts ceased, before Proclamation made: the purple and scarlet robes were left off, the golden rings laid away, they angry and offended with the Captains only, with the authors of the peace, with the cautious and lucteties for the same; but hated also the guiltless soldiers, denying flatly, that they were worthy to be received into City or house. Which heat of stomack and wrathful indignation, the first arrival of the army, utterly allayed: which even to angry persons was pitiful and lamentable. C But like captives in habit and countenance; they entered late into the Town, and hid their heads, every man within own house: so as the morrow after, for certain dayes following, none of them would come into the market place, nor put his head out at doors to look into the streets. The Consuls likewise for their part, kept in, as private men, and would exercise no function pertaining to their charge, but only that which they were forced unto by an Act of the Senat: as Fabius Ambulstus for Dictator, and P. Aelius Paetus, General of Horse, who being wrong created, and without the approbation of the Auspices, were chosen in their room, M. Aemilius Pappus for Dictator, and L. Valerius Flaccus General of the Horsemen, and yet by them was created the assembly holden for the Election above said. And for almost, as the people were even weary D again of all that years Magistrats, as unlucky and unfortunate, as the people were even weary So Interregents there were, Q. Fabius Maximus, and M. Valerius Corvinus, who created Contending of the City, for that in those dayes there were not two more noble and renowned Captains to be found.

These same day they were created, they entered their Magistracy (for so the LL. of the Council had decreed:) and after certain solemn and ordinary acts of the Senat passed, they went in hand to consult about the treaty of the Caudine peace. And Publius, whose countie it was then to have the sovereignty of rule; "Speak (quoth he) Sp. Posthumius, to the matter propounded, "and let us hear your opinion, and what you can say. Who after he was risen and stood up, "with the very same countenance and cheer that he went under the gallows, I am not, (quoth he) "O ye Consuls, ignorant, that I am first called forth, not for honour, but to my disgrace; and "for an unfortunate war administrated, and a shameful peace concluded. Howbeit, seeing that "ye have not propounded and touched ought, concerning either our treasurs or our punishment, "setting apart all kind of excuse and defence, which would be no very hard matter to maintain, "before men that are not ignorant of humane fortune, and of necessities, whereto men may be "driven: I will in brief deliver my mind concerning that, which you have moved and propounded, "ded, which sentence of mine may sufficiently witness and testify whether I mean to spare mine "own life, or save your legions, when as I became bound to that dishonest or necessary stipulation and promise, call it whether ye will. And yet, seeing it was made without the peoples pri- "vity and grant, the State of Rome is not obliged thereto, and thereby nothing due to the Sam- "nites, but only our bare bodies. Let us therefore be rendered by the hands of the Feciales and "Heralds, in our shirts, and fast bound: let us deliver and rid the people of all trouble and "of conscience, if we have entangled them with any; that there be no let in Law of God or man, "but that both justly and lawfully ye may begin the war anew. In the mean while my mind and "advice is, that the Consuls levy, enrol, arme, and lead forth an army: but not to enter within "the enemies marches, before all things duly belonging to the delivery of us into their hands, "be fully accomplished. Now, I pray and beseech ye, O immortal Gods, that seeing it was nos "your good will and pleasure, that Sp. Posthumius and T. Volumnius, Samnites, should with fortune "conduct fight against the Samnites, yet ye would be satisfied herewith. That ye beheld us put in "ye now view us naked and delivered bound into the enemies hands ready to receive upon our "heads even with the loss of our lives, all their anger, malice, and delight, and that it would please "you, that the new Consuls and Legions of the Romans, may in that sort war with the Samnites, "as evermore the wars before us Consuls have been conducted, managed and performed. When "he had spoken these words, all men both so wondered at this man and pitied him too, that one "while they would not believe he was the same Sp. Posthumius, who had moved and persuaded so foul and dishonest a treaty of peace: otherwhiles they lamented that so brave and noble a personage should suffer any especial torment above other, at the enemies hands, for anger and despite of revering and breach of that accord. When as now they all alter inglorious praises to the man, condescended to his opinion: the Tribuns of the Com. L. Livius and Q. M. Livius, attempted for a while to oppose themselves against this proceeding: saying, "That neither the people could be acquit and absolved in conscience, by their delivery, unless every thing were again restored to the Samnites, in the same estate wherein they stood at Candium; nor they themselves (in that they subscribed and became bound for the accord of peace, to save the hoit of the people of Rome) had deserved any punishment: nor yet, last of all, ought they being sacred Magistrates and inviolable, to be yielded to the enemies, and exposed to any outrage and violence. Then (quoth Postumus) in the mean while deliver us up that are but lay and profane men, whom with safe conscience and without offence ye may. And as for these, to sacro-saint as they now be, ye shall hereafter render them likewise to soon as they are out of their charge. But it will be ruled by me, let them before they be thus yielded, here in this common Hall be whipped and scourged, for the injury and interest of their punishment, which they would seem to defer and put off to long. For whereas they alledge and say, That by the delivery and yielding of us, the peoples consciences cannot be cleared and absolved; who is to ignorant in the Feciales and Heralds law, that knoweth not that these men spake this, for this end rather, that they themselves might not be rendered, than for that the truth requireth so. Neither do I deny my Lords, that bare promises and stipulations are unviolable. and to be kept as well as covenants and obligations with those men, among whom both Religion to Godward, and faithfulness to men is in regard and estimation: but I deny again, that without the peoples assent and grant, any thing can be established good and effectual, to bind the people therunto. What! if the Samnites, in the same pride and insolency, wherein they ostruded and forced upon us this stipulation, yea, and wrung it from us, would also have urged us to utter and speak, the solemn form of words, which they use to do that surrender up Cities: would ye (my Masters that are Tribuns) infer and lay, that by virtue thereof the people of Rome is surrendered into their hands? and that this City, with the Temples, Chappels, Limits and Waters, by strength thereof, are the Samnites possession? Well, I let pass to speak of deduction: because the matter in question is touching only a stipulation. What, I pray you, if we had promised and undertook, that the people of Rome should forsake and abandon this City? or let fire on it? or not have Magistrates, Senat, or laws any longer? or to be governed again by Kings? God forbid and deny that, say you, Well, it is not the indignity of things, that ease the bond of stipulation. If there be any one case, wherein the people may be obliged then in truth may they be in all as well: neither skilleth it any whits, (whereat haply some will make a play, and think it is material) whether Consul, Dictator, or Pretor, enter into bond and become surety. And even this was, that the Samnites themselves judged to be, and stood upon: thinking it not sufficient, that the Consuls became bound, but they put the Lieutenants, the Treasurers, and the Colonies there, to the same. And now, let no man demand of me, why I entered to into stipulation, being a thing not incident to the Consul his charge and right, neither was I to undertake unto them peace, which was not in my power to effect: nor in your name to promise it from whom I had no commission and warrant. Certainly my Lords M and Senators, there was nothing at Candium done at all by mans policy and counsel. The immortal Gods bereft both your Generals and the enemies too, of all their sense and understanding: for neither we, in the conduct and ordering of our service, stood warily enough upon our good guard: and they again, as they gat the victory full badly, to they lost it as lowly: whiles they hardly trusted the strength of those places, by means of which they had gained the vantage and better hand of us: and while they made such haste, upon what agreement they cared not, to disarm men that are born martial, and naturally made for wars. For, if they had been in their right wits, what an hard matter was it for them in the time that they sent for old aged men from their home, to come to Counsel, for to have dispatched their Embassadors to Rome? and so to have dealt and treated with the Senat and people about a perfect peace and final league indeed? It had been but three dayes journey for men not encumbered, but lightly armed. All that mean while there might have been truce until the Embassadors from Rome had brought them either certain victory or assured peace. For that had been a covenant and stipulation good in law, the which we should have agreed unto, by warrant of the peoples will and approbation. But ye would never have granted and allowed it: no more should we have entered into any such stipulation. Neither was it Gods will and providence, that there should be any other issue and end of things than this: that both they should vainly be deluded and led themselves aside were, with the fancy of a more joyfull dream than their minds could well conceive and apprehend: and also that the same fortune, which had entangled, snared and brought into danger our army, should relieve the same and rid it again out of perikill as their victory was frivolous and vain, O so a vain and more frivolous peace, should make it trifling and worth nothing: and that such a stipulation and promise should be interpreted and come between which might oblige and bind no person, but the very makers themselves. For what dealing hath there been with you my Lords of the Senat? or with the people of Rome? Who can challenge you? Who an call you into question? Who can come forth and complain that he is by you deceived? Enemy or Citizen? To enemy ye have passed no promise: Citizen to undertake for you and in your name, ye commanded

A "commanded none. Therefore ye have nothing to do to meddle with us, to whom ye gave noight in charge: and with the Samnites as little, with whom ye had no treaty at all. To the Samnites, we are infinitely pledged enough, and answerable to perform that which is our own: for that, I say, which we are able to make good and yield: is in our bodies and lives: not in malice. And as for the Tribuns of Commons, count ye together whether they may be trusted or not, or ought to be relieved and put off to another day: let us in the mean time to deliver, and ye that are the rest) offer these wretched heads and lives of ours, like any thing to B "charge. And by our punishment and execution, deliver and let free the Roman

Both the cause it self, and the Advocate also, moved the Lords of the Senat: and wrought so much not only with the rest, but also with the Tribuns themselves, of Commons, that they promised to be at the Consuls ordering and appointing. Whereupon immediately they gave up their offices, and were delivered into the Feciales hands: with the other to be led as to Candium. There was not to soon an act of the Senat passed hereof, but it seemed that the very light rays of the Sun shone upon the City again. Postumus was in every man's mouth, him they praised and extolled to the heavens: comparing him with the country offering of P. Decius the Consul, for the safety of the army, and other worthy and noble acts of others: saying, that by his overture, by his means and travel, the City was delivered from a long, dishonourable and unalleviated peace: He (say they) hath offered himself to all the toments of anger, and vengeance of the enemies, and made satisfaction thereby for the people of Rome. Nothing now but war, war, war, now cryed every man: and oh, that every they might see the day to encounter on certain

C honest peace: He (say they) hath offered himself to all the toments of anger, and vengeance of the enemies, and made satisfaction thereby for the people of Rome. Nothing now but war, war, war, now cryed every man: and oh, that every they might see the day to encounter on certain. New legions were mustered and enrol of again out of the same town diery, and a pillar med and boiled with hatefull ire and indignation, there was an army levied: well near all of Voluntaries. The Feciales marched before them, and when they were come to the gate, they were deposed and stripped out of their cloths, and their hands be pinnioned behind him. And when the Lictor or Serjeant, for very reverence of Majesty in Postumus his person, bound him at large and at ease, Why doest not thou (quoth he) draw and pull the sword straighter, that he found withal? Afterwards, when they were come into law and as it ought to be, and no fault to be found in judgment: Postumus and A. Cornelius went one of the Feciales or Heralds thus spake: For almight as these persons without commandment and commission from the Quintus and people of Rome, have undertaken by stipulation, That there shall a league and peace be made with you; and in so doing have offended and trespassed against the state, therefore, to the war, that the people of Rome might be freed and absolved from a detestable and heinous oath, I deliver and yee do unto you the self same men. No former had he entered these words, but Postumus with his knee smote the Fecial his thigh, with all the might he could: and with a loud

E voice said, That he being now a Samnite citizen, and the other an Ambassador, and with a loud the people of Rome: had against the Law of Nations injured him and offered him the above: whereby the Romans might more justly make war. Then quoth Postumus, This delivery neither will I accept of and admit, neither shall the Samnites hold it good and lawful. But why doest not thou Sp. Postumus, if thou believe there be any Gods, either unto and on all, or lengthwise, who doest yield thyself again prisoner to the conqueror as traitorally and basely as thou canst? The people of Rome I challenge, who, if they repent of the promise and bargain made at the frights of Candium, let them bring against the Legions into the promise and bargain: they were environed, enclosed, and compassed. Let no man deceive and delude other, wherein he be undone again, and every thing as it was: let them take again their armour. Let all day before the Parle, Then let them plain into their own camp, and have whatsoever they had: let them refuse they then, and spare not all covenant: reject they then all treaty of peace, let us have the same fortune, the same opportunity and vantage of the place, which we had before. Let us blame the Consul's stipulation, nor we find any lack and default in the faithfulness of the people of Rome. And will ye never have done, but always find faults and excuses, and stand to your covenants, when ye are overcome, and have the worst of your enemies? Ye gave a sum of gold you brought again your City of the Gauls, and as they were receiving the same, gold murdered they were by you and heven in pieces. Peace, what a covenant did we make condition that we should restore again our legions unto you: that ye ye can call and name void and ever more yet some colour of right upon your cunning and fraudulent dealing. Alas, it alloweth not the people of Rome of the favouring their Legions, by a dishonest and shameful peace. Say it is so, Let peace be on whether it will: but give you again to the Victor your Legions captivat. Is this your faithfulness, dealing after these your covenants & ceremonies of Feciales?

"rads? that thou, according to the agreement and accord, shouldst have shut down of thine, H "even to many citizens lives saved? and I not have the peace (which by letting unto bold go in"to thee an enemy) I bargained for? What Justice is this, that thou, O Caudinus, and yet that "heralds, prebide to Nations abroad? Nay verily, I neither will accept of thine perils whom
 "I make a shew to deliver, neither can I believe, that they are yielded in verity and good earnest,
 "Nay, I palls not at all, whether they return again into that City, which is obliged by a covenant
 "made, attended upon with the wrath and displeasure of all the Gods, whose heavenly power
 "and deity is thus decuded. Now go and make war, seeing that Sp. Posthumus crewlike thrust
 "and pushed an Ambassador herald with his knee; and so the Gods will believe no doubt, that "Posthumus is a Samnit citizen, and no Roman; and that by a Samnit, a Roman Ambassador hath "been abused: and thereupon you may take a just occasion and good quarrel to make war upon "upon us. Are you not ashamed, and basts you not to broach and set abroad, in the view and "face of the world, such mockeries of Religion? What? old and ancient grave personages, and "such as have been Consuls, to seek such subtle devices (not fit for very children and babes to "play with) and all to shift off and falsify their promise made by covenant. Go Licor, loose the
 "Romans of their bands: and no man so hardy as to stay them, but that they may depart when "they will at their own pleasure. So they, having thus perhaps discharged the publick fidelity,
 "or at least wile quit themselves undoubtedly of their own, returned from Caudium, unhurt, to "the Roman camp.

The Samnites seeing that in lieu of a proud and unreasonable peace, there was a most cruel war K new sprung up again, not only forecast and apprehended in their minds, but well next saw evidently with their eyes, all that ever ensued after. Then, all too late and in vain, God wot, they praised the two-fold counsel of old Pontius: and how they taking the middle way between, were deceived, & had exchanged the certain possession of victory, for an uncertain and doubtful peace; and having lost the opportunity both of gratifying the Romans, or doing them harm any more, were now to fight & wage war with them, whom they might either have disabled for being hur-rful enemies, or made their fait and assured friends for ever. And so without any weakening of their power and forces of either side by battel, their hearts after this Caudine peace were so changed, that Posthumus by his voluntary yielding was more honored among the Romans, than Pontius his bloodless victory among the Samnites: and the Romans made this reckoning, that I the possibility of making war was to them almost as undoubted victory: and the Samnites believed verily, that the Romans had at once made war again and got the upper-hand.

Whiles these things thus passed, the Sarracins revolted to the Samnites: and the Colony at Fregges, by the sudden and unlooked for arrival of the Samnites (with whom it is certain the Sarracinians were banded) in the night was surprised and taken. But the mutual fear one of the other, kept them in on both sides that they stirred not out until the morning. Then began the fight, which for a certain time was equal and indifferent: yet, for that the Fregellones within fought for their Church and chimney (as they lay) and by reason that the multitude, unmet for arms, stood them in good stead in annoying their enemies from off their houses: they held out and M found them play a long time. But afterwards, a wily and deceitful policy turned all backwards and was their undoing: for they suffered the voyce of the cryer to be heard through the Town, who proclaimed, That whosoever laid down weapon, should depart alive and safe with bag and baggage. The hope whereof, caused them to slack somewhat of their fight, and therewith they began to cast away their armor in every place. But the resolute sort armed still, brake away through a postern gate, whose venturousness proved to them more safe, than the inconsiderate fear of the other: which made them credulous and too light of belief. For the Samnites compassed them about with fire, and for all they called upon the Gods for their help, and to their enemies for performance of their promise, yet they burned them most pitteously.

The Consuls parted between themselves, their Provinces, Papirius took his way to Luceria in N Apulia, where the Roman Horsemen given for hostages at Caudium were kept in ward: but Publius stayed in Saernium to make head against the Caudine legions. Which thing much troubled and distracted the minds of the Samnites: for neither their hearts would serve them to go to Luceria, lest the enemy should come on their backs: nor yet to stay behind, for fear lest in the while, Luceria should be lost. They thought it best therefore, to put all in hazard of a battel, and to try it out with Publius. Whereupon they bring forth their power into the field: with whom when Publius was minded to joyn in fight, he thought it not amiss, first to make some speech unto his men, and so commanded them to assemble unto an audience. But, as they came running to the Prætorium, with exceeding great cheerfulness, by reason of their moile that called hard for battel, no exhortation of the General could be heard: each man his own heart mindful of the former dis- O grace, served well enough to encourage and animat them. So they march out to battel, putting forward the standard-bearers and post-ensigns. And because they would lose no time, they first charge with lancing their javelins and shooting darts: and after that, in drawing their swords, they threw away their javelins, as if they had had a signal given them to do so: and with naked drawn sword they ran upon their enemies. No cunning was there to be shewed of warlike Captain: no skill to be shewed either in setting in array the files and ranks, or playing of the reward for supplies: the soldiers furious anger, with raging violence, marshalled and managed all.

So,

A So, the enemies were not only discomfited and put to the rout, but also because they durst not hinder their flight by retiring to their own camp, they made all the haile they could, disbanded as they were, toward Apulia. Howbeit they were rallied together in one company, and to came to Luceria. The Romans, in the same boiling heat of blood that they pierced through the mids of the enemies battel: entered also into their camp: where was more bloodshed and execution than in the battel, and the greater part of the pillage was in their choler marred and clean lost.

The other army commanded by Papirius the Consul, marched along the Sea coast to Arpi: and all the Country they passed thorow, shewed them friendship and courteous, more for the outrages and losses sustained by the Samnites, and the hatred they bare them, than for any love to the people B of Rome, or good received at their hands. And now the Samnites at that time dwelling upon the Hills in Villages, being mountaineers and wild people, and as it is commonly teen, of like disposition to the places which they do inhabit, walled the plain Champian and Sea coasts, despoiling instead their more civil life and conversation. Which Country, if it had been true to the Samnites, either the Roman army had not been able to come to Arpi, or else the penury and scarcity of all things between Rome and Arpi, would have consumed them, being cut off from all provision of viduals. For even then, being gone from them, and lying encamped below Luceria, as well they withstood in the leaguer & thole that were within the City besieged, were nipped and bitten with hunger. The Romans were served all from Arpi, but so slenderly and scanty, that whiles the footmen were occupied in their guards warding, watching, and working unceasingly: the Horsemen, were C forced to cast the corn from off their Horsebacks, to fight more nimbly. They that were within the City, before the other Consul came with his army, had both from the mountains of the San-titus made all provisions more streight: for, leaving the charge of the siege to his brother Consul, he rode lightly appointed without carriage, all over the Country, and so beat all the quarters, that they were too hot for the enemies to forage and purvey victuals. Then the Samnites, seeing about Luceria, and were forced to gather all their forces together from all parts, and to give Pirrus battel. At which very instant, when they were on both sides preparing to fight, the Taren-tin Embassadors came between, discharging and forbidding, both Samnites and Romans to fight: D professing withal, that whosoever they were that refused to give over war, against them they would fight in defence and favor of the others. Papirius having heard that embassage, making semblance, as if he had greatly regarded their speeches, answered that he would confer with his brother Consul: and having sent for him, and bestowed all the mean time in preparation to fight, when he had talked with him as touching the execution of matters already resolved, he presently gave the signal, and set out the bloody banner of battel. Now as the Consuls were busy in sacrificing and performing duties belonging to God and man (as their manner is when they purpose to go to a battel) the Tarentin Embassadors aforesaid, encountered them and expected an answer. To whom Papirius The Chick-maister (qd. he) O ye Tarentins, sendeth me word, that the birds feed E right, and all is well: and besides that, the Gods in our sacrifice seem passing well pleased. And in-manded he to set forward the standards, and led forth his power, mocking the foolish nation for their great vanity, who not able to manage their own affairs by reason of home seditions and civill discords, thought it meet to be moderators between others, and to prescribe them war or peace. The Samnites on the other side, having flaked all their care and desire of war, for that they desired peace in good earnest, or else thought it expedient for them to make a semblance thereof, and ready to fight, cried forth aloud, that they rested still in a sudden arranged in battel array were at their direction: neither would they come forth into the authority of the Tarentins, and F arms out of their fort: choosing rather being thus disappointed, to abide the chance of fortune whatsoever, than to seem to have despised the Tarentins, who had interposed themselves as Mediators for peace. Marry (quoth the Consul) we take that for a good sign and prelude of lucky success: and we would with no more at Gods hands, but to put into their enemies heads that resolution, not to defend their trench and rampire. So the Consul, when they had parted between them their forces, approached the very camp of their enemies, and set upon them with an hot G stakes of the rampire, and threw the bank and all down the ditches under their feet: whiles nor only their hearts already fretted and cankred at the very roots, for the last disgrace received, they entered the camp. Every man for his part gave out and said, Here are not the stratagems of Caudium, here are not the impassable nor inaccessible passes, and forests, these as proud ramp-had gone beyond their silly error and want of forecast: but Roman virtue and prowess, which no rampire never so strong, no trench how deep soever, is able to put by and withstand.
 So they killed all afore them indifferently, as well them that made resistance and withstood, those that retired and gave way: armed and disarmed, bond and free born, old and young, as well under age as undergrown, man and beast, one with another: neither had there escaped any living creature drawing breath, but that the Consuls founded the retreat, and with minatory words

Corvinus, C. Martius Rutilius, C. Sulpitius, T. Manlius Torquatus, Q. Publius Philo, L. Papirius Cursor, Q. Fabius Maximus: the two Decii, L. Volturnus, M. Curius. Besides other brave men and valiant personages that followed after in case he had fought the Carthaginians were still (for if he had lived he meant to have warred there) and then passed over into Italy, when he had been well steeped in years. In every one of these there were the same good parts, the like towardsness of nature, as much forwardness of courage and spirit, as in Alexander, yea, and as good Military discipline, which even from the foundation of the City, passing from hand to hand, grew at length to the form and perfection of an Art, framed & compiled of continual rules and precepts, and confirmed by experiments. For so, after one course the Kings conducted their wars: even so, next unto them the banishers of the Kings, (to wit, the Junii and Valerii) so, consequently the Fabii, the Quinctii, I and Cornelii: so did Furus Camillus, whom those two Romans in their youth (M. Julius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus) with whom Alexander should have encountered, saw an aged man in the latter end of his daies. And whereas Alexander ventured his own proper person in battell, and performed all Military duties with other souldiers, (which was not the least part of his praise & glory) would Manlius Torquatus have given him one inch of ground, think ye, if he had met with him in skirmish equally matched? or Valerius Corvinus either, both of them brave & stout souldiers before they were leaders and captains? Or would the Decii have given him place, who with devoted bodies to death, came among the thickest of their enemies into present danger? Would Papirius Cursor have given him way, a man of that incomparable strength of body, & invincible courage of heart? And not to name every one particularly, would that Senat & Council have been overwrought with the stratagems & policies of that one young man? which, whosoever he was that said, it consisted and was compiled altogether of Kings, was the only man that conceived & comprehended the true image and Idea of the Roman Senat. Mary, here was all the doubt (forsooth) lest that he knew how to chuse out a convenient plot of ground to pitch a Camp in, more wisely & cunningly than any one of those before named, to make provision for victual, to foresee & beware of ambushes, to pick out & take a meet time for to fight a battell, to set his battallions in array, and to strengthen the same with sufficient succours & supplies from the iuegard, Surely, he would have said himself, that he had not now to deal with Darius, which Monarch carrying with time a train of dainty women, and tender Eunuchs, weakened and made effeminate with wearing purple and gold, with all his rich furniture, for show and ostentation of his wealth and superfluous fortune, Alexander without any bloushew, with doing nought else but knowing well how to condemn such toys and vanities conquered as a prey and booty rather than an enemy and warrior. He would have thought verily that the constitution and nature of Italy far differed from that of India, through which he marched at his ease with his drunken Army, leasling and banqueting all the way; but specially, when he should have beheld the woody torrets and unpassable straightes of Apulia, the high hills and mountains of Lucania, and the fresh marks and tokens of the lofts that hapned in his own name and house, namely, where not long before his Uncle Alexander late King of Epirus miserably perished. Our talk all this while is of Alexander, not drowned yet with the overflow of prosperity; wherein no man had ever less rule of himself than he. Whom if we consider, as he was arrayed in the habit and attire of his new fortune, and (if I may so say) of a new nature, whereinto after his conquests and victories he was transfigured: surely he would have come into Italy more like a Darius than an Alexander, and brought a baldrast army with him nothing at all resembling but quite forgetting their native country of Macedonia, degenerated already and growing out of kind, into the manners and fashions of the Persians. It grieveth me, and I am ashamed, in so great a Monarch as he was, to report the proud changing and variety every while of his apparell, his excessive vain-glory and desire of being courted and crouched unto (as he was) in flattering manner by men lying upon the earth groveling and prostrate at his feet. Such abject balences should have been hardly endured of Macedonians conquered and subdued; much less than being conquerours as they were. Abashed I am to recount the foul and horrible torments & executions, the murders of his well deservient friends, even in the midst of his cups and N dainty viands: last of all, his vanity, his over-weening, and forging to himself a divine race and pedigree from the gods. But what if his drunkenness and unmeasurable love of wine, were every day more than other? what if his fell anger and exceeding heat of choler increased daily? (for I report nothing but that which all writers agree upon) reckon we not these infirmities for great blemishes, and wondrous hindrances, to the virtues and perfections of a warrior & general commander? But here is all the danger and fear (which some are wont to give out & alledge even the vainest persons of all other Greeks, who favour & magnifie the glory of the very Partians in comparison of the Roman name) that the people of Rome had never been able to abide the very majesty and name of Alexander the great. (And I think verily that even themselves that talk so much of him never heard the truth, so much as by the brute and fame) and that against whom in Athens, O a City mightily decayed by war with the Macedonians, and even then, when as they might lie before their face the ruins of Thebes in manner smoking still in their eyes, the Orators durst freely make publike invectives (which appeareth by the very records of their Orations now extant) against him: I say, not one of so many States and noble personages of Rome durst have opened his mouth and given one word again frankly and boldly. How much soever the grandeur and greatness of this man may be conceived and imagined in the mind. all that shall be but one only man, rising, growing, and come to his height with the felicity of little more than ten years,

Whic

A Which happiness of his, they thereat in this respect, that the people of Rome, although in no war they were subdued, yet in many battels had the soile and loile the day: whereas Alexander never fought field but he won the victory; little understand they, that compare the exploits of one person, and him a young man, with the deeds and acts of a State, which I had now warred eight hundred years. And can we marvel, it when on the one part there may be reckoned more ages than years on the other, that in so long a time, fortune should vary more than in the space of thirteen years? But why compare you not man with man, Captain with Captain, and lay their fortunes together? How many Roman Captains and Generals, in this case am I able to name, who never lost field? Ye may turn every leaf and page of the yearly annals of Magistrates, of B y day-books and journals of those Consuls and Dictators, whose valour and fecit-ity the people of Rome had never cause to repent of and bediscontented for, so much as on day. And that which world, some of them bare the Dictatorship but ten or twenty daies; and none the Consulship longer than a year. Their levies and musters now and then were letted and impeached by the Tribunes of the Commons. The due and best time for war otherwhies overlapped them, and yet they went forth, before their term expired, they were then called home for to be presidents of the Magistrates Election. In the very midle and busiest time of their affairs, the year very often turned a College and companion in government was hindred, and the people took duties another while of C times after the loile and overthrow of their predecessors, and received the army either of raw untrained souldiers or such as were in ill discipline, trained up; whereas kings and Monarchs contriveth, not only freed and exempt from all such obstacles and inconveniences, but also Lords and rulers, and of absolute command over their enterprises, overtimes and seasons fit for execution, give direction to others, draw all after them to their advice and, omick, and are themselves directed and over-ruled by none. Say now, that Alexander were invincible, and dealt with these Captains as invincible as himself, he should likewise have hazarded as great pawns and favours of fortune as any of them; nay rather, he should have adventured and incurred more jeopardy in that many perilous chances: but many Romans there had been only subject but also exposing himself to D forgetfulness of their worthy deeds: who every one should have lived and died according to the maineth now that forces be compared with forces, and armies to armies, either in number, or in quality of souldiers, or multitude of Allies from whom they had their aids. There we esteemed by computation in the Taxing years and Surveys taken by the Censors of that age; two hundred and fifty thousand polls Citizens of Rome. And therefore in all the revots and rebellions of their allies the Latines, they were able to levy and enroll ten legions: complot of Roman Citizens well near and none else. And for many years oftentimes there were four and five armies employed at once, which maintained wars in Tuscan, in Hærvia, in Umbria take also the Gauls with your enemies likewise Lucania in Samnium. Besides all these, Alexander should have found all Nations E with the Sabines, Volscians, and Equians; all Campanians, part of Brutia and Hærvia with the Greeks along the nether Tyrrhen sea, from the Tuntians to Naples and Capua, and from thence, the Samnites as far as to Ariminum and Hostia. All these he should have met with either mighty and puissant allies and friends to the Romans, or if they were enemies, vanquished and subdued by their arms. He should have passed the seas himself, having of old Macedonian bands, not above thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, and those, most of them Thessalians; for this was all his power. And in case he had joyned thereto the Persians Indians and other such nations, he should have drawn along after him, more let and encumbrance, that help and incur by them. Take this over and besides, The Romans had rich supplies always ready and near at hand, at home in the City: whereas Alexander his army (as afterward it hapned to Antiochus) in a strange country) would have waxed old and decayed. They had for their armour and weapon, a shield or buckler and a spear in manner of a pike. The Romans had a target of larger capacity to cover the whole body, and a javelin, being a weapon much heavier and more forcible than the pike, either to strike and push withall nearhand, or to be used at a far off. The souldier array fill within their severall ranks. The Macedonian huge Phalangians moved not, was steadfast and always after one sort: but the Romans battallion more diuine, and consisting of many parts, each both to divide and display, or to joyn and runne upon one occasion, and consisting of many of painful work and travell, what souldier is comparable to one occasion. To speak now G to endure all sorts of labour? Alexander by the loile but of one battell had been leen done, and his war at an end; for ever. But the Romans whose hearts neither the flames of digrace at Curge had nor the world's deat at Canne, could amate and dunt; what power would have discouraged him? What battell in the world would have broken their backs? Certainly, Alexander although here have mist his Persians and Indians, and desire with all his heart to have had dealing with them again, and other cowardly and dildard Nations of Asia: nay, he would have said, that he had warred before: but with women, as Alexander, King of Epirus (by report) gave out, when he was wounded to death, conferring the ease of war which this young Prince H. his nephew, met withall in Asia, with the difficulties of his own that he found here in Italy. And verily, when I call to mind and remember the conflicts and fights at sea, in the first Punic war, for the space of twenty four years, with the Carthaginians, I suppose the wholeage of Alexander would hardly have brought about and finished that one war, and against one of those two States. And peradventure, when both Carthaginians and Romans had been combined, either according to the ancient leagues, or for equal fear of a common enemy, and those two Cities most puissant both for men and munition, had taken arms at once against him, he would have been overwhelmed with the Punic and Roman war together. Moreover, the Romans have made good proof of the Macedonians as enemies, if not when they had Alexander to be their Captain, nor I whilst the Empire of Macedonia was at the best, and stood upright unfoiled: yet tried them they have, and made head against them under the conduct of Antiochus, Philip, and Perses: and it never cost them the loss and overthrow of their own part, no, nor so much as any appearance of danger at all. I would not be thought to speak a proud word, but be it said without arrogance, and setting all our civil wars aside; never were we distressed, either by horse or foot, never in open field and battel ranged, never on even and plain ground, never in unequal places of disadvantage, were we endangered. The souldier in heavy and complex harness, I confess, may fear the Cavalry in the plains: may fearshot of arrows, cumbersome forests and woods, straight gulleys, and unpassable wilds, without waies forward or backward: but let there be a thousand arms greater and stronger than the Macedonians or Alexander, so long as we hold together, and continue still in this love of peace and care of civil concord, wherein we live at this present, we are able, and ever shall be, to discomfit and put them all to flight.

After this were M. Follus Flaccidus and L. Plantius Vomer Consuls. The same year there came from sundry Nations of the Samnits Embassadors, to treat for the renewing of the league, and moved the Senat, most humbly kneeling prostrate upon the ground: but being put off and referred to the people, their prayers availed not to such effect: for as touching a league, they had a flat nay. And after they had for certain daies together importuned them one by one apart, with cap and congee: at length after much suit, they obtained truce for two years. And out of Apulia the Theanenses and Canusines wearied with rodes and spoil made in their Territories, after they had put in hostages to Lucius Plantinus the Consul, yielded themselves to his protection. The same year first began Provoits to be created at Capua, to govern under certain laws given unto them by L. Furius the Pretor: after that themselves had made suit for the one and the other, as a remedy for the same, greatly decalated through civil discord. And at Rome were two more Tribes added to the rest, Mentinas, and Falerina. When Apulia began once to shrink and go backward, the Theanites, being allo Apulians, presented themselves unto the new Consuls C. Junius Bubulcius, and Q. Aemilius Barbula, and sued to enter into a league with the Romans. And since they were the men that led the way first, and by their example and perswasion induced all Apulia to be in peace with the Romans, and had confidently undertaken, as sureties and pledges to bring it to pass they obtained their request. Yet was not the league indifferent and formal, with equal conditions, but so, as they should be in subjection to the people of Rome. After that Apulia was conquered (for Junius had won also Tarentum, a strong town and a rich) they marched forward against the Lucans. Then upon the sudden coming of Aemilius the other Consul, Nerulum was by force taken. And after that it was noised abroad amongst the allies of the people of Rome, that the state and weal publike of Capua were established by Roman discipline and government: the Antiates also, who made moan and complained, that they lived without positive (yet laws and Magistrates, obtained of the Senate certain Advocats and Commissioners, to ordain Statutes likewise for that Colony. So, that not only the Roman arms, but also their law and jurisdiction extended far and neer, and was of great request. C. Junius Bubulcius, and Q. Aemilius Barbula Consuls, in the end of the year, delivered their Legions not to the Cons. by them created, Sp. Nannius, and M. Popilius, but consigned them to L. Aemilius the Dictator. Who with his General of Horse, L. Fulvius, began to lay siege to Saturnia, whereby he gave the Samnits occasion to rebell. Which brought upon the Romans a double fear two waies. For of the one side the Samnits having assembled a mighty army, to deliver their allies from the siege, pitched their Camp not far from the Romans leaguer: on the other side, the Satricans set open their gates suddenly, and with a great tumult brake into the wards and corps de guard of their enemies. And so both parts, relying rather upon hope of succour and help elsewhere, than trusting upon their own strength, within a while began to charge the Romans in full battell, with banner displayed, and distressed them. And although the Dictator was assailed both waies, yet was he sure and safe on either side, because he had got a plot of ground, not easie to be compassed, and made head both against the one and the other, advancing his ensignes accordingly. Howbeit, he charged more hotly upon them that sallied forth, and without much ado beat them again within the walls. Then turned he the whole battell upon the Samnits. Where there was hard hold, and more to do. The victory, though long first, was neither doubtful nor variable. The Samnits being chased and driven into their Camp, having in the night put out all their fires, dislodged and departed privily away: and being past all hope of defending Saturnia, they besieged Pistia, a town confederate to the Romans, to requite their enemy with the like displeasure. The revolution of the year being gone about, the war continued under the conduct of

A Q. Fabius Dictator: and the new Consuls, like as the former remained still at Rome. And Fabius came before Saturnia to receive the Army of Aemilius, bringing with him a new supply to make up the broken bands: for the Samnits made no stay at Pistia, but having levied and sent out such souldiers from home, prelinning upon their great numbers, encamped in the very place where they lay afore: where by braving the Romans, and challenging them with many souldiers, they es against the wals of the war, which depended thereon: and was more easie to the therefore of such importance to the rest of the war, which depended thereon: and was more easie to the trench and rampire, to keep them from making any assault upon the Camp. But the Samnits never gave them rest. Insomuch, as when the enemy now was at the point to enter the gates of the Camp, the General of the Horse, Q. Aemilius Cacerinus, without advice and direction of the Dictator riding forth in a great noise with all his Cornets, he repelled the enemy. But even part and shewed what he could do, that on either side there be a notable blow, with the glory of his death of both the Captains. For the General of the Samnits first taking it to heart, to keep Aemilius to fiercely ride and give the charge, and him self to be distressed and driven out of his place, with much intreating and exhorting his horsemen, renewed the fight. Against whom, as he advanced himself bravely to be seen amongst his horsemen, received the right. Against whom, as he al of the horse, with spear in rest, a long spear, his men and fought most valiantly, the Roman Gell him for dead: and yet for all this was not the whole troop besides (as commonly it is taken) at the fall of their Captain so much amazed, as provoked rather to fight. For they that were about him charged Aemilius hard as he rally rode without heed, and engaged himself too far within the thickest of the squadrons of his enemies, and lost their pavels at him: but they gave the special honour to the brother of the Samnits Captain to be revenged for his death. He, full of anger and sorrow, plucked Aemilius from his horse, and threw him in the had like to have left his dead corps among the Samnits. But presently the Romans alighted on foot, and the Samnits were forced to do the same: and thus being arranged suddenly in great haste into battallions, there began a cruel night on foot about the bodies of the Captains. Wherein the Romans went clear away with the better, and having recovered the corps of Aemilius, in great joy, intermingled with sorrow, they returned winners into their Camp. The Samnits thus having lost their Captain, and tried their strength what they could do in fight on horse-back, left Saturnia, which they supposed could not possibly be defended, and returned again to the siege of Pistia. After few daies, Saturnia was surrendered by composition to the Romans, and the Samnits by assault won Pistia. Then changed they the seat town was revolted to the Samnits, and had slain all the inhabitants therein that were Romans. Against which place, when the Romans were come first by great journey to recover the loots sent out dispersed along the high waies, brought word, that the Legion of the Samnits followed went forth to meet with the enemy, and near to a place called L. Anula there was fought a doubt that parted them, and they knew not whether they had the better of the war. In some Chronical of the horse, C. Fabius chosen in the room of Aemilius, came with a new and fresh army he should stay and rest, and what time, and which on side he should set upon the enemy: after he The Dictator himself, who had for certain daies after the last skirmish, kept his souldiers within trench, more like one besieged, than besieging: all on a sudden put forth the signal and token of battell: and thinking nothing more effectual to animate and kindle the courages of hardy men, cealed from his souldiers the coming of the General of Horse and his chief forces: so that as there had been no other way but one, even to break forth and rally with violence: so as if he should they by victory we shall make open. Our hold wherein we be fortified is not enough but we are revolted from whence we should have convoy of victuals: and were it that the people were disposed to help us yet the advences & passages are hard, and the place of our abode in mountains. Therefore will not I deceive and abuse you any longer by leaving here your tents, on which day: for our fortifications and holds, ought to be defended by force of arms: and not our arms by fenced holds. Let them have their Camp well fortified, to the forth and to retire thither again at their pleasure, who have a purpose to make along war of it. But let "us cut off all regard of other matters, but only of a present and final victory. Advance then your engines directly against the enemy: and so soon as our Army is once without the trench and rampiers, let them set the tents a fire, that have the charge to do you shall make up your your losses again my soldiers, with the spoil of all the nations heretobes, that have revolted. At this speech of the Dictator, which shewed no other semblance but of extreme necessity, the soldiers took heart and were hot set to march straight to the enemy. And the very light of their tents burning behind them, albeit those only which stood next were set on fire, for the Dictator had given commandment was no small provocation and prick unto them. And therefore they gave a charge like mad men, and at the first push and brunt they brake the array of the enemies: and withal, in good time, the General of the horse, when he saw a far off the tents on fire (for that was the signal agreed between them) came hastily upon the back of the enemies and afflicted them. So the Samnites being environed round about, made every man shift he could to get forth and escape, and so fled. But the main multitude that were shuffled together all on a round heap, for fear, being an hinderance one to another in the press, was slain in the midst and cut in pieces the enemies camp won, and ransacked: with the pillage whereof the soldiers were laden and the Dictator brought them back unto their own Camp: who were not so joyous for the victory, as for that they found (besides a little part thereof disfigured by fire) all the rest safe and found beyond their expectation.

From thence they returned to Sora, where the new Consuls M. Petilius and Caius Sulpitius took the Army at the hands of Fabius the Dictator: who discharged many of the old soldiers, and brought certain new cohorts for supply in their stead. But when by reason of the difficult and unaccessible sight of the Town, they knew not well which way, and by what means to make assault, and seeing that the winning of it would either ask long time, or be exposed to manifold and present dangers: a certain runaway-Traitor of Sora who was lately flown out of the Town, got to the Roman Sentinels, and required forthwith to be brought to the Consuls: who being presented before them, promised to betray the Town: and being questioned withal, how and by what means he would perform that which he undertook, seemed unto them to allege some reasons to good purpose, and prevailed so far with them, that he caused the Roman Camp, which lay in a manner close under the walls, to be removed six miles off the Town, saying, that thereby, the wards by day, and the watch by night would be neglected, and less careful and diligent to keep the City. Himself the night following, after he had willed certain cohorts of footmen to lye in ambush within the woods near the Town, took with him ten thousand and chosen soldiers: and through sleep places, and such as were not well passable, conducted them into the Castle, having brought thither more shot and darts to throw than to serve so small a number of men: besides, there was good store of Stones at hand, which lay there, either scattering by chance (as commonly in such craggy and rocky ground) or else heaped together by the townsmen of purpose, for the better defence of the place. Whereafter he had bestowed the Romans, and shewed them a narrow and steep path-way out of the town into the Castle, from getting up here (quoth he) there needs no more but three men only well armed to keep back the greatest multitude that is: ye are in number ten, and more than that, Romans: and of Romans the most hardy and valiant: the place will stand you, I know, the darkness of the night will be for your purpose: the night, I say, which by reason of uncertainties, maketh all things seem much more than they are to men affrighted and amazed already. I will for my part set all in a hurly burly. Look you in the mean time that you duly keep the fortrese. This did he runs down with as great a noise and shouting as he could, crying, Alarm, help! Citizens, the Castle is taken by the enemy, come away to defence. These words he reformed ever as he rapped at the gates of the principal Citizens and Noblemen: these words he redoubled aloud to all that he met, and to as many as ran forth affrighted into the streets. This fearful alarm received from one man: was felt abroad by many more all over the City. The Magistrates quaking for fear, sent certain to the Castle in epical to discover the truth: and advertised by them that the Castle was surprised indeed by armed men, and full of armor (for they made the number, and every thing else, more than it was) were clean put out of all hope to recover their Fortrese. So every where they fell so running away: the gates were broken open by them that were not well-ware, and those most part unarmed. At one of the gates, those companies of the Romans afore said, who lay in ambush, and were raised with the noise and clamour, brake in, and killed all that in this fright ran headlong in their way. Thus was Sora won against the Consuls should come in the morning betimes by break of day: and look whose fortune it was to scape out of the massacre made in the night, and to flee away those they took to mercy upon submission: whereof two hundred twenty five, even those who by the general voice of all were pointed at, and reputed above the rest the principal actors in that horrid massacre above said of the Roman Colonies inhabitants, and the authors of their evil they had away with them to Rome, bound hand and foot. The other multitude they left at Sora naked and unhurt, and painted there a prison. All they that were brought to Rome were in the market-place scourged with rods, and beheaded: with the exceeding joy and contentment of all the Commons, whom it concerned most, that the multitude which should be sent into sundry Colonies might in every place live in safety and security of their lives.

The Consuls being departed from Sora, marched forward to make war upon the Lands and Territory

A Territories of the Antonians: for the coming of the Samnites after the battle of Lutina, they were all out, full of insurrections and commotions, and many conspiracies: there were in all places about (as Capua it self without blame and taints, May this matter passed as to Rome, where information was made against some of the Nobles, and warning given to enquire into them. But the whole nation of the Antonians, by reason that the Cities were betwixt, as Sora, was reduced under obedience to the people of Rome, Capua, Ardea, Antium, and Freges were the Cities, out of which twelve of the chief people of Rome, Capua, Ardea, Antium, and Freges were sworn together to betray their own Cities, presented themselves unto the Consuls, giving them to understand, "That their countrymen with long ago for the coming of the Samnites, and to "vanquished and helped the Samnites both with men and munition. But now, say they, that the Samnites were chased from thence, they lived untroubled in doubtful terms of peace, and that not their gates in dread upon the Romans for fear of bringing war upon themselves, yet obdurate bent to shut them if their Army approached toward them. In this way ring, and doubtfulness of their minds, they might at unawares be suddenly surprised. By this persuasion of three towns before named, some in armor, closely to lie in ambush in convenient places near the walls: others in side gowns with swords under them, who a little before day, to from as the gates were set open, should enter into those Cities. By whom the matter was so handled, that at one lay in ambush for to rise at once and come to the town. Thus were the gates forced and possessed, and three towns in one hour by the same stratagem surprized. But he, as the gates were forced and possessed, in the absence of the Captains, there was no lay in execution, and slaughter, but beyond all measure and without all mercy, no less norage was spared: and to the whole nation of the Antonians, where they were detected for certain of rebels, was destroyed and distinguished, as if they had warred mortally and been at deadly feud.

The time year Lucius came into the hands of the Samnites, by reason that the City had betrayed and delivered the Roman garrison to them: but the traitors went not long unpunished for it. The Roman Army changed to be not far from thence, and at the first attempt the City standing as it did on a point, was won. The Lucerns and Samnites both were put to the sword every one: and so far forth proceeded their furious rage, that when the Senate late in council at Rome, about sending men to inhabit Lacerna, many were of mind, that the City it self should be razed to the ground and destroyed: for besides the cursed and execrable hatred they bore against them being twice conquered and revolved: the distance also of the place so remote, caused them to mislike such a kind of people to cruel and dangerous. Howbeit, their opinion took place and prevailed: and 2500 were there planted.

The same year when as the Romans found all unloyal unto them, and nothing but distrust and on all sides: at Capua also certain secret conspiracies of the Nobles and best of the City were detected and revealed, Touching which the Senate advice was asked, and thereunto not neglected by them, but Commissions were appointed: and thought good it was that the Dictator himself he nominated for to sit upon the same commissions and inquiries. And C. Claudius was named, who named M. Feltius General of the Horse, Great was the terror of that Magistrate, and each of them upon either for fear, or guiltiness of conscience, the two C. Claudius and M. Feltius who were the chief of that complot, before information was given against them by name to the Dictator and his assistants, by their own hands flattered their daies, and so avoided the trial of justice and punishment accordingly. After that, when the Inquisition wanted subject matter on which to prosecute the Iniquities (by interpretation of words in the Commission, provided to be as saying, that the Senat had good warrant to make enquiry and straight search, not by name and precisely, as Capua only: but generally, who in any place whatsoever had misdeemments, and conspired against the Common-wealth: and also for meeting by they, and passion for their own Commissions extended larger both for person and reflection. Yes, and the Dictator himself he took upon the Tribunes for to assist them with interposing their negativeness, yet there was not one of them would incur and resist them: the prement was taken spirit then, and they imputed. Then the Nobility I mean not them alone who were in the complot, generally the whole Gentry of the City at once persuaded: That they were not the natural and true Colonies, but new recruits, had been and charged with this crime: who if it were not for their number and indurated spirits, and judgement of the first head: saying, That it was the very cause of the destruction himself, and his Generals of Horse, who were rather put to guilty, and of sedition, and of the confusion of the Colonies, and competent Judges: and that from they well know and understand who mindful rather of his good name and reputation, than respective of his high place and

absolute government, went up into the common place of audience before all the people, and spake thus to this effect: "My Masters and friends all, Citizens of Rome, well assured I am, that private are to the whole carriage and course of my former life; and besides that, even this very honour and dignity which you have bestowed upon me, is able to rectify and approve mine innocence. "For to sit upon these iniquities, there was not to be chosen now for Dictator (as oftentimes heretofore, according to the dangerous occasions and necessity of the time) a man reputed the best and most noblest warrior of all other; but such a one, as throughout his whole life hath most of all millicied and condemned ambitious conventicles. Howbeit, forasmuch as certain persons of noble lineage, (for what cause it is more meet for you to deem and judge than for me being a Magistrate) to speak without book, as they say, and upon no foreground) have endeavoured with all their might and main to overthrow the process of the inquisition it felt; and afterwards seeing they were not able themselves to bring that about (notwithstanding they were Patritii) have fled to the holds of their very adversaries, even the protection of the Tribunes and their negative, rather than to justify themselves and stand to the trial of their cause: and that having there also a refuge (thinking all means safer than to approve their innocence) have taken upon us, and basted not (private men as they are) to accuse and touch the person of him that is Dictator: to the end therefore, that both God and man and all the world may know, that as they have assented to compels that which they are not able to bring to pass, namely, to avoid the rendering an account of their life and demeanour; so, I am ready (to set forward their accusations) to offer my self unto mine adversaries; and giving them means to call me to mine answer. Here I resign up my Dictatorship. And I beseech you O Consuls, if so be this charge be laid upon by the Senat, to proceed in examination against me first, and this Gentlemen in the General of Horse M. C. C.: that it may appear, how we, through our own innocence alone, and not by the countenance and privilege of our dignity and high calling, are protected and safe from their slanders and intended crimes. Herewith he gave over his place of Dictator: and after him incessantly, M. F. F. yielded up his roomlike office of General over the Horse. These persons were the first, who being charged and put to their trial judicially before the Consuls, (for to them by order from the Senat, was the commission directed) notwithstanding all the depositions and testimonies of the Patritii, were in every point found unguilty, and acquit. P. Philo also, albeit he had so many times attained to the supreme dignities of state, after he had achieved so many worthy deeds, as well in peace as war, yet a man maliced or envied rather of the Nobility, was put to plead for himself, and finally absolved. But this inquiry into such men of name and quality, lasted no longer in force: (as it is usually seen) than whilst it was fresh, and in the first heat thereof. From them it began to fall to persons of less reckoning and baser account, until such time, as by the same conventicles and factions, against which it was devised, it fell to the ground, and was trodden underfoot.

The bruit of these things, and more than that, the hope of the Campains revolt, whereto certain had conspired and sworn (as ye have heard) recalled the Samnites back again to Caudium, who were turned and bent wholly into Apulia: that from thence, being so near at hand unto C. P., they might (it haply any insurrection and trouble presented the oportunity and opportunity) seize upon it and take it perforce from the Romans. Thither came the Consuls with a strong and mighty army: and at the first they staid and lingered about the passes and straits, having on the one side and the other an ill way of passage unto the enemies. Afterwards the Samnites fetching a short compass about, came down with their army through the open places into the plains. I mean the champaign country and fields about Capua. And that was the first time that the enemies had a sight one of the others Camp. Whereupon by light skirmishes on horseback other than on foot, they tried mastery on either side: neither were the Romans one jot discontented with the issue and event thereof, nor repented of the delay whereby they drew the war-length. Contrariwise, the Samnite Captains perceived their forces to wear daily by small losses, and their courage to cool and decay evidently by that lingering war. Whereupon, they came abroad into the field and divided their Cavalry into wings: with a special charge, to have more careful eye backward toward their camp, for fear of any impression and assault that way than to the main battle: which would be guarded safe enough by the Infantry. The Consuls marshalled themselves in this manner. Salpurnius led the right point of the battle and Peitius the left: the right side (whereas the Samnites also were arranged in thinner ranks and files, of purpose to compass and environ the enemies, or for to be compassed and enclosed themselves) shewed it self more abroad and open. They on the left hand, besides that they stood thicker and more close, were by occasion of a sudden policy of Peitius the Consul, further strengthened. For those cohorts and bands which were referred away in the reward for help at any need, and kept fresh against all occurrences and hazards of long fight, he advanced presently to the forefront in the vanguard and with all his forces as once charged the enemy at the first encounter & forced him to retreat. When the footmen of the Samnites were thereby troubled and disheartened, the horsemen followed close and entered into the skirmish. But as they rode cross and overwart between the two hosts, the Roman horsemen picked and galloped their horses to flank them: and disordered and troubled the ensigns, corners, squadrons and troops of foot and horse, pell-mell together. Until he had caused the whole battle of that side, to turn their backs. In this left point now Peitius alone but Salpurnius also joined with him, and was present in person to exhort and encourage the soldiers: for he had transported and

A distracted himself from his own men, who as yet were not come to join battle at the cry & shout that arose from the left side: and seeing on that part undoubted victory, he went towards his own charge accompanied with 1200 men: Where he found a change of fortune, namely, the Romans there dismaid and daunted. Howbeit, the Consul his coming made a present alteration: to aid them, there came a greater supply indeed than in show of number, and comforted; and for when they heard first, and saw soon after, the victory got of the other part, they renewed the fight. After this on all sides the Romans had the better hand, and the Samnites giving over fight, med Reverentium. It is left in record that there were upon 30000 Samnites either left killed in the place, or brought away captive.

The Consuls having obtained this notable victory, forthwith from thence lead their Legions to lay siege unto Bovianum: and there wintered before the Town, until such time as C. Peitius (chosen Dictator together with M. F. F. his General of the Horse, by the new Consuls L. P. P. Curio for the fifth time, and C. Jun. Bubulcus the second time) received the Army at their hands. Who hearing, that the Cattle of Fregella was by the Samnites taken, left Bovianum, and went forth unto the place, and were fled by night: and when he had placed a strong garrison there he retired within the walls, a little before the Dictator his coming, both all the whole multitude of the Samnites, and the rustic peasants about Nola. The Dictator having viewed the situation of the Town, to the end he might have the more open access to the walls, let all the houses well inhabited. And not long after, whether it was by Peitius Dictator (I know not) nor C. Jun. that would draw unto the Consul the honour of winning Nola, and moreover and say, that he won also Atina and Calatia: and that Peitius upon a pelfence that began, was made Dictator, for the setting or fastning of a spike or great nail. Two Colonies that year were conducted to S. over against their own house within a kenning. And a decree passed from the Senat, that to C. Jun. also a third Colony there should be sent inhabitants. M. Valerius and P. Decius, the Consuls that next succeeded, ordained three Trinivirs, for that purpose and sent four thousand to people those places.

The war with the Samnites was in a manner now dispatched and brought to an end: but before that the Nobles and Senators of Rome had left the care thereof, a brute was blown of the Tulsans and hostility they more feared; for that their country was to near a neighbour and so populous withal. Therefore, whilst one of the Consuls was occupied in dispatching the reliques of the war in Samnium, P. Decius who staid at Rome grievously tick, by authority of the Senat, named the Dictator C. Junius Bubulcus. He according as the important affairs required, caused all the younger sides, with great diligence he prepared. And albeit he were thus furnished and well appointed yet he was nothing bold and forward to begin war, willing (no doubt) to be quiet and stand upon his guard, unless the Tulsans shewed themselves first in arms. The same purpose had the Tulsans about of their own limits.

In that year was there a famous Censorship of App. Claudius and C. Plautius. But the name of Appius became more memorable of the twain, and of happier renown unto posterity, for that he paved with stone the canal or Port-way (bearing his name) and conveyed a channel of water into the City of Rome, which works he finished alone for that his College for shame of an infamous and odious choice of certain Senators which he made gave over the office. But Appius alone, by the motion and means of the same Appius, the Patritii, to whole family properly belonged the Priestly service, at the altar of Heracles called Alconus, had taught certain publick ceremonies (for that the function might be committed over to them as delegates) the solemn rites and might strike a temple of conscience, and make men afraid ever after, to alter any thing in religion from the former state and first institution. For whereas at the same time there were twelve hundred of the Patritii, and in them about thirty that were above fourteen years of age: within one name of the Patritii became thus extinct but that Appius also the Censor within certain years (such was the ire of the gods mindfull of revenge) fell stark blind. Therefore the Consuls that followed very entrance of their office framed a complaint unto the people: That by the blind and corrupt Election of some new Senators that honourable state and order was deformed, and namely, how some were over-slips, who were of more worth than those that were taken in: And saying plainly,

That

Sarnamed

Blasphemy of Blood.
Appia was,
Out of the river Anio, and

Aqua Claudia

That they would not observe and have in any regard such a choice, which without respect of good and bad was made for favour and affection to some and at the pleasure of the Censors: and immediately they cited the Senat by name in that order and form, as had been used before the Censors, App. Claudius and C. Plautius.

And in that time were two places of charge and command, first given by the people, both pertaining to warfare: the one, that sixteen Colonels for four Legions, should from that time forward by the people be created, which before were in a manner the gifts and favours conferred by the Dictators and Consuls: and few more of the people had any hand or voice therein. This Act and Ordinance was propounded by L. Petilius and C. Martius, Tribunes of the Commons. The other was, That the same people should have the appointment and ordaining of two Duvvirs at first for the rigging, repairing, and trimming of the Navy. The maker of this Act was M. Decius, another Tribune of the Commons.

I would let pass one thing that happened this year, as of small weight and importance, and not worth the speaking, but that it seemed a matter pertinent to religion. The ministrs that plied upon the flute and hautboies, for that they were prohibited and debarred by the last Censors, to have their good cheer any more in the Temple of Jupiter, according to an old custome and tradition, took snuff thereat, and in a pelting chafe all in one company went their waies to Tybur: so as there was not one of them in the City left to sing and pipe before the pomp of sacrifices, and on their festival daies. The Senat made some conscience hereof, and were troubled in their mind. Whereupon they dispatched certain messengers to Tybur, to travel with the townsmen, and endeavour all they could, that these good fellows might be reformed and sent home again to the Romans. The Tyburins undertook the matter, and promised right courteously to do their best: and first they sent for these musicians into their Town-Hall, and persuaded with them to return again to Rome: but when they could not be brought to that, for any thing they could do, then they wrought another policy and feat with them, that forced and fitted well the humour of such kind of people and of their coat. Upon a festival holiday, under a colour of making merry with minstrelle and muck about them, some invited one and some another to give them a fit of mirth accordingly. But they plied them with wine (which all the sort of this profection love but too well) that they drank until they winked, and winked so long, till they fell fast asleep. And being found asleep, the Tyburins brought them gently to their beds in certain waggons, and thus bestowed, conveyed them to Rome. Neither perceived they ought themselves drunken for they, before that their wagons were left in the market place of Rome. Nay, before they had slept out and consoled their wine that steamed up into their heads, and dounded there the day-light came upon them and then they awoke. The people came running together from all parts to them, and after they had either got at their hands, or charged them to stay, and make no more such frolics: it was granted unto them, that three daies every year, being disguised and dressed in a mask for the purpose they might range and walk about the City, with lutes, and founding their instruments, after this licentious manner and jollity, which now daies is yearly used, and their privilege of eating in the temple was restored to them again, namely, to such as sung and plained in time of their divine service and sacrifices: and all was well. This ridiculous pageant hapned amidst the care and preparation of two great and dangerous wars.

The Consuls parted their Provinces between them: To Junius fell by lot the Samnites, to Emilius the new war in Hebrunia. In Samnium, Cluvia, a fortress and hold of the Romans being impregnable by an assault, was a long time besieged; and forced by extreme famine, was delivered up to the Samnites. After they were on. Masters of the fort, they took the garrison of soldiers, and notwithstanding they yielded themselves yet they whipped and tarred their flesh most heally, and in the end without all mercy killed them. Junius exceeding wrath at this cruelty, thinking nothing more needful to be done, till than the winning again of Cluvia; laid all other matters aside, and the same day that he assailed the walls, took it by force, and flew all he could find above fourteen years of age. In this train of victory the Army was brought against Bovinum. This was the chief place of the Penetrans in Samnium, the wealthiest City the best provided, and most furnished of all other with men and munition. The soldiers, very eager and sharp for hope of a rich pillage upon the Town, but forth that they were nothing so angry and hot of revenge as before, they dealt not so cruelly with the enemies: but they got together and carried away more spoil and baggage from them, than they ever had well near out of all Samnium; and as liberally was bestowed every whit upon the soldiers. And forasmuch as no pitched battel in plain field, no Camp so well fortified, no Cities and Forts, howsoever fenced, were able to withstand the puissant Romans in force of open arms: all the Princes in Samnium studied and applied their wits to find means of sleight and subtil policy: if haply, as they waited and foraged the Territories after a loose and licentious manner, the Army disbanded once, might be entrapped and enclosed within some ambush. It fell out so, that certain fugitive peasants of the Country, and Captives, some by chance, and other of purpose, coming in their way, made relation of tidings to the Consuls, well agreeing all in one tale, and the same founding of a truth indeed, namely, that a great flock of sheep and other cattel were driven together into a by-forest out of the way: and so induced them to lead thither the Legions lightly armed, and to fit their hands with a fat booty. Now the Samnites had privily forelaid all the high waies with a mighty army, and after that they saw the Romans to have entered & engaged themselves within the chafe or forest aforelaid all of a sudden

* A Legion consisted first of 4000 footmen, then of 3000, and then of 2000, and then of 1000, and then of 500, and then of 250, and then of 125, and then of 62, and then of 31, and then of 15, and then of 7, and then of 3, and then of 1, and then of 0.

A sudden they role up and with a great cry and shout ran upon them to charge them when they least thought of any such thing. At the first this so strange and unexpected offence made them afraid: while they took them to their weapons, and laid their standards and baggage together on a heap in the midst. But after that every man was cased of his load, and had put on his armor, they rallied on all sides to their ensigns; and without the command or direction of any man they themselves put the battel in array. Each one knowing his rank and place according to the accustomed order of the ancient Military discipline. The Consul perceiving that he was brought to a most doubtful and dangerous battel, alight from his horse: and protected before Jupiter and Mars, and the other gods, whom he hailed all to witness: "That the came next to that place to get glory to himself by any enterprise, but only a booty for his soldiers: and that no fault should be imputed unto him, but an overmuch desire and affection of his country, his soldiers him else, but the manhood and prowess of his soldiers: nothing could dice and a quit to slay themselves and endanger all together to set upon their enemy, dedicated and committed in battel driven out of Camp and field, increased of his Towns and strongholds, and to attempt his last and utmost hope of privacy and thereof his means of foraying, trusting upon the advantage of the ground, and not pure force of arms, but his own valour, trusting upon the invincible of the valiant Romans: Here withal he named the Cattle of Freddie and Socra, and soldiers encouraged and enflamed, forgetting all diffidencies and dangers, marched apace and adheads. Where the Romans found some difficulty at the while they climbed up the cliff or ridge of plain in the top, and perceived they were embattled upon an even and equal ground, presently the terror turned upon those that lay in wait for them, and being disbanding, scattered, and did on to and lurking holes wherein before they had hid themselves. But each of the diffident places which they had sought of purpose for their enemy, and their own deceit and guile, encompassed themselves. For very few of them could find the way out and escape by flight, inasmuch as to the number of 20000 were slain. And then the Romans after this victory ran up and down at their pleasure to that booty of sheep and cattel, which was first presented unto them by the enemy, as a bait to catch them with.

While these things thus went in Samnium, all the people of Hebrunia by this time, but only the Aretins, were up in arms, and entered into a right great war; beginning first with the siege and assault of Survium: which City being allied to the Romans, was (as a man would say) the very Barriers of all Hebrunia. Thither came the other Consul Emilius with an army to relieve and deliver their allies, and to raise the siege. Against the Romans coming, the Aretins cunningly brought the fight they should make a short war of it, by hot assaults, or temporise, in consulting whether they should fight. The morrow water, when as the Captains listed rather of expedition and batty: over signal of battel, and armed they go forth of their Camp into the open field to fight. While it was to the Consul, presently he commanded a watch-word to be given, that the soldiers should take their breakfast; and after they had refreshed and strengthened their bodies with food, go straight to arm themselves: which was obeyed accordingly. The Consul seeing them well appointed in readiness, commanded the ensigns to advance forward out of the rampier, and not firing, and waiting that the shout and charge should begin from the adverse part. But it was paid first, because they should not go away without doing somewhat. The Tulcans began to set up a cry the trumpets found the charge, and the standards came forward. Neither were the Romans shy and fery; the enemies more in number the Romans better in hardiness and virtue. The fight were most forward and valiant: neither began they to shrink on any part, before that the end of their wearied fellows. The Tulcans forthwith to the forefront of the vanward, into the place any new succours both before and all about their ensigns were been down and slain every man. Never in any one battel had there been less running away, or more bloodshed, if the night had not protected the Tulcans: so resolute were they all to die in the place, inasmuch as the winners gave over play before the losers. After the first fight the retreat was sounded: as the winners purrs returned into the Camp. After this, no exploit was performed before Survium that year, but the battel deceived and destroyed; and they had none left but the Subsidary soldiers of the rearward, and those hardly able and sufficient to guard and defend the Camp: and also, the Romans were so hurt and sore wounded, that there were more of them died after the battel of their hurts than were slain in the very skirmish outright. Q. Fabius, Consul for the year following, succeeded.

Julius the Consul to his soldiers.

that came, and had nothing now to cover and protect them sufficiently; whilst some of them alto gave ground and retreated and the whole battle was wavering and unsteady, the Roman Hastati et Principes, came forward with a new shout, and charged them afresh. This violent assault could not the Tuſcans bear, but turning their ensigns, fled again in disorder toward their camp.
 But when as the Roman horsemen who were rid over through the plains and had gotten before, met them afresh in the rout, they left their way unto the Camp, & turned toward the mountains:
 from whence with their whole company in a manner disarmed and fore wounded, they recovered the forest Ciminia. The Romans having slain many thousands of the Tuſcans, gained thirty eight ensigns of the field, and won also their tents with rich pillage; began to consult about pursuing the enemy. The wood Ciminia was at that time more unpassable and to be feared, than were of late daies the German forests: for never to that day had it been travelled and frequented so much as by merchants. And scarcely any one but the Captain himself durst venture to enter into it: for all the rest had not forgot as yet the unhappy luck they had at Candum. Then the Consul his brother, one that was there, (M. Fabius, as some say, as others, Cato, and as other some C.
Claudius, his brother only by the mothers side) promised that he would go as a scout inipially, to defray the wood and within a while bring certain news. He had in his tender years been brought up at Cere, among the ancient friends of his house and family, where afterwards he was taught the Tuſcan learning and knowledge, and thereby was perfect in their tongue and language. And I find some authors of credit that writ, how in those daies the Romans young child-en went to school to learn to pass Tuſcan, as now they do to speak Greek. But it standeth more like a truth, that there was some special matter in this man, who with so bold semblance and dissimulation, durst intrude and infiltrate himself amongst the enemies. It is said, that one only servant accompanied him, one who had been brought up and nursed together with him, and thereupon not ignorant of the same language. And all the way as they went they did nothing else, but superficially and after a general sort, learn the nature and site of the quarters which they were to enter into, and the names wishall, of the chief rulers and principal personages of that country and nation: to the end that in their speech and talk, they might not falter and trip, and be taken tardy in any apparent thing, which might bewray and discover them. They went clad in pastoral weeds like herd-men, armed like country Kernes or Peasants, each of them with a fashlion and two javelins. But neither the familiar use and commerce of the tongue, nor the fashion of apparel which they were, or weapons that they carried saved them so much as this one thing, That no man would ever believe, that any to reiner and intruder durst enter upon those thick Ciminian forests. Well, forward they went (by report) as far as to the Camertins in Umbria. There the Roman ventured to bewray who they were: and when he was brought in to their Senat, he treated with them in the Consuls name, about a league and amity. Whereupon, after he had been courteously entertained and friendly intreated he had his dispatch, and was willing to relate unto the Romans, That there should be ready for their army, sufficient victuals for one whole month, if they would come into those parts: Also, that the youth of the Camertins in Umbria should be at their command, prest in arms at all times. These tidings being reported to the Consul, after that he had sent before his carriages at the first watch of the night and commanded the legions to goaster, himself staid still with the horsemen: and the morrow morning by day-light he began to skirmish with the corps de qua of his enemies, which were quartered without the forest, and when he had long enough kept them off and amused them at his pleasure, he retired into his Camp: from whence he went forth at another gate, and before night overtaken the main army. The morrow after, at the point of day-break he was got up to the crest of the hill Ciminia: from whence, after he had beheld and viewed the goodly prospect of the rich grounds and fields of Hetruria, he sendeth out his soldiers abroad to forage and fetch in prizes, and by that time they had got, and were driving in great haile, and of a sudden, by the States of that country met with the Romans: but so out of order were they that being come to rescue a prey, they had like to have been a prey themselves. A number of them were slain or put to flight, and the Romans, having waited and made spoil all over the country, enriched with store of all things, returned victorious into their Camp. Thither were arrived (as it is said) five messengers or pursuivants with the Tribune of the Commons to warn and command Fabius in the name of the Senat, not to pass through the forest Ciminia.
 But the messengers being glad that they came too late for to hinder and interrupt their enterprises returned home again to Rome with news of the victory.

By this expedition and journey made by the Col, the war rather encreased and spread farther, than was dispatched & brought to an end. For all that traſt lying along the bottom & foot of the mountain Ciminia, felt the smart of this rode: and provoked to anger & desire of revenge, not only the State of Hetruria, but also the border: and marches of Umbria. Whereupon there came to Umbria, a greater power than ever afore: for not only they removed their Camp forward out of the wood: but also for the eager desire of fight withal speed, they came abroad into the plain field.
 Afterwards, they found first embattelled in a plot, by them fitly chosen, leaving over against them a space of ground for the enemies to set themselves in order of battle: but perceiving the enemies to fall off & loath to fight, they approached the very rench and rampiers: but finding there, that the guards were retired within their hold all at once they began to cry with one voice to their captains for to give order, that the rest of their allowance of victuals for that day should be brought them

A them thither out of the camp; for they would stay in their armor and harness, as they were, and either in the night, or else in the morning betimes by day light, give the assault upon their enemies camp. The Roman army was no more quiet then they, yet at their Generals commandment kept in. Now it was the tenth hour of the day; when as the Consul commandment kept he should give them the signal of battle. And in the mean time he kept a short speech unto them, praising highly, and letting out of the Samnites wars, debating the Tuſcans, saying, that there was no comparison between either enemy to enemy, or number for number: over and besides, he said that he had another feat and fiercer device in store for them, which they should know when time served in the mean while they must keep silence of necessity, and hold their peace. By these dark speeches and hidden mysteries, he made assurance, as though he had some privy intelligence, that one part of the enemies would betray the rest when time came: this did he, to the end, that the heart of his soldiers (which haply were dismayed and discouraged at their great misadventures) might be comforted and refreſhed: and for that the enemies lay abroad in field without any hold and fort, it was more likely and probable, which he pretended. The soldiers having taken their refreshment, they laid their bodies to repose and sleep, and somewhat before the rising of their watch, they were rised without noise, and armed themselves. The soldiers having taken their refreshment as followed the camp, had mattocks and spades divided amongst them, to call down the ram-pires, and to fill up the ditches with the bank, whithers that within the compass and circuit of the camp, they were marshalled with the bank, whithers that within the compass and circuit of the gates and passages forth. Then at the found of trumpet, a little before day (as high in summer nights is the time of the deepest and soundest sleep) the whole army, when the rampire was laid open and level, issued forth at once, and charged the enemies on all sides lying there: the rampire was on the ground. Some before they were stirring, others half asleep and half awake in their enches: but the great part, making halt in that sudden sight to take arms, were slain and cut down, and no captains to direct them, were by the Romans in disorder, put to flight, and cut in the woods were the last place of refuge. For their camp pitched in a plain, was the same day taken and won. All the gold and silver there found, was by express commandment brought unto the Consul his pavilion: the rest of the pillage, was the soldiers share. Slain and taken prisoners D day, there were of the enemies to the number of 6000. This noble a battle (some writers say) was fought on the other side of the wood Ciminia, before Persia, who also report, that the City of Rome was in great fear, lest that the army being inclosed within so dangerous a wood, should have been surprised and defeated by the Tuſcans and Umbrians, who were then up in arms together with all parts. But wherefore it was fought, the Romans had the day. Whereupon there came Embassadors from Persia, * Corintha, and * Artemis, where were in manner the chief and princeliest Cities at that time of all Tuſcans, treating and suing to the Romans for peace, and a league.
 During these affairs in Hetruria, the other Consul, C. Martius Rutilius was from the Samnites the town * Alipha. Many other villages and castles were either utterly demolished, or else de-E by way of extrem hostility, or yielded safe and whole unto their subjection. At the same time Roman navy also, under the Conduct of P. Cornelius, whom the Senat ordained Admiral of the sea-coast, left sail for Campania, and being arrived at * Pompeii, the mariners and servants went aland to wait and forage the territories about * Nucerina, and after they had made spoil, and piled by (inches the parts lying nearest unto the sea, from whence they might safely again return to their ships; they adventured farther for twelvemonth of gain and booty (as usually it falleth out) and so gave the alarm to the enemies for to rise. As they straggled all over the fields, no man in the head against them at what time, as they might have been soon slain every one; but as they were returning with a disordered march, and stood not upon their guards, a troop of the peasants of the country overtook them, not far from the Ships, and cald them of their spoils and pillage, F and flew some of them: the rest of the multitude, as many as escaped the sword, were chased to their fleet.

The journey of Q. Fabius beyond the forest Ciminia, as it caused great fear in Rome, so it gave occasion of as joyful news in Samnium. For the rumor ran, that the Romans army was shut up and besieged. And hereupon they called to remembrance, and alledged the like example of a bold and shameful disgrace at Claudius; reporting and giving forth, that these Romanes being a bold greedy always of encroaching farther, and winning more ground, were through the same rashness now run headlong into the blind forests impatiently, and invincibly not to such with the power and face of enemies, as the dangerous difficulties of those passages. In such sort as in this joy of theirs, they envied also that fortune had turned the glorious honour of the conquest over the C Romans, from the Samnites, to the Tuſcans. And therefore being well appointed with men and armour, they ran out from all parts, to tread down and confound C. Martius the Consul forever: minding from thence, in case Martius would not abide a battle, to go unto Hetruria through the Umbria and Sabinus. But the Consul met with them by the way, where as he was these and such a doubtful event, and much effect of doubt on both sides. And as uncertain as it was, whether part lost more blood, yet the rumor went, that the Romans had the

worfe, by reason of the losse of certain knights and gentlemen of Rome, and Colonels, and one Lieutenant; and that which made most, for that the Consul himself was hurt. Hereupon the brute (as commonly is seen) got more feathers till it flew, and made every thing greater: so as the L.L. of the Senat in Rome, were in great fear and perplexity, and agreed to create a Dictator. Neither was there any doubt at all, but that Papirius (for should be the man, who in those daies was reputed the only warrior above all others. But neither could they be assured of sending a messenger safe into Saminius (considering all the country was up in arms) nor that the Consul was for certain alive. And as for the other Consul Fabius, upon an old secret and private grudge, he maliced Papirius: which quarrell, left it might hinder the service of the Commonwealth, the Senat thought good to send unto him certain Embassadors (as it were) even such as had been Consuls; who of their own authority, as well as by virtue of publick commission from the State, should admonish and counsel him to remit and forget all old displeasures and rancours, for his countries sake. When these peronages were come to Fabius the Col, and had delivered unto him the decree of the Senat, and used withall such speech and reasons of their own, as suited well to the errand they had in charge: the Col casting his eyes down toward the ground, departed from the Embassadors without giving ever a word, and left them doubtfull what he would do. But the night following, in the dead time (as the manner is) he nominated L. Papirius for Dictator. And when these messengers or Embassadors gave him great thanks for mastering and ruling his affections to exceeding well, he held his resolution still of silence, and without any answer given, or mention made of himself, dismissed them; that it might appear, how upon a high mind and haughty stomack, he bridled and kept in that grief of heart and spiteful anger of his. Papirius named C. Junius Brulcus commander of the horse. And while he proposed an act concerning the regiment and command of his army, before the people assembled by the Curia or wards, there happened a matter of ominous presage, which caused that businesse to be put off until the next day: for that the ward Fancia, which by lot had the prerogative now to give the first voices, was noted already for infamous and unhappy, in regard that two calamities which happened in both years, wherein the same Curia likewise began the suffrages first; namely, the taking of the City of Rome, and the Caudine peace, Macer Licinius making that ward ominous and unlucky, for a third losse and calamity received at Cremera. But the next morning, the Dictator, after he had taken new Auspices, went through with the act, and obtained his commission, and set forward with the legions lately mustered and enrolled upon the fearful alarm given, that the Roman army was passed the wood Gymnia, until he arrived at Longula: where, after he had received of the Consul Martius, the old bands of footsouldiers, he brought his forces into the field to give battell. The enemies for their part seemed not to refuse fight: howbeit, as they stood armed and ranged, and neither the one side nor the other would begin to charge, the night came upon them, and forced them to retire. Then they abode encamped near together in rest and quiet for certain daies, neither disturbing their own puiſſance, nor yet disdain and despising their enemies. In this mean time there was doings and war in Etruria: for both there was a battell fought with the army of the Umbrians; howbeit, the enemies were rather discomfited and put to flight than slain, for that they were not able to hold out and maintain fight long with such courage and animosity as they began: and also near the lake and Meare Vadimon, the Tuicans had levied a new army, according to a sacred law, whereby one man had chosen another (who as sworn brethren were to live and die together) where they fought a field, not only with greater number, but also with more courage than ever at any time before: and with such heat of anger and malice one against the other they encountered, that of neither side they thought of discharging shot and flaming darts, but began at the very first with their swords to go to hand-strokes: and the conflict being right fiercely begun, increased still, and waxed hotter in the very skirmish, and continued for a good while doubtfull, that the Romans thought they dealt not with Tuicans so often by them defeated and vanquished, but with some new nation more warlike than they. Noſſow of flight on neither side; downgo the formost, and lay dead before their standards: and left that the ensignes should be left naked and bare, and without the defendants, the second range and ward of the battailion came in place to supply the first: and so till new succours and fresh were set even as far as from the rearward behind, destined for the last help and utmost refuge. And to that extremity of travel and perill they proceeded, that the Roman horsemen abandoning their horses alighted on foot, and were fain to go to the footmen in the forefront of the vanguard, over armor, and over dead bodies, lying all spread upon the ground; which new troop and battailion risen and sprung (as it were) a fresh, to reinforce and strengthen their distressed fellows, disordered the squadrons and ensignes of the Tuicans. The other legionary footsouldiers, wearied (as they were) followed hard and seconded their violence and forceable charge, and at length brake through the ranks of their enemies. Then the Tuicans as thiffe as they stood alone, began to have the worfe, and certain bands gave way and retreated: and when they once turned back, they fell plainly to take their heels and run away. This was the first day, that overthrow and laid along the puiſſance of the Tuicans, who abounded so long in wealth and fortunate prosperity. Their whole flour and strength which they had, was in this battell slain, and at the same time their camp won and ransacked.

With like hazard and glorious successe of the end, was the war managed with the Samnites soon after; who besides all other preparations and ordinary furniture of war, gave order that their

A their army should glitter and shine againe with a new kind of garnishing their battelle and armors. For having divided their forces into two armies, the one had laid their shields with gold, the other with silver. The tunic and fashion whereof was this, that upper part where with the belt growing downward to the girth, was broader, and the head of it of even height: but the nether end their breast and flonack was more pointed wedgewile, for to weld it more nimble; and morions with high crests made a shew of tall stature. The footsouldiers wore a good greave, their wore coats of livery colours; the other with silvered, white linnen: and these had the leading ledge already what preparation there was of brave and goodly armor: and their Captains had damasked gold and silver, but trulling in the sharp edge of iron and steel, and a good heart and fair and replendent, before men come to the sharp point and uncleanly amongst bloody wounds. They went commonly with victory: and to conciliate, that a rich enemy would leave well for a good prize to the conqueror, were he never so poor and needy. With these speeches after that Curia had animated his footsouldiers, he leadeth them into the field: himself he put in the right wing; the left he committeth to the conduct of the General of horse. So soon as they charged one another there was between the Dictator and him; striving much whether of them twain should be commanded, he charged right lustily the right wing of the enemies: from the left point which That he offered and sacrificed unto the Devil and infernal spirits, they lay ever and anon, created already unto them after the manner of the Samnites, and decked with their, conveylivery, and bright silvered armour, tuting in colour thereunto: and withall advanced forward his standards, brake their ranks, and made the battell to shrink evidently and give ground. Which shall the right, wherein the Dictator fighteth in person, come behind and follow the battell: and other, and not carry away with it the greater part of the victory? Herewith he setteth on his footsouldiers, yet gave the horsemen no place in manhood to the footmen, or the service of the Lieutenant, P. Decius on the left, both Consular themselves and chief commanders: M. Valerius on the right horsemen ranged in the wings, exhorted them to take part with them in honor, and rode out to the cross on the sides and flanks of the enemies. Whiles this new terror upon the former, had on every side entered the battell of the enemies; and the Roman legions, to terrify them the more, had redoubled a fresh shout, & charged them with great fury, then began the Samnites to flee again. Now were the fields overtrodden with the bodies of slain men, and the sword thick with armor, ere while there, were not able so much as to keep them, for they were won and rifled before night; but being taken from the enemy, made the goodwill pageant of all other, in the pomp of triumph: which carried so lately a shew and magnificent, that the guilded shields were divided amongst the warders of the company of Bankers and Goldsmiths, to the beautifying of their Hall and Market place. And hereof began first the custome of the Allices, to adorn and set out the common place of the City in their solemn processions, when the sacred images of the gods and holy reliques were carried about for pomp in silver chariotes. And the Romans verily for their part put this goodly trim and pride and inveterate hatred that they bare against the Samnites, into their arms their pride and fencers at the sharp (which was a solemn fight and pastime they had at their great feasts) with this same attire, and termed them in mockery, by the name of Samnites.

The same year Fabius the Consul fought with the rest of the Tuicans at Pernia (which City also had broken the covenant of truce) where neither doubtfully nor hardly he obtained victory. And the very town it self he had forced & won (for in the same train of his conquest he approached a good garrison at Pernia, and lent before him to yield the City. When he had planned for a more magnificent victory, then the Dictator, made his triumphant entry into the City during the Samnites, was alienated to the Lieutenants P. Decius, and M. Valerius, therefore at the next Election, the people with general assent declared the one Consul, and the other Pretor, for the league P. Decius was created Pretor the fourth time, and the other Pretor, M. Valerius was created Pretor the fourth time, and had for his Colleague, and had siege to the City of the Albiates, and won it by assault; and not withstanding they made it. With the Samnites he fought a battell; but without any great conflict, the enemies were vanquished, Neither had the remembrance of that field been left in record, but that the Marston first took arms and warred with the Romans. After the Marston were revolved, the Pelignians did the formidable and sped alike. Decius also the other Consul had good success in his wars. He drove the Tarquinians for fear, to find the army corn, and to sue for a truce of forty years. Certain castles and holds of the Volturnians, he forcefully won: some of them he utterly rased, for that they should not be any receptacle or harbour for the enemies. And with warring round about every where, he became so terrible, that the whole Tuiscan nation made sure to the Consul for peace and confederacy. It they could not obtain: but truce for a year was granted. In regard whereof, for that year they satisfied the whole pay for the army, and a double livery for every soldier was exacted and taken of them. This was the pension and fine that their truce cost them.

But now when all was quiet among the Tuiscans, the sudden revoking of the Umbrians, a nation free, and (save hitherto from the calamities of war, but only that the Roman army passing through their territories troubled all anew: for they having raised the strength and flower of their youth and solicited also a great part of the Tuiscans to rebel, levied so great a power that making no account of Decius, whom they left behind them in Hebrunia, they gave out proud words of themselves, and spake basely of the Romans, vaunting and boasting that they would march right forth to assault Rome. Which designe of theirs, so soon as it was reported to Decius the Cos, he made speed, and by long journeys departed out of Hebrunia toward the City, and in the Country of the Papinians, encamped himself; listening ever after the enemies, what they meant to do. Neither at Rome was the Umbrians war neglected and left light by: for their very threats and menaces scared them, as who already had seen by experience, by the foil they had at the Gauls hands, how unsecure a City they inhabited and not unpreparable. Therupon messengers were dispatched to the Cos, Fabius, that if he had any breathing time, and rest from the Samnites war, he should with all speed lead his army into Umbria. The Cos obeyed, and by great journeys went forward to Mevania, where at that time the forces of the Umbrians lay. This sudden and unexpected coming of the Cos, whom they thought verily occupied in Samnium far enough off from Umbria, to the tenth of the Umbrians, that some gave advice to retire back to their walled towns, others to relinquish the war altogether. One Canton or tract of their country (which they themselves call Maierona not only kept the rest in arms, but also let them on to fight immediately, so as they charged upon Fabius, as he was trenching and fortifying. Whom when the Cos saw rushing upon his rampiers in such heaps, he called his men from their work, and as the ground & time would give leave, he marshalled them in order of battel: and after he had encouraged his soldiers with a true report & discourse of many glorious and honourable journeys achieved as well in Thuleia as also in Samnium, he willed them to dispatch this small residue of the Tuiscan war, that hung by and remained behind, and to be revenged of that accursed and impious speech, whereby they threatened to assail the City of Rome. These words of his were heard by the soldiers with such alacrity and cheerfulness of heart, that before their General had made an end of his speech, they set up a shout of themselves and interrupted him: and thus before commandment and signall given by sound of trumpets and cornets, they ran amain upon the enemies, and charged them as if they had not been men, and thole also armed. For (a wonderful thing to be spoken) at the very first they began to pluck the banners and streamers out of the bearers hands, after that, the ensign-bearers themselves were led to the Consuls, and the soldiers armed as they were, transported out of one battalion into another, and where there was any scuffling, they fought not so much with sword as buckler: and what with their bodies and iron pikes, and what with juggling, shouldering, and striking the enemies about the arme-pits, they were overthrowen and felled. In which skirmish, more men were taken then slain: and no other cry was heard throughout the field, but down with weapon, down with weapon. So that in the very conflict, the principal authors of the war rendered themselves: and the morrow after, and other daies following, the rest of the people of Umbria likewise yielded. The Oriculans by stipulation only and pledges given, were received in amity. And Fabius having thus got the victory in that war, which fell to another mans lot and charge, let back his army again into his own province. And in regard of his prosperous and happy exploits, like as the people the year past continued his Consulship so the Senat against the year following, when Ap. Claudius, and L. Volturnius were Cos, prorogued his martial rule till, maugre the heart of Appian, who was greatly against it. In some Chronicles I find, that Appian, while he was Senator fued to be Consul, and that his Election was crossed and staied by L. Furius, a Tribune of Com. until he had resigned up the Ceniorship. Being created Cos, and the war with the Salentines (declared new enemies) allotted unto his Colleague, he remained at Rome: that by civil policy, and managing home-affairs, he might augment his own fate and authority, since that the honour of war-service rested in the hands and conduct of another. Volturnius had no cause to repent of his charge and province: for many fortunate battels he fought, and some towns of the enemies by force he won. He was a bountiful giver of the spoil away unto his soldiers: and this bounty in it self alone acceptable, he helped much with great courteisie and gentleness, by which vertues and artificial means, he made the soldiers both venturous in perils and hardy in travel.

Q. Fabius on the other part, in quality of pro-Consul, gave battell to the Samnites near the City Alifia, where the day was nothing doubtful. The enemies were discomfited and beaten into their camp: neither had they been able to have kept the field, but that there was but a little

A little day left behind: and yet before night, they were set round about in their hold, year, and watched with good guards all night long, that none should make escape. The morrow morning ere it was well day light, they began to yield themselves, and to capitulate, that as many Samnites as there were among them, should be lent forth in their single garments, and they all went under the gallows. As for their confederats and allies, there was no such promise nor capitulation made: but they all, to the number of seven thousand, were sold as slaves, and were a galled. As many thole Fabius lent to Rome to be Henicks, were kept apart by themselves to be forth comers. All in a publick mulier they were pressed soldiers or voluntarily served under the Samnites against the Romans, they were committed to be kept in ward among sundry nations of the Latins: during thole were now created) had in charge to propose that matter anew unto the Senat. The Henicks took that ill. Whereupon the Anagnins held a Diet or General Councell in the round Cirque, which they call Maritima, of all the Cities of that Nation, except the Alatrinats, Ferentians, and the Verulans. Where the whole State of Henicks proclaimed war against the people of Rome. In Calatia and Sora were forced, and the Roman garrisons that there lay, were put to the sword, and upon the bodies of as many as they took alive, they exercised much torture and cruelty. Whereupon Publius Cornelius the Consul was thither sent. And to Martius were the new enemies appointed (for by this time decreed it was, That war should be made upon the Anagnins and the other Henicks.) At the first the enemies had solicited all the convention of paces and waies between both the Consuls camps, that there could not readily passe a lackey or carrier between, in so much, as for certain daies both Consuls abode doubtful how the world went, and uncertain one of the others fate. The fear whereof, spread to Rome, so as the younger sort [from seventeen years of age to seven and forty] were to leave, as all sudden occasions, and occurred whatsoever, two full and compact armies were levied and equipped. But the Henick war was nothing correspondent either to the present menaces, or to the ancient glory and reputation of that nation: for having done no worthy adventures, and within the few daies lost their camp thrice, they covenanted forth to have thirty daies truce: during which time, they might send Embassadors to the Senat of Rome: and in consideration hereof, they D promised to lay down two months pay, and to find corn for the army, and allow every soldier one coat. But from the Senat they were put off and referred to Martius: unto whom by order and so he took the whole nation as yielded to his devotion. The other Consul in Samnium being in forces more puissant then the enemy, was not withstanding encumbered much with the difficulty of the ground. All the passages had the enemies stopped, and possessed himself of the difficult woods which were thorow faires, that no way victuals might be conveyed unto him. Nevertheless the Consul, for all that daily he displayed banner in field, train them forth to fight: so as it was well seen, that neither the Samnites could aside present battell, nor the Romans long de- E lay of war. But the arrival of Martius who upon the subduing of the Henicks, made halt to aid his Colleague, caused the enemy to defer no longer the trial of the field. For, they, who thought themselves not good enough to match so much as the one army, knew full well that if they suffered two Consuls armies to join together, there had been no hope left. They therefore set upon Martius as he marched without order of battell. Hereupon in all halt their trunks and standards were brought together and laid in the middle; and as the time would permit, he let his soldiers in array. At the first encounter, the shout was hard into the camp of the other Consul. Afterwards the dust defered afar off, gave an alarm, and made a trouble and tumult there. Then the Consul presently commanded to arm: and hastily bringing his soldiers forth into the field, entered upon the battell of the enemies in the flank, whilst they were busied in another skirmish. Then the Consul prebald to his men, that it were exceeding great shame, to suffer the other army to carry away dou- F ble victory, and not themselves win the honour of that war, which was their proper charge. Thus, wherefoever he charged, he brake in and made entrance, and having pierced and made a great lane through the midst of the enemies battell, he passed on towards their camp, which being void of defendants, he took and set afire. Which when the soldiers at Martius saw burning before their faces, and the enemy likewise, as they looked behind: then began the Samnites on all hands to flee: but killed they were every where down right: all places full of murder were thirty thousand of the enemies slain, the Consuls founded the retreat, and gave both their armies together, with great congratulation one to the other: by which time beheld there were G defenced a far off, certain new bands of enemies, enrolled for a supply; and they gave occasion of a new and fresh slaughter. Against whom without commandment of Consul, or any signall received from their leaders, the Romans advanced fully, crying aloud, that these Samnites were not welcomed with an ill battell, and this their first training should cost them dear. The Consuls seeing the old beaten soldiers to altoned already and flying away, would soon have enough to fight, and not once adventure fight. And they were not deceived in their opinion; for the whole forces of the Samnites as well old and new, fled space unto the next mountains: and thither the Romans

Romans also make as great speed. But no safe place could those vanquished enemies find; for even from the very hill tops which they held, they were beaten down, so that with one voice they all craved peace. Then after the Consuls had imposed upon them corn for three months, and a years pay, and for every soldier a livery besides, they were permitted to send Embassadors to the Senat, to treat and capitulate thereof. During which time, Corneilius was left in Sanninius, and Manlius returned into the City, with triumph over the Hernicks. Moreover a decree passed, that his scarre riding on horseback should remain in the common place of assemblies, which was erected accordingly even before the Temple of Castor. To three States of the Hernicks, to wit, the Alatrinis, the Verulanis and Ferentinis, their own laws, and ancient liberties were restored again, because they made choice thereof, rather than to be enfranchised Citizens of Rome: and permitted they were to marry amongst the Romans, which liberty they only of the Hernicks for a good while enjoyed. The Anagnins, and those that had born arms against the Romans were incorporated free denizens of Rome, but without the privilege of giving voices and suffrages: debarred they were of holding any Councils and making marriages with them, yea, and denied at all to elect any magistracy, but only the function and ministry of divine service and sacrifices.

The same year the Chappell of dame Salus was by C. Junius Bubulcius now Censor, set out at a price to be built, which he in his Consulship had vowed, in the Sannitis war. By his direction and appointment, together with his colleague M. Valerius Maximus, were the great high waies and caueys made, of all sides of the City, through the fields, at the common charge and expences. The same year also, was the league renewed now the third time with the Carthaginians: and K their Embassadors who came for that purpose, were courteously entertained, and rewarded liberally with rich gifts. In that year there was a Dictator P. Cornel. Scipio, with P. Decius General of the horse: and these were Presidents at the Election of Consuls, for to that purpose they were created, because neither of the two Consuls could be spared from the wars. Consuls were created L. Posthumius and T. Minucius. But Piso sayeth, that these Consuls immediately succeeded Q. Fabius and P. Decius: leaving out those two years, wherein he hath written that Claudius with Volturnius, and Corneilius with Martius were Consuls. Whether he forgot himself in digressing his Annals and yearly records, or of set purpose overhight two couple of Consuls, thinking that they were not in truth Consuls, I wot not.

The same year the Sannitis made rodes into the territories of Stella, within the liberties and appurtenances of the Campains, and therefore both Consuls were sent into Sanninius: who when they were parted into divers wayes, for Posthumius took his journey to Tifernum, and Minucius to Bovianum: first there was battell fought at Tifernum, under the leading of Posthumius. Some make no doubt, but write, that the Sannitis were discomfited, and put to the worle, and thirty thousand of them taken prisoners: others say, that the conflict was equal, and that they departed on even hand: also that Posthumius making semblance of fear, journeyed by night, & closely retired unto his adjoyning, & the enemies followed after them, two miles, and from thence encamped, and fortified also themselves in strong places of advantage. The Consul, because he would be thought to have fought and chose a safe place, and plentifully stored with all necessities (as it was no lesse indeed) where he might keep a standing camp: after he had fortified the same, and furnished it with all kind of provision, leaving behind him a strong garrison for defence: at the relief of the third watch, leadeth the secret way, his legions not encumbered with carriage, to his Colleague, who also himself lay in camp over against another army. There, by the perswasion & advice of Posthumius, Minucius gave battell: and when as the conflict continued doubtful untill it was far on the day, then Posthumius with his fresh legions, on a sudden charged the battallions of the enemies, now already overtroyled: but partly for weariness, and partly for wounds, they being disabled for to flee away, were out of all measure slain every one, and xxi. banners were taken: and so from thence they went forward to the camp of Posthumius. Where these two victorious armies finding the enemy discouraged and amazed at the tidings of this overthrow, set upon them, discomfited, and put them to flight: and wan from them xvi. enignes: where the General of the Sannitis Stratius Cellius, with many a man besides, was taken prisoner, and both their camps won. Bovianum also, which the morrow after began to be assaulted, was shortly after forced: and finally with great glory of no noble acts achieved, both Consuls triumphed. Some write that the Consul Minucius being grievously hurt, was brought back into the camp, and there dyed: and that M. Fulvius was substituted Consul in his room: and that it was he, who being sent unto the army of Minucius, wan Bovianum. The same year Sora, Arpinum, and Consentia were recovered from the Sannitis: and the great image of Hercules was in the Capitol set up and dedicated.

When as P. Sulpicius Saverius, and P. Sempronius Sophus were Coll. the Sannitis desiring either to see an end of war, or else to delay it, sent Embassadors to Rome pretending peace. To whom as they pleaded and intreated most humbly, this answer was given: That if the Sannitis had not so often treated for peace, when they intended and prepared war they might after certain entertainments, and conferences passed between them, obtain their suit: but since that evermore untill that time, their words were but wind: now they would trust to their deeds, and nothing else. P. Sempronius the Consul, shall shortly be in Sanninius with an army: who would not be abused, but soon see, whether their minds be inclined to war or peace: and as he found and saw every thing, so would he bring word and make relation: and therefore their Embassadors were to attend upon

A Upon the Consul when he departed out of Sanninius. The same year after that the Romans any had passed peaceably to and fro, and visited all Sanninius, having victuals by the country countermans their forces against the Aequian, their old enemies; but for many years making semblance of the Rogianis, where as indeed their peace was little to be trusted: for that the Hernick nation was and also after the ludding of the Hernicks, the whole nation in a manner without dissembling, and averring all they did by publick councill and authority, had fallen away unto the enemy: and after that the Romans had made league with the Sannitis, and their heralds came to make claim for their goods took from them by way of hostility, they said, It was but a tempting of them to see, whether upon fear of war they would suffer themselves to become Romans. Which, say they, how greatly it were to be with'd, the Hernicks was able to teach them: for they as many of them as had liberty to do what they would, chose rather to live under their own laws, then to be enfranchised citizens of Rome: but others, who had not the same scope to choose to their liking, they were constrained to accept of the Burgeoisie of their City, by way of a punishment. Upon these speeches and arguments commonly tolled in their assemblies and Councils, the people of Rome decreed war against the Aequians: to which both the Consuls went, and encamped four miles from their nearest hill and made no war like as if their army had been levied of a sudden and in haste, without certain Captains appointed, and without any Generall to command, were afraid. Some thought good to go forth into the field, others to defend themselves, and keep within their camp: most of them were moved to think aforehand upon the wailing of their country afterwards, and consequently the destruction of their cities left but with slender garrisons. Therefore after that, as every man to regard his own privat state, and at the first watch to depart divers waies one from the other, and quit the camp, and convey away all their bag and baggage, and to defend their Cities within the wals: they all with one accord accepted thereof, and embraced it. Now when the enemies were thus scattered abroad about the country, the Romans by day-light, with banner displayed went forth into the field: and when they saw no man come abroad to meet them, they marched in warlike order space towards the enemies camp. But when as they could perceive there, neither warders before the gates, nor any man upon the trench & rampiers, nor so much as the usual noise of a leaguer; being moved with this unaccustomed silence, for fear of forelaying and treachery, they stood still: but being got over the rampier, and finding the tents void and empty, they set forward to pursue the enemy by his trace. But when they found their foot-tracks, leading first they wandered out of the way, and missed of them; but afterwards knowing by their epials the purpose and intent of their enemies, they went round about and besieged every City, and in three dayes wan forty towns all by assault: most part wherof were razed even with the ground, and consumed into ashes, and the nation of the Aequians utterly in a manner destroyed. Over the Aequians there was triumph: Whole calamity and desolation was so fearful an example, to the Marrucins, Mariti, Pelignis, and Ferentinis, that they sent Orators to Rome to treat for peace and amity: and to all those nations at their request, a league was granted. The same year, C. Flavius a Notary or Register by profession, whole father Cneus was no better than of a slave loquent withall, arose to be an Adile Censor. I find in some records, that when he gave audience in his calling to the Adiles, and saw that his own Tribe were willing to give him their hogst his living by his pen, he cast aside his books and papers, and Iware an oath, that he would no longer be a Notary and use penance, but Maecius Licinius avoucheth, that he before, that he gave over his writings, namely, after he had been Tribune, and born two Triumvirships, the one for the night magistrates, the other for the placing and transporting of a Colony. But they all agree upon this, that he became very stout, and in great contumacy opposed himself and made head against the Nobles that contemned his base birth. The civil law which before time was laid up in great secret by the Pricils, and Prelats in their Arches, law published abroad: and set up a table in the great common place, in manner of a Calendar, wherein all men might know workes daies from holy-daies; when it was lawfull to plead, and when not. Also in despite, and to the great heart-burning of the Patricis, he dedicated the temple of the goddesse Concordia upon the Court of Falcan: and by the general nounce the certain form of words thereto belonging; norwithstanding he contended and denied, that by the customs of their forefathers any could dedicate a Temple, unless he were either Consul or General of an army. And therefore by the authority of the Senat, a law was presented to the people, Cornelius Barbanus the high Priest was compelled to endite and protest a thing, of itself not worthy of remembrance, but only for a proof and example of the liberty of the Commons against the pride and insolence of the Nobles. This Flavius, coming upon a time to visit his Colleague lying sick, by a complot afore hand of certain young gentle-gentleman of the Patricians: that sat by his bed side, had no reverence done unto him, nor any one so much as rose up at entrance into the chamber: whereupon, he commanded his ivory chair of State to be brought unto him: and set him self upon it; and so he outfaced his adversaries, that were vexed to the heart with envy of his dignity. This Flavius was nominated & chosen Ædile, by the bare faction of the commons: banding together in the place of assemblies: who first took heart by the Consorship of Appius Claudius the first that ever distained and polluted the Senat, by bringing in the Sons of Libertines: and when he saw that no man accounted that Election of Senators good and lawful, and perceived withall, that in the Court he had not that backing of Citizens which he sought for; he intermingled in every Tribe certain of the most base persons of the Commons: and so he corrupted both the common place and Mars field also. In so much as the Election of Flavius was reputed to unworthy an indignity, that most of the gentlemen of Rome laid away their gold rings and rich trapping of their horses which were the ornaments and ensigns of their calling. And from the time forward the City was divided into two parts. One side was maintained and upheld by the true hearted people, such as favoured and loved good things: the other by the faction of ruffe-raffe and scum of the City; untill the time that Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Censors. Fabius to bring the City unto an uniform accord, and to withstand this inconvenience, that the Elections of Magistrates should not be carried away by the strong hand of the vilest and most abject persons, made a separation of all that base rabble, and call them into four Tribes and called them Verbanæ. Which action of his (men say) was accepted with so great contentment and thankfulness, that upon the good temperance of degrees, he purchased the surname of Maximus, which in so many victories he had not acquired and obtained. By him also (by report) it was ordained and instituted, that on the Ides of July, the horsemen rode, as it were, in a solemn muster, and shewing their great horses to the Censor.

* Tribes of the City such as were born to no lands in the country: all the rest were named Rustici, or.

The Tenth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Tenth Book.

Two Colonies were planted in Sora and Alba. The marquis of Carleola, were reduced under obedience. The fellowship of the Æquians was augmented to the number of nine, whereas before they were wont to be but five. The law or edict as touching the appealing to the people was now the third time proposed by Valerius the Consul. Two Tribes more were added to the rest, Anienis and Terentina. War was denounced against the Samnites, and fortunately fought with them. When time as there was a battell given to the Tuscani, Umbrians, Samnites and Gauls, under the conduct of P. Decius, and Quintus Fabius, and the Roman army was in great extremity of danger, P. Decius following the example of his father, devoted and exposed himselfe to die voluntarily, for to save the host: and by his death obtained the victory of that journey, to his countermen and fellow Citizens. Papirius Curior put to flight an army of the Samnites, who were bound by a solemn oath not to depart out of the battell without victory, to the end, that with more magnanimity and resolution, they should enter into the field. The Census was held, and the number taken of the Citizens, with the solemn purging and Lustration of the City. And affected there were 262322 souls.

The Tenth Book of T. Livius.

When L. Gentilius and Ser. Cornelius were Consuls, there was rest in a manner from all wars abroad; in such sort, as they had leisure to place certaine Colonies at Sora and Alba: And for Alba there were enrolled 6000 inhabitants, to assist the Æquians. As for Sora, it had sometimes belonged to the Volscians territory; but the Samnites usurped the possession of it, and thither four thousand were sent to inhabit. The same year, the Arpinati and Trebulani were enfranchised denizens at Rome. The Frustrans were fined with the losse of one third part of their lands: for they were evidently detected to have solicited the Hernicks to rebellion: and after that the Consuls Commission from the Senat, had made due inquiry into the principall heads of that conspiracy, were scourged and beheaded, yet because there should not pass a year clean without war, a journey was made (such a one as it was into Umbria); upon news, that there used to issue forth day by day, certain men in arms out of a cave, and to make rodes into the country about. Into this cave or peak, the Romans entered with their ensignes displayed: where by reason that it was a blind corner, they received many a wound, and specially by throwing of stones

A stones; untill such time as they found the other mouth of the cave; for it was a thorough-fare. So they piled a deal of wood together at both ends, and let it on fire: with the smoke and vapour whereof there were about 2000 armed men driven out of their hole, who rushing at last into the flame desirous to escape were smothered and burnt to ashes.

When as M. Lucius Denter, and C. Æmilius, were Consuls, the Æquians began to war again: for they hardly could abide and endure that a Colony should be planted upon their borders, as a lustily repulsed by the Inhabitants only within the town. Howbeit, such a fear they made at Rome, because it was not thought credible, that the Æquians alone of themselves, to difficult as they were, would be so hardy as to take arms, that in regard of that trouble a Dictator was named to wit C. Junius Brutulus, with T. Titinius General of the horse. Who at the Dictator was named to the Æquians, and upon the eighth day of his government returned into the City in triumph: the now the Dictator, dedicated the Temple of Salus which he had vowed being Consul, and put out to workmen for to be builded while he was Censor.

The same year a fleet of Greeks under the conduct of Cleonymus a Lacedæmonian, arrived upon the coast of Italy, and won Thurium, a City of the Salentines. Against this enemy was the Consul Æmilius sent who in one battell discomfited him, and drove him aboard. Thus Thurium was rendered again to the former Inhabitants, and the Salentine Country obtained peace and quietness. I find in some Records, that it was Jun. Brutulus the Dictator who was sent to the Æquians.

C and that Cleonymus before he was to encounter with the Romans, departed out of Italy. From thence he fetched a compass, and doubled the point of Brundisium, and sailed with a fore-wind through the midle of Venice gulph: for that on the left hand the flavens and harbours of coasts of Italy, and on the right, the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Istrians, betwixt nations, and for the most part reputed intemperate, for roving and robbing by the sea-side, put him in exceeding fear. So he discovered the Coasts: but hearing that the strand that lay out against them was not broad and spawled with the sea-sides, and that not far off might be seen the champion fields near hand, and his beyond: and discovering by this means the mouth of a very deepe river, into which he saw, that the ships might be brought about as into a sure harbour (now that rivers name was Medea stream). The heavie vessels the chanel of the river would not bear: but the souldiers were transported in lighter barks and small pinaces, and so fell at length with the level and the plain Country.

D that the ships might be brought about as into a sure harbour (now that rivers name was Medea stream). The heavie vessels the chanel of the river would not bear: but the souldiers were transported in lighter barks and small pinaces, and so fell at length with the level and the plain Country. Being once landed, and having left a slender guard for their ships, they take Towns by assault, burnt houses, plunder and drive away prizes both of men and cattell: and when they had once tasted of the sweetness of booty and pillage, they went far from their ships. The alien hereof was given at Pavanius (now the Patavins were always in arms, because of the Gauls their borderers.) Whereupon they divided their fighting youth into two regiments: the one was led in to those quarters whereas the report went, that the Greeks foraged here and there all abroad: the other, because they would not meet with the Greeks foraged here and there all abroad: way to the harbour, where the ships lay (about fourteen miles from the Town). And after they had slain the warders, they charged upon the small barks. Whereupon the mariners were afraid, and were forced to retire their vessels to the other bank-side. Likewise upon the main they peyled about, the Venicians encountered them afresh, and made head against them. So the enemies were environed in the midle, and most of them slain: some that were taken prisoners, bewrayed showed the prisoners sure enough in ward within the next village: some men with soldiers

F the river-vessels, made fitly and framed with flat bottoms, to pass over the meers and shallow way space to give an assault upon the main fleet, and beat the ships which rid at anchor, and made durst not weigh and remove, fearing not the enemy, so much as the unknown coasts. These I open sea, without any resistance at all, they were pursued and chased into the mouth of the river. Thus when they had taken the enemies ships, and fired others, newly such as forer and Cloromus hardly saved the fifth part of his fleet. And thus having had no good luck in attempting to land in any coast of the Adriatick sea, he departed. The fleets of the ships, with their beaks, heads, and brazen pikes, together with the spoils of the Lacedæmonians, were let up in the old Temple of Juno, and there be many at this day alive, which have seen them. The memorial of this sea-fight, is celebrated yearly (upon the very same day that it was fought) at Pavanius, with a solemn skirmish and combate of ships repleined upon the river, within the midle of the City.

The same year was a League made at Rome with the Vellins, who came to sue for peace and amity. But from that time, there arose many and divers fearful occurrences. For news came that that Heituria rebelled, which troubles took their beginning by occasion of the civil dissention and discord of the Arctins: who began to expell by force of arms the house and family of the Licinii (mighty and puissant above the rest) for very envy and repine of their wealth and riches. Over and besides, the Marfians stood out, and by arms maintained their title to that part of their territory, into which there had been a Colony of Carcolians brought, to the number of four thousand men, enrolled there to inhabit. Against which stir and tumults, Marcus Valerius Maximus was created Dictator, who made choice of M. Amylius Paulus to be the Commander of the Horse. Which I rather beleve to be true, than that Q. Fabius, a man of those years and that worth, after so many honourable dignities, should be under Valerius. But I would not deny, that the error might grow by reason of the surname of Maximus. The Dictator having taken the field with his Army, in one battell discomfited the Marfians: and after he had driven them into their walled and fenced Towns, Milontana, Plefsina, and Frefilia within few daies, he won them also over their heads: and having fined the Marfians with the loss of some part of their Territory, he received them into their ancient League again. Then all the forces were employed against the Tufcans: and whiles the Dictator was departed to Rome to take his Auspices anew, the General of Horse, being gone out a foraging, was by a secret ambush entrapped. And having lost certain ensignes, he was forced into the Camp, after a foul slaughter and shameful flight of his men. Which fearfull cowardice is not like to have been in Fabius, nor only, be cause if ever he deserved his surname of Maximus by any commendable parts, it was especially for his prowls in war; but also, for that in remembrance of Papirius his cruelty toward him, he never could have been brought to fight, without the commandment or permission of the Dictator. This difcomfite and loss being reported at Rome, caused a greater terror than there was cause. For no less than if the Army had been utterly defeated, there was published and proclaimed a stay and cessation of all law-matters, warders bestowed at the gates, order taken for standing watches in every street, and armour and darts carried up to the walls. And after that all the younger fort were sworn and prest to serve the Dictator was sent again to the Army. Where, he found all more quiet than he looked for, through the careful diligence of the General of Horse. The Camp was removed to a place of more strength and safety, the bands and companies which had lost their ensignes, left on the bare earth without the rampiers, destitute of tents and covert; and the army eager and desirous of fight, to do away and rale out the former ignominy and shame. Presently therefore he raised his Camp, and removed forward into the country of Rafella. Thither followed the enemies also hard at heels: Who albeit upon their late good speed, they were in right great hope and affiance, to be strong enough even in open field and plain field; yet they afraid the enemy also by the same sleights and trains which they had already fortunately tried. There fortune to be in the country thereabout, not far from the Romans Camp, certain houses half pulled down and ruinate, belonging to a village which was burned when the country was over-run: where, after they had bestowed choicely certain men in arms, they drave their beasts and cattle in the very sight of the Roman corps de garde, commanded by C. Fulvius, a Lieutenant: at which bait, when as there stirred no man from the Roman wards, one of the Heardmen advanced even under the very trench and fortifications of the Romans, and called aloud to the rest (that seemed for fear to drive but slowly from the ruins of the village aforesaid) asking why they staid behind, seeing they might safely march, and pass forward still (as it were) through the middle of the Roman Camp? These words certain Carists interpreted to the Lieutenant Fulvius. Whereat, every band or company of souldiers took great indignation, but durst not stir a foot without a warrant. Then he commanded those that were skillful in the tongue to mark whether their language sounded nearer to the speech of peasants or to Citizens: Who brought word, that both their voice, and also the habit and fresh hue of their bodies, was more elegant and civil than for country shepherds. Go your waies then, quoth he unto them and bid them beware and discover their ambush: which in vain they seem to hide: forth that the Romans were cunning in all things, and adverted of their designs, and could no more now be overtaken with wiles, than overcome by arms. When these words were once heard and carried to those that lay in wait, presently they start up out of their lurking holes, and brought forth their ensignes all abroad into the open field. The Lieutenant supposing they were a greater troop than might be dealt withall and marked by his corps de garde, with all speed sent for aid to the Dictator: and in the mean while himself received and bare off the brunt and forcible charge of his enemies. This message was no sooner brought, but the Dictator commanded the standards to be advanced and the souldiers to arm and follow: but every thing was done sooner almost than it could be commanded: forthwith they caught up the ensignes and took weapon in hand: and scarcely could they be held in, but that they would run again. For not only the speciall anger of the late received loss pricked them on, but also the shouts of their fellows, which they might hear more loud, and to be redoubled thicker according as the skirmish grew hotter and hotter. The greater haste therefore they made, whiles one pursued forward another, and urged to the port-ensignes to go faster and mend their pace. But the more haste the Dictator seeth them to make, the more earnest was he to keep them back in their march: and to hold them in: willing them to go fair and softly. Contrariwise the Tufcans, who rose up at the beginning of the battell, were there ready with their whole forces to give the charge. Whereupon there came messenger after messenger to the Dictator, bringing word that all the

A legions of the Tufcans were entered into the fight, and that his men already were not able to resist any longer. Nay himself also, from the higher ground, might see in what danger the corps de garde lay. But presuming and resting upon this conceit, that the Lieutenant was able yet to maintain that the enemies might be wearied and have him out of peril, he was delirious and in heart, should set upon them overtoiled. And albeit they had that his own eyes fresh time had the Horietans but a very small ground to take their run with, yet by this chace the ensignes of his legions, that the enemy should not fear any covert and privy stratagem, but might have room and liberty enough to gallop with ease. Then all the battailon of the Infantry set up a cry and shout when they charged, and withall, the Cavalry, with reins at large entered within the ranks of the enemies, who being not marshalled and set in order against such a blustering storm of Horietans, were with a sudden fear astounded. Whereupon, the troop of Fulvius too late, now all in general breathed themselves at ease, and had help and rest as almost came fresh and lusty undertook the whole weight of the conflict: which was neither long nor doubtful. The enemies were put to flight, and in dismay made haste to recover their camp, and when as the Romans advanced against them with banner displayed, they quit their camp, and retreated, gathering themselves round into heaps in the farthest part of the camp: and as they would have fled out, they stuck fast in the narrow gaps and passages of the gates: a great part of them leapt upon the bank, to climb the rampier, if haply either from the higher ground they might defend themselves, or get over any where and escape. By chance in one place where the bank was not well rammed, the rampier was surcharged with the weight of so many standing upon it, and so tumbled down into the trench. Whereupon, they set up a cry all together, that the Gods had made them way to escape, and by that means indeed they saved themselves, but more of them unarmed than armed. In this battell, were the forces of the Tufcans once again utterly abated: into much as, after they had capitulated and promised a years pay, and corn for two months, the Dictator permitted them to send Embassadors to Rome for a treaty of peace. Peace was denied, but truce for two years granted: and the Dictator with triumph returned into the City. I find in some writers: that Heituria was by the Dictator quietted without any notable battell, only by composing the variance and debate of the Arctins, and reconciling the family of the Licinii with the Commons.

M. Valerius upon his Dictatorship became Consul. Some have believed that he was created without his own suit, yea, and while he was absent, and that the said Election was held by the Interregent. But howsoever it was, out of all question, he bare the Consulship with Apuleius Paulus. Whiles M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius were Consuls, all was well quiered abroad: for the Tufcans of one side, partly upon their ill success in war and partly by reason of their truce, were forced to be still and in repose. The Sannites also on the other side, being well tamed with the overthrow of so many years together, repented not yet and were not weary of their new league. At Rome likewise the Commons were quiet, and found themselves much eased, and discharged of a great number of base and poor people, which were withdrawn and sent away into Colonies. But because their rest should not be every where entire and perfect, there arose a quarrel between the chief and principal men of the City, as well the Nobles as Commons; and that by the instigation and infligation of Q. and Cn. Ogulnius, Tribunes of the Com. Who having sought occasion and matter every way to accuse and blame the Nobility unto the Commons, when they saw all means assayed in vain at length entered into an action, whereby they kindled and set on fire not only the meane, but even the chief heads of the Commons such as had been Consuls and triumphed: who wanted no promotions and honors, but only sacerdotal dignities and Prelacies, which as yet were not differently common to both States. They propoied therefore a Law, that whereas at that time there were but 4. Augurs and as many Prelats or Bishops, and forasmuch as they thought it good, that the number of Priests should be increased, there might be choicely to the rest, 4. Bishops, and 5. Augurs: all out of the body of the Commons. But how this Colledge or Fellowship of Augurs, was reduced to the number of four, but by the death of two, I can not find: time this is certain, that among the Augurs the number must be odd: namely that the three ancient tribes, Ramneses, Fetientes, and Lacertes, should have each one their Augur: or if they needed more, they should with equal number increase those Priests: like as it is to say, for every tribe three. Howbeit five being put to four, made up the number of nine: that is to say, for every tribe three. Howbeit Nobles took it as grievously to the heart, as when they saw the Consulship parted equally in them: who would themselves see, that their holy service and sacred mysteries should not be polluted, should light upon the common-weal. But less earnest were they in opposing themselves and making resistance, for that they were used already in all such broils and contentions, to have the worst and least advantage: and that they were used already in all such broils and contentions, to have the scarce hope for; namely, the greatest honours and dignities: but that they had already obtained all, for which they had strived so long in so doubtful terms of hope, to wit, manifold Consuls, &c.

P. Decius Mus
against Ap.
Clandius.

Censorships, and Triumphs, Howbeit, the contention and dispute in debating and arguing to it and from the law propoſed, was maintained (as men ſay) between Ap. Clandius eſpecially, and P. Decius Mus: and after they had contended and diſcounted in their Orations pro & contra, the ſame reaſons in manner, touching the rights and liberties pretended by the Nobles and Commons, which ſometimes had been alledged, both for, and againſt the law Licinius, at what time as it was let on foot for the Commons to be Conſuls: Decius (as it is ſaid) repreſented in open audience the very reſemblance and ſhew of his father, in ſuch manner, as many of them who were then preſent at the aſſembly, had ſeen him: to wit, girded and apparelled in Gabinie robe, ſtanding over his javelin, in which geſture, habit, and faſhion; he offered himſelf to voluntary death, for to ſave the people and legions of the Romans: “Seemed (quoth he) P. Decius, that I then was Coſ, as pure and religious in the fight of the immortal Gods, as if T. Manlius his colleague had been likewiſe devoted and offered? and might not the ſame P. Decius have rightly been choſen, to execute the publick divine ſervice and ſacrifices of the people of Rome? or is this all the fear and doubt, that the Gods would give leſs ear to his prayers, than to Ap. Clandius? or doth Ap. Clandius with more devotion ſerve God privately, and worſhip the Gods more religiously, than himſelf? Who was there ever that repented or miſliked of the vows, which ſo many Conſuls and Dictators of the Com. either at their firſt ſetting forth to their armies, or in time of war and battel, pronounced for the Common-wealth? Reckon and count the chief Captains, year by year ſince the firſt time that the Commons began to have the leading and conduct of the wars: number all the triumphs ever ſince: it will appear that the Commons are no no whit abaſhed, and have no cauſe to complain of their own nobility. And this I know for certain, that if any new ſudden war ſhould ariſe, the Senat and people of Rome would repoſe no more hope and confidence in the ancient Patritii, than in the Com. for to bethe Captains and Commanders. This being ſo, quoth he, what God or man can think it an indignity, to adorn thoſe perſons alſo with the titles and ornaments of Biſhops and Angurs, whom ye have honoured with chair of Ivory, with the long robe bordered with purple, with the coat of arms embroidered and branched with the palm tree, with the gown or mantle of purple, wrought with divers colours, with the chaplets and coronets of triumph, and with the victorious branch and garland of lawrel? whole houſes ye have beautified above the reſt, with ſetting up the ſpoils of enemies? Or who can think much, if he be ſeen with a ſacring cup, or holy-water pot, and with a crozier ſtaff, and his head vailed, either to kill a ſacrifice, or to take Angury by flight of birds from the caſtle hill: who hath been adorned and decked with the enſigns and ornaments of the great God Jupiter, and hath ridden in a gilded chariot through the City into the Capitol? Or in whole Title, inſcription and ſtile over his image, men ſhall with content read Conſulſhip, Conſulſhip and Triumph: will not the ſame abide to ſee and read that ye have added thereto either Angurſhip, or Pontifical dignity? I verily for my part hope (without the diſpleaſure, and with reverence of the Gods be it ſpoken) that we by the beneficence of the people of Rome are ſuch, as for our quality and worthineſs, may and will yeeld no leſs credit and honor to our Prielt-hoods than we ſhall receive thereby: and who deſire, in regard of the honor and ſervice of God more than for our own ſakes and proper intereſt, to have the means, That whom we M ſerve and reverence in private, thoſe we may alſo worſhip and honor publickly. But why have I hitherto to plead the cauſe, as if the Patritii were entirely alone intitled and inveſted in the prerogative of Sacerdotal Dignities; and as though we were not already poſſeſſed of one right honorable and principal Prielt-hood? We ſee that the Decemvirs for celebration of ſacrifices, and for interpretation of Sibylla her Prophecies, and other the fatal deſtinies of this people, the Prelates alſo and Miniſters of Apollis his ſacrifice, and other Holy Ceremonies, are of the Commons. Neither was there any injury done unto the Patritii at that time, when for to gratify the Commons, the number of the Duumvirs was increaſed: thoſe I mean, who ſhould overſee (as ſuperintendents) the offering of ſacrifices. And now at this preſent they have no greater cauſe to complain, if the Tribune, a ſtout and brave man hath added five places more of Angurs, and four N of Biſhops, unto which commoners may be nominated: not to diſpoſſeſs you of your rooms, or to diſplace you, O Appius, but that men of the commons might aſſiſt you in the function and miniſtery of divine ſervice and Church matters like as they do their part, and perform good ſervice in human and civil affairs. And be not aſſhamed, O Appius, to have him for your colleague in the Prielt-hood, whom you might beſeem to have in Conſulſhip or Cenſorſhip, your companion and fellow: unto whom being Dictator, you might be Colonel of Horſe, as well as he to you in your Dictatorſhip, I thoſe ancient Nobles in old time (our progenitors) admitted into their number and order a Sabine ſtranger, the very head and top of your nobility, one Ap. Claudius, or Ap. Claudius (choſe you whether.) You muſt not think much then, to accept us into the number of Prielts. We bring with us many honorable titles, even all the ſame that make you ſo proud, and O to beſee your head aloft. L. Sextus was the firſt Commoner, created Conſul; and C. Licinius Stolo the firſt Colonel of Horſe. C. Manlius was the firſt Dictator and Cenſor, and Q. Publilius Philo the firſt Praetor. We have heard this ſong evermore ſounding in our ears, That to you alone pertaineth the taking of Antipia: that you only are of noble deſcent and gentility: that ye and none but ye, by right and duty ought to manage the affairs, and the ſovereign government, both at home and abroad: and yet always hitherto the commons in their places and charges, have done and ſped as well as the Patritii, and henceforth ever ſhall (I doubt not.) What? heard ye never

A ſoon ſpoken, that the Patritii were at firſt made and created, and not deſcended from Heaven: but ſuch as were able to name their father and grandfire: that is to ſay, even free men juſt, and no more? What? I my ſelf can nominate already mine own father to have been a Conſul, and ſhortly ſhall my ſon be able to alledge his grandfire. There is nothing elſe, O Quintus, in the matter whereupon we ſtand, but that we may obtain all which hath been denied us. For the Nobles deſire only to maintain a ſide and to contend, and care not greatly what ill ſue their contentions come unto. As for me, I do adviſe, and this would I have, That (to the good profit) and ſoon it appeared, that the law would without all doubt be accepted: but that day was ſtrid to croſs it, and then with exceeding content of all hands it paſſed clear, So there were created Prelates or Biſhops; ſirſt, P. Decius Mus himſelf (that he pleaded for the law) with P. Scipio, Sophus, C. Manlius, Publius, and M. Lucius Dentor. Likewiſe five Angurs of the Commons, were eight Preſts in number, and nine Angurs.

The ſame year, M. Valerius the Conſul, procured the law of appealing to the people, more ſurely to be eſtabliſhed and confirmed. This was now the third time after the depoiſition of the Kings, that this one Act was revived: and alwayes by the ſame honie or family of the Valerii. The ſome few great men of the Patritii, was no more I ſuppoſe, than this; for that the mightineſs of Commons. Only the Law Porcia, ſeemeth to have been enacted for to ſave the back and ſides of the Citizens from whipping, became that it awarded and let a grievous puniſhment upon him, that either had beaten or killed a Citizen of Rome. The Law Valeria, which forbade, to ſcourge or paſſed any man whoſoever, that made his appeal had this annexed on y, that if any one had treſdredly and reverenced of men in thoſe dayes, that this one addition [in my conceit verily] was ſuppoſed to be a ſufficient bond to ſtrengthen the Law. But now adayes, would a man ſcarcely threaten his fervant or ſlave in that manner.

D The ſame Conſul made war, without any worthy or memorable exploit, againſt the Equians that rebelled: who (ſetting aſide their ſtout and proud ſtomacks) had nothing left of their ancient fortune and eſtate. The other Conſul, Appuleius, beſieged the Town Nequinum in Umbria. The place was difficult and hard to get up, and on the one ſide ſteep down right (whereas now ſtandeth Narnia) ſo that it was impregnable either by aſſault, or countermines and ſcones whatſoever this enterpriſe, left undone and unfiniſhed by the former. Now when all the Centuries nominating: Macer Licinius and Tubero do write, that he himſelf laboured to have that charge put off, and reserved unto a year of more war: alledging, that for the preſent he would ſerve the Com. what he rather deſired, nor yet looking for it, he was made Addele of the Chair, with L. P. Porcius Writer of Chronicles, ſaith, that the Addeles Curſe of that year, were C. Domitius, C. M. A. Calpurnius, Sp. Carvilius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. That ſurname, I ſuppoſe verily, gave occaſion of the Elections of Addeles and Conſuls together. The ſame year was held a ſolemn ſurvey and purging of the City by ſacrifice, called Lexfrons, by P. Scenponius Sophus, and P. Scipio, Acerrius, and affairs at Rome.

F But now to return to Nequinum; after much time ſpent in long and lingering ſiege before the Town two of the inhabitants, whoſe houſes joyned cloſe to the wall undermined the ground, and beſe the Conſul, and promiſed him to let in and receive what garriſon and troop of armed men he would within the City. This offer was thought neither to be neglected nor to be neglected, nor yet two other ſpies were ſent by the ſame mine to diſcover the rain. By whoſe relation, when it appeared, ſaid, 300 armed men by night entered the City, & ſeized that gate which was next to them: ſurpriſed the City. In this ſort Nequinum was reduced to the obedience of the people of Rome. A Colony was thither ſent to Frontier againſt the Umbrians, called of the * Rivers name] which tain war with the Romans. Their society and friendship the barbarous people refused not; only, they stood upon the sum what they should have for their hire. Which being agreed upon and received, and all things else in a readiness for to go into the field; when the Tuscans wild them to follow after, they flatly denied, that they had received any consideration for to make war upon the Romans: but whatsoever they had taken, it was because they should not wait the Tuscan Land, and by way of hostility and force of arms, do any violence upon the inhabitants: howbeit, if the Tuscans were minded to employ them, they would be willing to serve; but for no other reward and recompence, than to be admitted into part of their territory; that at the length they might have some certain place of abode, to settle themselves in. Many Diets and consultations hereabout were held by the States of Tuscany, but nothing resolved and concluded: not to much, for that they feared to part with some of their Lands, as because they were in great dread of every one and abhorred, to have dwelling by them such neighbours, descended from so savage a race and cruel Nation. Thus were the Gauls let go and dismissed, having away with them a huge mass of money, which they got without any travel or peril of their.

The bruit of the Gauls tumult and insurrection, together with the Tuscans war, caused no little fear at Rome. Whereupon, more hast was made to consinde a league with the * Picene people. T. Manlius the Consul had the charge of the Tuscan war allotted unto him. Who scarcely was entered into the confines of the enemies, but as he was training and exercising amongst the Horcmen, he ran his Horse with full carter, and suddenly as he turned about, was cast off, and presently lay for dead: and so the Consul, three days after his fall, ended his life. Which the Tuscans taking hold of, as a good omenous token and preface, got heart and were very jolly; saying, that the Gods had in favour of them, begun this war. This was heavy news at Rome, both for the loss of so brave a personage, and for the time, wherein so unhappily it fell out: so as, the assembly held (by the advice of the chief Peers) for to substitute a Consul in his place that was deceased, frightened the Senators from choosing a Dictator. All their sentences, and all the centuries gave with As. Valerius to be Consul: who was the man, whom the Senat was about to have picked for Dictator. Then forthwith, they ordained him to go into Tuscany to the army. Whole coming up, pressed and kept under the Tuscans; so as not a man durst once go out of their trenches and hold. Even their very fear was as good as a siege unto them: for that the new Consul neither by waiting the fields, nor firing their houses in such sort, as every where, not only the small villages, but also the good and well-peopled Towns were seen to smoke and burn again, could draw them forth to fight.

This war continued longer than men thought: but behold, there arose a bruit of another; (which, considering the mutual losses of both sides, was for good causes greatly to be feared) upon intelligence given from the Picenes their new allies, namely, that the Samnites were about to take arms and rebel, and had solicited them also to do the same. The Picenes were highly thanked for this, and a great part of the Senators care was diverted now from Tuscany to the Samnites. The dearth besides of corn and victuals troubled the City: and driven they had been to extrem famine, if Fabius Maximus (as they have written, who are of opinion that he was a fiddle that year) by provident purveying and diligent conveying of corn, had not been as careful and industrious, in the dispensing of victual now at home, as many times before in war affairs. The same year there was an Interregnum, but upon what occasion, it is not known. The Interregents were App. Claudius, and after him P. Sulpicius, who held an Election of Consuls, and created L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Fuluius.

In the beginning of this year, there came Orators from the Lucans to these new Consuls, for to make complaint, that the Samnites, who by no conditions and means could induce them for to band and take arms with them, were entered into their confines, and made wast of the country, and by very force provoked them to war: saying, That the Lucans had long ago over-
"flour and passed themselves that way: but now they were so fully resolute, that they could "find in their hearts, sooner to abide and endure all kind of calamity whatsoever, than ever after
"to offend and displeasure the Roman name. They besought the Senat therefore, to receive the "Lucans into their protection, and so to keep and defend them from the violence and injury of "the Samnites. And for themselves, albeit entering into war already with the Samnites, they were of necessity obliged to befall and true unto the Romans: yet for better security they were ready to give a sufficient hostages. The Senat was not long consulting hereabout: but all with one consent were of opinion, to make league with the Lucans, and to summon the Samnites to make amends and restitution. The Lucans be desired a courteous and gracious answer, were accepted into the league. Then were there ferial heralds dispatched to the Samnites, to give them warning to depart the territory of the Roman allies, and to withdraw their forces out of the confines of the Lucans. But the Samnites sent out certain messengers to meet them upon the way, and to denounce unto them, that if they presented themselves in any Council within Samnum, they should not depart again with safeguard of their persons. When these news were heard at Rome, both the Senat advised, and the people allowed, to make war upon the Samnites. The Consuls parted their Province, and charges between themselves. To Scipio fell Ugentum, and the Samnites to Fulvius: and in they take their journey divers ways, each one to the war allotted unto him. Scipio looked for no other, but a lingering war at the enemies hands, and like to the defensive service of the former year: but behold, they with an army well appointed and arranged, arranged, encountered him and gave him battle near to * Volturne: where they fought the better. The victory went, the night came between. But the morning after bewrayed both who were winners, and who were losers. For the Tuscans in the still and dead time of the night dislodged, and went forward to the camp: which he found empty of men but full of rich pillage. (for he retired his forces into the territory of the Volturne: and was matter thereof. From thence and biggish with a meetly garrison there; lightly appointed, he marched forward, and with a running camp, waited the marches and territories of his enemies. He put all to fire and sword: drove away booties from all parts: and left not the ground only, wait and detain, but set fire also upon Castles and borough Towns. Only he forbore to assault the great and strong Cities, into which fear had driven the Tuscans for refuge. On Fulvius the Consul on the other part fought a noble battle in Sannum, near * Bovianum, and the victory was no whit doubtful. After which he afflicted Bovianum, and not long after Asidenum: and both Cities he won by force. The time the Consul triumphed over the Samnites.

When as now the time of the Consuls Election drew near; there was a rumour raised, that the Tuscans and Samnites were levying and enrolling of great and mighty forces: that they had waged the Gauls to war, whatsoever it had cost them: that they had not bated, for expelling that army as it were a prey unto the Romans, which had been provided against their enemies the Lucans. For now seeing that the enemies both with their own power, and also with the help of their allies, were come to war: they thought not be able to match them, having their forces thus redoubled. Now albeit there were other numerous and renowned persons, stood to be Consuls, yet this new fear and affright turned all men to be come favourites of Q. Fabius, who at the first made no suit, and afterwards, seeing the limitation of their age, refused also to be Consul. Demanding what they meant to trouble and molest him, so aged a man as he was, and one, who as he had passed also the rewards, and travels of this world, he feared fortune her self, kept haply the might be thought of any and last for ever: and their strength of body, nor vigor of spirit, could always continue the time and last for ever: and besides, he feared fortune her self, kept haply the might be thought of any and last for ever: and pious and favourable unto him, and more permanent than the ordinary train and course of this world would permit. Therefore, like as himself had grown up after the glory of his elders, and succeeded them, so he saw and beheld with joy of heart others also rising up after him, to succeed him in the like glory: and as there wanted not at Rome high promotions and ad, and honors and dignities. But by this refusal of his to modest for joy and worth for to receive choice and kindred more and more their earnest affections, and favours towards him, which he thinking E dull and quench, with the reverent regard and awe of the laws, commanded a statute to be read, wherein it was not lawful for one and the same man within ten years to be created Consul twice. But scarcely for the notice that the people made, could this law be heard read: and the Tribuns of the Com. said, that this should be no let: for they would prefer a bill unto the people, that he might be discharged and dispensed withal from the Statutes in that behalf. Howbeit he stood still in his refusal: demanding of them to what purpose and end were the laws made, if by the very makes thereof, they might be thus deluded and made of no force? For so (as he) laws ruled not, but were over-ruled. But nevertheless, the people went to a running and began to give their voices: and as every Century was called into the rolls, they named and chose Fabius Consul whole City: God say Amen (quoth he) Q. Quirites, to that you do and are about, but for as much as you will have your will and dispose of me at your pleasure, do me this favour yet, that I may have the chusing of my Colleague. I beseech you make Consul with me P. Decimus man approved unto me already, with whom I have stored well in the fellowship of another officer: a man I say, answerable otherwise to the greatness of his name, and worthy of his fathers virtue, from whom he is descended. This favour which he requested, seemed unto them just and reasonable. So all the Centuries behind, created Q. Fabius and P. Decimus Consuls.

The same year the Adiles served provols upon very many Citizens: for holding and possessing of more Lands, than by Law was limited: and none in manner was able to acquit himself hereof. Which was a great bridle and restraint to their unmeasurable avarice. As the new Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and P. Decimus the third time, conferred and laid their heads together about their charges, that the one should take in hand the Samnites, and the other the Tuscans; and consulted what forces might serve and be sufficient for this or that Province, and exploit; and to whether war either of them were the more meet and sufficient Leader: certain Embassadors, from Syracus, Neptis, and Ferentis, advertised them, that the States of Tuscany, were now consulting in their Diets, about a Treaty of peace: which was an occasion, that they turned all their preparations and forces into Samnum. The Consuls being gone forth, to the end they might have the readier provision of grain and victuals, Victuals, and the enemy be more to seek, which way they would assail them, led their Legions into Samnium; Fabius, through the territory of Sora and Decius by the way of the Sidicini. When they were come into the confines of their enemies, both of them pitched themselves all abroad, and fell to forage and spoil the country: yet so, as they went out their camps farther than they waited. Whereupon, they were well aware of their enemies, as they lay in ambush well appointed, within a close and secret valley near Tifernum: what way as they thought to take the vantage of the higher ground, and to set upon the Romans so soon as they were once entered in. Fabius having removed his carriages into a sure place, and set there a competent guard for defence, foretold his soldiers that there was a battle towards: and in a four-square battailon marched directly to the forlaid Embalcado, where the enemies lurked and lay in wait. The Samnites then, despairing and out of all hope to do any great exploit, by sudden tumult, considering their troops were discovered: and seeing they must once at the length come to the trial in open field, were themselves also more willing to put all upon a set battle. Thereupon they descended into the plain and even ground, and committed themselves to the fortune of fight, with more courage of heart than hope of victory. But were it, that they had assembled together the whole stout and manhood out of all the Nations of the Samnites, or that the hazard of the main chance made them more hardy and take the better heart: surely even in plain field, they held the Romans play and put them to great fear. Fabius seeing the enemies no way to retreat and give ground, commanded M. Flavini and M. Valerius, two Colonels, with whom he had set forward and advanced into the forefront, to go to the Horsemen, and to exhort them; if ever they remembered and called to mind, that the Common-wealth had been helped by the valour of the Gentlemen on horseback, they should that day endeavour to make invincible and eternal, the glory of that degree and order of Cavalry. For seeing that the enemies stood unmoveable against the Infantry, there was no other hope but in the force of Horsemen: and here withal he called upon those two young Gentlemen, and plied both the one and the other with like courtesy, one while praising them, another while leading them with fair and large promises. But when as the assay of that force likewise, prevailed not, thinking where strength would take no place, there craft was to be tried and practised, he caused Scipio his Lieutenant, to withdraw out of the conflict, the javeliniers of the first legion, and as closely as he could to fetch about with them, toward the next hills: and then, to march up the hill some way from the fight of the enemies; and after he had gained the top, all of a sudden to I. shew himself behind, and charge upon the enemies backs, whiles their faces were turned another way. Now the Horsemen, by the direction of those two Colonels, being ridden of a sudden before the standards, troubled their own fellows almost as much as the enemies. For against their troops and cornets of Horse that thus violently put forward, the Samnites battle stood unmoveable, and on no part could either be forced to retreat, or to break their array. The Horsemen when they saw this attempt to take no effect, retired themselves behind the ensigns, and departed out of the battle. Hereupon took the enemies more heart unto them: neither had the vanguard of the Romans been able to abide so long a conflict, and the violence of the enemies still encroaching, upon their own confidence, but that the second ranges in the middle ward, by the Consul his commandment, came forward into the front of the vanguard. Where they with their fresh strength, M. slayed the Samnites, being now ready to enter forcibly upon them, and to gain the ground: and withal, at the time appointed, the ensigns shewed themselves from the hills, and came down un-awares to the enemies; and setting up a shout, not only danned the hearts of the Samnites [but also encouraged the Romans.] For both Fabius cried aloud, that his Colleague Decius approached, and every soldier for his part, what he might, with joyful and cheerful hearts, iterated, that the other Consul was come, and the legions were at hand. Which error and mistaking, as it turned to the good of the Romans, so it caused the Samnites to flee, and to be surprized with a fright, fearing and doubting nothing so much, as that being now overtoiled and wearied, they should be overcharged also with fresh and lusty forces. And for that in their running every way, they were scattered asunder, there was less slaughter than for the preparation of so great a victory. For 3400 N only were slain, and of prisoners were taken, wellnear three hundred and thirty: and three and twenty banners and ensigns won and carried away. The Apulians had joyned with the Samnites before the battle, but that P. Decius the Consul encamped against them at Makventum, and having drawn them forth to fight, discomfited them. Where also there were more that died, than died upon the sword: for not above 2000 Apulians were slain. And Decius making no reckoning of that enemy, conducted his legions into Samnium. Where, two Consular hosts, having over-run the country in divers parts, within five months space laid all wast and desolate. Five and forty places there were in Samnium, where Decius had encamped: and eighty six, wherein the other Consul had pitched. In which, they left behind them not only the marks of stakes, rampires, and ditches, but also many other more notable signs and tokens of the country wasted all about, O and utterly spoiled by them. Fabius besides, won the City Cimbrina. Where there were taken prisoners two thousand and four hundred armed soldiers, and slain there were in fight upon 430.

From thence he went to Rome against the Election of new Consuls, and made all the haste he could to dispatch that business. And when as all the Centuries first called forth to give their suffrages, named Q. Fabius for the Consul: then Appius Claudius a Consular man, and one of the Competitors, a grim fir, and ambitious by nature, laboured no more for his own honour and advancement,

A vancement, than to recover again into the Patricii, both the rooms of the Consillship, and employeda well his own device, as also all the means and assistance of the Patricii and S. Pontifici, to have himself chosen Consul with Q. Fabius. As for Fabius, at the first uptake and charged in his own be half, the same reasons in manner which he had used the former year, and related to be the Consul. The whole body of the Nobility took about his feat, praying instantly, and entreating him to pluck the Consillship out of the mire and bate degree of these Commons, and to restore the ancient Majesty both to the Magistracy itself, and also to the Patricii: and their bowles and nappees and allayed their hot affection, promising and assuring them, that no would willingly accept himself: for at this present Election, if he might see, that they would not any other Consul nominated Consul, and give to him a precedent to prejudice all consule of law, for the time to come. So L. Volturnus, out of the body of the Commons, was created Consul, for the time to come, who likewise in the former Consillship had been matched Collegues together, The Nobility used to object unto Fabius, and reproached him, that he avoided App. Claudius to be his companion in government, who for eloquence and other civil parts was no doubt a singular and excellent man. When the Election was ended, the old Consuls were commended to war in Samnium, having their Government continued, and their commission renewed, six months. And to C who being Consul, had been left behind his Colleague in Samnium, ceased now Consuls, P. Decius, and name of Proconsul, to wait the country: until at length, when the Samnites would in no place of the field, and excluded out of their own borders and limits. And thus driven out that with so huge a multitude of armed men, they shoud do that more effectually with increase and prayers, mingled with threats among, which by so many Embassages they had to effect: employed in vain; they called for a Diet and general Council of the States and Princes of Italia. Which being assembled, they declared and shewed, for how many years space they had maintained war with the Romans in the right of their freedom; that they had played all means, if happily they might have been able by their own puissance alone, to sustain and support the weight D of so huge and important a war: that they had sought for peace of the aids of other neighbours, but to little effect: that they had besides made proof of the aids of other neighbours, with that subjection, than war with their liberty, they had rebelled and made war again: and now their only hope they had, remained in the Tuscan: knowing well enough, that for men, the Gauls, a people born and bred up in armor and war: by natural disposition fierce and cruel, but especially in any quarrel against the people of Rome: of whom they do find not mutually re- pore: that they were by them vanquished and constrained to ransom themselves for gold. E Now, if the Tuscans were of that heart and courage, as Po Jenu sometimes, and other their neighbours were: there were no doubt, but that they might deliver the Romans, and preserve them of all the ground on this side Tiberis, and make them fight for the defence and preservation of their lives, and not for the intolerable seignory and Dominion of Italia. They said moreover, that there was now come unto them an army of Samnites, well appointed and furnished with armour, and stored with pay and money, who would it slow down forthwith, even to the assault of the City of Rome, if they would lead them.

Whiles they were thus braving, and gloriously boasting themselves, and preparing of war in Tuscany, the Romans war at their own doors, lay fore upon them, and preparing of war in For P. Decius having learned by the spies, that the Samnites army was, and flung them at the heart, their voyage, assembled a Council and said, What mean we thus to rage over the fields, and no army now, that defendeth Samnium: gone they are out of their confines, and wrought their own exile and banishment. When they all had allowed of this motion, he led forth his army to assault the strong City Mercatuna. And to fortify the motion, he led forth his provisions burs to their Captain, and also for hope of winning a richer pillage thereby, than by the sword. Where two thousand and one hundred Samnites, fighting men, either fell upon the edge of the sword, or were taken prisoners, with a great and rich booty but d.s. For for so far that the purchase and encumber the army with heavy carriages Decius caused his soldiers to be called together unto an audience, and thus to them he said, D "this victory only, and this prey? Or will ye build your hopes ill, answerable to your prowess and valour? All the Cities of the Samnites, all the substance and riches that both and remaineth in their Cities are yours Forasmuch as ye have in so many battles vanquished their legions and after your chapmen and merchants to follow the army, I will from time to time still help you to wares and commodities for to sell. Let us go from hence freight to the City Rome, where your toil shall not be so great, but the spoil far greater. So when they had made tale of their pillage, and willingly of themselves called upon and exhorted their Captain to that expedition, to Romula they go, Where likewise, without mure and platform, without warlike engines of battery, so soon as they advanced their engines, and approached the walls, they could by no violence be driven from thence, but set up ladders in all hail, at the next place that every man could find, and so raised up the walls. Thus the Town was won and ransacked, To the number of 2300 were slain, and 6000 taken prisoners. The soldiers having got an exceeding booty, were forced to sell it, and make all away, as before: and from thence without any rest at all given unto them were they led to Ferentinum, yet they marched thither with exceeding courage and cheerfulness. Howbeit it ere they found more difficult and perilous service: for the walls were with all terrible means defended, and the place it self was both by mans hand, and natural situation, surely fenced: but yet the soldiers now being fleshed, and enured to spoil, overcame all difficulties. Three I thousand men about the walls were slain: and the baggage fell to the soldiers share. The greatest part of the honor in assaulting and winning of these Cities, is ascribed in some Chronicles to Fabius Maximus. For they write, that Marcus was by Decius won, but Ferentinum and Romula, by the conduct of Fabius. But some attribute the glory hereunto unto the new Consuls. And there are, that give the glory not to both, but to the one of them, to wit, P. Volturnus, unto whom befall the Province of Sannium.

Whiles these affairs thus went in Sannium (by whose leading and managing it skills not) in the mean time a mighty war was preparing in Hetruria: and that, of many nations banded together: the principal author whereof was Gellius Equestris a Sannit. The Tuscan, in manner all, had taken arms and levied their forces, and the neer society, caused also the people of Umbria ad- joining to take their part: besides, Gauls also were waged for money to aid: all which multitude assembled together, and met in the Sannits camp. The news of which sudden and unexpected tumult, being brought to Rome: for so much as P. Volturnus the Col, with the second and third legions, and with 5000 confederates was gone already into Sannium: it was thought good and determined, that Appius Claudius with all speed possible, should go into Hetruria: and alter him, two Roman legions followed, to wit, the first and fourth, with twelve thousand allies: who encamped not far from the enemy. But more good was done there, in respect that they came their best times, (to the end that the fear of the Roman name might keep in awe certain nations in Hetruria, which already intended war) than for any exploit performed either skillfully or luckily, under the conduct of the Consul. Many skirmishes there passed in places of disadvantage, and at times inconvenient: in so much, as the enemy took more heart, and conceived greater hope every day more than other: and now it grew nearer to this point, that neither souldier could well reckon of the sufficiency of Captain, nor Captain trust upon the loyalty of the souldier. In three several Annals I find, that Appius dispatched his letters to his fellow Consul, and sent for him out of Sannium: howbeit, I am loth to let this down being so uncertain as it is: seeing that the very Consuls themselves of Rome, who now the second time were coupled together in one government, contended, and openly jarred about this point: whiles Appius denied flatly that he sent any script at all, and Volturnus again avouched, that he was sent for by Appius: his letters, Volturnus by this time had won three Castles in Sannium, wherein were slain three thousand enemies, and almost halfe many taken prisoners: and compoled besides the seditions and quarrels of the Tuscan, which arose from the Commons and needy persons: and that, with the exceeding good contentment of the chief and principal personages of the country, by the means and mediation of Q. Fabius the Proconsul, who was thither sent with the old army. This done, he left Decius to wait and pill the country of the enemies, and himself with his forces marched toward his Colleague into Hetruria. Who at his first coming, was received generally with all the joy that might be. For mine own part, I suppose verily, that as Appius had good cause to cary an angry stomach with him, in case his confidant bare him witness that he wrote not unto him: so as yet if he had need of his Collegues aid, he shewed an illiberal, unkind, and unthankful nature of his own, in that he would to dissemble, and not be knowy thereof. For being once forth to meet him, before they had well greeted and saluted one another. How now, quoth he, O L. Volturnus, is all well? How goes the World in Sannium? What hath moved you to abandon and leave your own charge and province, and to depart? Volturnus made answer, that in Sannium all things went well and chievely prosperously, and that himself was now come, as sent for by his letters: which if they were counterfeited, and that there were no need of him in Hetruria, he would presently turn his engines, and be gone. Mary, quoth he, and good leave have you: you may be gone when you will and no man holder you: and ill beleeving it is, that you who perpetually are not able to wield and manage your own affairs of war, should glory thus, and make your boast that you are come hither to help others. Hereat Volturnus should reply again and say, It is well, and God send us good luck: I had rather lose my labour, than ought should have happened, whereby one Consuls army were not sufficient to deal with Hetruria. Now as the Consuls were parting asunder one from the other, the Lieutenants and Colonels of Appius his army came and stood round about them both: some requested their own General, that the aid of his Colleague which ought to have been accepted by them if it had been required: now that it was effected so willingly, and of his own accord, should not be refused and rejected. But the more part encountered Volturnus, as he was ready to go his way, and earnestly besought him not for any forward contention, and debate with his companion, to betray the common-weal. For if any overthrow or misadventure should happen, the blame would be imputed rather to the for-

A "faker than the forsaken: and now things were come to this pass, that the honor or dishonor of the war in Hetruria, prove it well or ill, should fall upon L. Volturnus: for that no man would enquire of the words and language that Appius gave him but of the fortune and success of the arms: and albeit Appius had given him his farewell and passport, the weal publick and the army hold him still by the sleeve, and for proof hereof, let him but make try of the souldiers hearts and affections. Thus with remonstiances, perswasions, and hearty prayers to the one Consul and the other, they drew them both, in manner against their wisest piny in publick audience before the whole army. Where they grew to longer speeches and discourses, but to the same end: before the feet as before in the hearing and presence of a few. Now when L. Volturnus (as having the better cause) seemed to reply, and that with good grace & words enough against that singular eloquence of his Colleague: and that Appius in trumping and taunting manner gave out and said, That they were beholden to him and might con him thank, that of a dumb and tongue-tied Consul they had one now, that was so ready and eloquent: and who in his former Commithip and especially in the first motions, could not open his mouth, and speak a word, was now of a sudden become an Orator: God, with all my heart, you rather had learned of me to fight valiantly, then let you to speak finely: and in conclusion he said he would tender him an offer, which he should determine and put out of all doubt, whether he would tender him an offer, which he should determine and put present the Common-weal stood not in need of such jost the better warrior and Orator (for at this C "al. Whereas therefore, there are ii. Provinces, Hetruria and Sannium, it is to be in your choice (qd. he) to take one of them, whether you will, and I myself will with my own army make war in the other. Then began the souldiers to cry aloud unto them, that they were so jointly enter both upon the Tuscan war, which consent and accord of theirs, when Volturnus had so jointly enter "For almuch (qd. he) as I have once mistaken and misinterpreted the will of my Colleague, I will not in any case stand in doubt and be ignorant of your minds too: let me know therefore by a "flout of yours, whether you would have me tarry or depart? Whereat they let up such a note, that it gave an alarm to the enemies, and raised them out of their camp: and presently they caught their weapons up, and came forth into the field, Volturnus likewise caused the trumpets to sound, and the standards, and engines to be brought abroad. Then Appius as it is reported) leaped, plammammering and supple for a while: but afterwards fearing, let that his own actions should follow Volturnus gave likewise unto his men the signal of battell, which they in turn called for. But neither they, nor the enemies were the signal of battell, which they in turn called for. him: whereupon the souldiers rather of their own heads, than by conduct or direction of their rans, began to charge: and also the Roman armies were not both led to other nor yet had time enough to be marshalled accordingly: for Volturnus which gave the charge before that Appius could come to encounter the enemies: whereupon, the foremost were not equall matched together: and as if some fortune had exchanged the enemies, that they were weak to fight withal: E the Tuscan presented themselves to Volturnus, and the Sannits who stayed, and waited that their General was absent) affronted Appius. It is reported that Appius in the very heat of his skirmish was slain in the front of the foremost engines, to lift up his hands to Heaven, and pray in this wise, "O Lady Bellona, if thou give us victory and the honor of this day then be sure, I owe now thee a thee at this hour, a fair Temple. When he had thus prayed, as if the Colleague had put life into him, and animated his courage, both himself made the colour of his Colleague, and his army answered the virtue of their Commander. For he perceived the danger of his Colleague, and his army General. The souldiers likewise, for fear that the other army should begin the victory, endeavored and streined all that ever they could: Whereby, they dilated, did omitted, and put to flight the enemies, who could not easily abide any extraordinary force and violence, more than chasing them hotly that were scattered in flight, they beat them into their camp. There, by the coming in of Gellius and the Sabellian bands, the battell for the time was chiefly renewed. But when they also, within a while were discomfited, then was the camp assaulted by their enemies, but when whiles Volturnus for his part entered with banner displayed unto the very gate, and Appius ever and anon reiterated the name of Bellona the victress, and all, to set on fire and incline the courage of his souldiers: there was neither trench nor rampier that could hold them back. So the camp was won and sacked, and a huge pilage therein found, which was given all to the souldiers. Seven thousand and three hundred enemies were slain, 2120 taken prisoners. During the time that both Consuls, and the whole puissance of the Romans, were thus more bent and employed in the war within Tuscany: there were new forces raised in Sannium, to wait the marches of the Roman Dominion: who taking their way through the Vetins, into Campania and the country of Faleris, drave huge prizes and booties away. And as Volturnus by great journeyes returned into Sannium (for by this time Fabius and Decius were come to an end of their foraged government) the bruit that was blown abroad of the Sannits army and their foraging of the territory of Cepus, turned him out of his way, to the defence of his allies and consoles rans. So soon as he was entered into the country Calerum, both he himself saw the fresh marks and tokens of great damage and desolation: and also the Calenians advertised him there the

of the people, held a middle course in all his speech; that he might seem neither to encrease, nor yet to diminish the rumor of the war; and in assuming to himself another Captain, he pretended, that he contended thereunto, in regard of other mens fear, more than for his own safety, or for any danger that the State was like to incur. Howbeit, if they would allow him a condutor and companion in war, how might he forget P. Decius the Consul of whom he had so good proof and experience in so many Magistricies, which they had born and admittred together. Of all men in the world he loved none better, and would make choice of no one sooner: and having P. Decius with him, he would never think his forces too few about him, nor his enemies too many before him. But if peradventure the mind and heart of his Colleague stood otherwise, his request was, that they would give him L. Volturnus to be his assistant. The determination of all was referred over to Fabius, both by the people and Senat, and also by the Consul himself. And when as Decius shewed and testified, that he was ready to take a journey either into Sannium or Tuscanum, there followed such a joy and gratulation of all men, as if they had conceived in their spirit a victory afore-hand, and even now, had decreed for the Consuls, not a doubtful war, but a glorious triumph. I find in some writers, that Fabius and Decius, presently upon the entrance into their Magistricy, went into Tuscanum, without any mention of calling lots for their charges and provinces, or of the contention between the two Collegues, which I have set down. There became again, who having laid abroad these debates, stayed not there, but over and besides have added a surcease of matter, touching the invectives of Appius before the people, against Fabius in his absence; as also the obdurate stubbornness of him being Pretor, against the Consul, to his very face: moreover, another contention and variance between the two Consuls, from the time that both Consuls went out to war, and to forward.

But before that the Consuls arrived in Tuscanum, certain Gauls called Senones, came with a great power before Clusium, ready to give assault upon the Roman Legion and the camp. But Scipio, who was left Governor thereof, thinking it necessary to help out the small number of his men, by advantage of the ground, led his army up to the hill between the town and the camp. But (as it falleth out in such sudden cases) he had not discovered aforehand the wayes and passes all about; but inconsiderately went forward, and engaged himself up to the top and pitch of the hill, which the enemy was master of already, by another side. Thus was the legion assailed on the back and beat down, and thus it was enclosed and environed round, by a multitude of enemies, and put to the sword. Some writers there be who report, that the whole legion perished there, so as not one escaped alive to carry tidings. Also, that the Consuls who now were not far from Clusium, had no news brought them of this overthrow, before the horsemen of the Gauls were in sight, who carrying the heads of them that were slain, some hanging before at their horsepoittels, others sticking aloft upon their lances, braved and triumphed, singing and chanting songs of joy, after their manner. Some write that they were the Umbri and not the Gauls; and that the defeat and massacre was not so great; also that when the foragers for the camp under the leading of L. Manlius Torquatus a Lieutenant, were compassed about by the enemy; then Scipio the Pro-pretor came forth of the camp to succour and rescue them, and that the Umbrians who first had the better, afterwards when the battell was renewed, suffered the foil and were overcome, and that as well their prisoners as their booty was taken from them. But more probable it is, that this overthrow was given by the Gauls, then the Umbrians; for that as divers times afore, so that year especially the City was frighted with the tumults and rifings of the Gauls. Upon this defeat, over and besides, that both the Consuls were gone to war with four legions, and great power of Cavalry of natural Romans, and a thousand horsemen of Capua, chosen out of purpose for that war, and sent unto them, with a greater power also of Allies, and of Latins then of Romans; there were two other armies not far from the City of Rome, opposed to frontier and make head against Tuscanum: the one in the Faliscian territory, the other in the Vatican, Cn. Fulvius and L. Posthumius Megillus, both Pro-pretors, were commanded to keep a standing camp in those parts. But the Consuls by this time, having passed over the mountain Apenninus, were come to the enemies within the country of the Sentinats. And there about four miles off, they lay them down and encamped. Then the enemies, after much consultation, resolved in the end upon this point; not to be intermingled all in one camp, nor come into the field and hazzard all their forces at once in one battell: But that the Gauls should take the Samnites unto them, and the Umbrians join with the Tuscans. The day of the battell was appointed. The Gauls and Samnites had the charge to maintain the fight: and in the time of battell the Tuscans and Umbrians were commanded to assault the camp of the Romans. But these their designs and purposes were altered by reason of three Clusian fugitive traitors, who by night stole away privily unto the Consul Fabius, and disclosed the intents and enterprise of the enemies: who were sent away with rich rewards, to the end that every hour, upon new plots and devices that should be determined by the enemies, they would give them an inkling and certain intelligence. The Consuls write unto Fulvius and Posthumius, that the one should advance and come forward with his army, out of the Faliscian country; and the other out of the Vatican directly unto Clusium: and that with all their forces, they should overrun and destroy the enemies country. The rumor of these rodes & invasions, caused the Tuscans to remove out of the

Sentinat

A Sentinat territory, to the defence of their own frontiers. Hereupon the Consuls made speed to strike a battell in their absence. And for two dayes space they skirmished continually with the enemy, and challenged him to the field: but for thole two dayes, no worthy deed of import was achieved. A few on both sides were slain, and hereby were their courages rather provoked, and their homacks whet to a full set battell then any trial or hazzard made of the main chance. Upon the third day into plain field they come with all their power. When both armies stood ranged in battell array, there fortuned a Hind to be chased out of the mountains, and to run away before a Wolf, even through the midle of the plains between both armies: then, parted both thick wild beasts; and the Hind took her way to the Gauls, and the Wolf his courie to the Romans. The Wolf had way given him through alothe ranks and files: but the Hind was killed among the Gauls. Then a Roman souldier, one of the foremost, who was to fight before the Ensigns: There with the fight (quoth he) there will the slaughter be, where you see the beast fared and dedicated to Diana laid dead: but here on this part, the martial Wolf, consecrated to Mars, having with victory gone clear away safe and unwounded hath put us in mind of our martial Nation and of our first founder, the son of Mars. The Gauls put themselves in the right wing, the Samnites in the left. Against the Samnites, Fabius marshalled the first and third Legions, in the right point: and Decius, the fifth and sixth in the left, affront the Gauls. For the second and fourth he led in Sannium under L. Volturnus Pro-consul. At the first shock and encounter, the battell was to indifferently fought, and with equal force, that if the Tuscans and Umbrians had either shewed themselves in the field, or assailed the camp, the loss and overthrow must needs have light in either place, whereas they had bent their forces. Howbeit, although hitherto the conflict of battell went equal and indifferent, and that as yet to come had not determined, which way the world on line and give the victory; yet they fought not alike, in the right and left wings. For the Romans under the conduct of Fabius, rather warded the enemy warily, and stood upon their guard, then offered to charge lustily: so as they maintained fight, and drew it at length until it was very late in the evening: because the Captain was enforced and periwaded of the Samnites and Gauls both, that being as they were in the first skirmish very hot and furious, it was fittest to keep off at length and at staves end. As for the Samnites, their courages would abate and fall by any long conflict and the bodies of the Gauls (who of all other can least away with travel & heat especially) would turn all to sweat, & melt away: who at the beginning, fight more fiercely then men but in the end more faintly then women. Against that time therefore, when the enemy used to fall & give over, Fabius had kept his souldiers in breath & reserved their strength fresh & lusty. But Decius being very eager & hot by reason of his youth and courage of heart, laid on lustily at the first, and spent upon the enemies all the force & vigor he had: and for that the Infantry seemed to fight but coldly, he led the Cavalry awork: and himself personally in the thickest throng and troop of most valiant and hardy Knights, exhorted and beought the foremost gallants of thole lusty youths to join with him & to charge upon the enemy: saying that they should carry away a double honor if by the means of the men of arms, the victory began at the left wing. Twice they forced the Gauls horsemen to turn side and back; but when as they were engaged farther within, and were now fighting hard yell merrily among the squadrons of the horsemen, they beheld a new and strange kind of sight which troubled and terrified them. For the enemies standing all armed upon chariots & wagons with a great noise of their steeds, and rumbling of the wheels, ran full upon them & mightily distressed the bodies of the Romans which had not been acquainted with such uncouth & strange noises. So the horsemen who had the upper hand before, & were at point of victory, were now with a loud fear full confounded and scattered, as if the hideous furies of hell, & the devil himself had been amongst them. Whereupon they fled suddenly & not looking before they were overthrowen by them that were slain. By this occasion the ensigns of footmen were distressed & disordered, and many of those that were ranged in the front before the ensigns, were by force of horse & wagons driven, rostrerough the battellions, trodden under foot, and their guts squashed out. Herewith the battellions of the Gauls horsemen, seeing their enemies thus scared followed on apace, & gave them no time of resting. Decius cried out aloud to his men. Whither flee ye? Or what hope have ye to save yourselves by flight? Decius opposed himself against them that retreated and fled: Decius called those that were disbanded and scattered but seeing that by no force or means he could stay them thus amazed & astonished as they were; he called upon his father P. Decius by name and said: Why do I stay any longer the fatal death that is destined to my house & name? It is given to our race & family to be sacrificed in lieu of propitiatory sacrifices for to assuage & save the publick weal from dangers menaced & threatened unto it. Even now therefore, will I offer the legions of the enemies to be sacrificed with my self to Dame Tellus and other infernal gods. When he had spoken the words, he commanded M. Livius the high Priest (whom as he marked into the field, he straightly had charged not to depart from him) nor to pronounce and say that form of words, whereby he should devote, offer, and betake himself to death, together with the legions of the enemies, for to save the army of the Quirits and people of Rome. Which when he had done by the same form of prayer and in the same habit wherein his father P. Decius at the river Volturnus in the war against the Latins, sacrificed himself to be offered to death: and besides these solemn prayers, added moreover these words: That he drive before him Fright, Flight, Murder, Murther, Bloodshed, Ire and Wrath of God: Heaven & fiends in Hell, and that he would with deadly maledictions and execrable curses smite the ensigns, weapons, and armors of his enemies; and that one and the same place, should be both himself, and also the Gauls and Samnites together with him, plague, perdition, and destruction. After these cursed, horrible, and detestable speeches against his own person and his enemies: look where he saw the thickest ranks of the Gauls, thither he spurred his horse, and rode in amongst them: where amidst the pikes, javelins, and swords, he was presently slain. Then could it hardly be seen, that the battle was any longer fought by power and help of man. The Romans so soon as they had lost their Captain, (which at all other times is wont to invite a terror into them) stayed their flight, and were willing and contented to renew the battle afresh. The Gauls, and especially that troop which stood about the Consul, his body, fared as though they had been out of their wits, flung their darts from them (I know not how) to no purpose, and in vain: some of them stood still, as it were benumbed, forgetting both to run away, and to fight still. But on the other side the high Priest Livius, with whom Decius had left the sergeants, and whom before his death he nominated and ordained to be Propretor, cried out, as loud as he could, that the Romans had the victory, and by the death of the Consul, were acquitted and excused from all other fatal danger: but as for the Gauls and the Samnites, they were destined and forfeited (as it were) to mother Tellus and the infernal spirits. And now Decius (quoth he) hailed after him and called to follow him, the army that with him was devoted, cursed, and offered: now all the enemies are full of injuries and fearful fright. Then, as these aforesaid began the skirmish again, behold there came unto them, Cornelius Scipio, and C. Marcius with a supply of succours from the rearward: who by commandment of Q. Fabius the Consul, were sent to aid and rescue his Collegue. Where they heard of the worthy end of P. Decius, a noble example to encourage them to adventure all hazards in the service of their country and Common-weal. Therefore, when as the Gauls stood close and thick together, opposing their targets before them, ranged and joined one over another featherwise, so, as to deal with them affront, and to cope together at hand strokes, was thought a difficult and dangerous matter: then, by the commandment of those two Lieutenants, the darts and lances which lay strewn upon the ground, between the two armies, were gathered up, and flung against the pavilions or tortoise-sense of the enemies targets above laid. And by reason that these javelins and spears light and stuck fast, some in their targets, and some in their very bodies, it hapned that their knot was broken, and the battailon (as huge and close as it was) disbanded, in such sort, as many of them, notwithstanding their bodies were untouched and unhurt, fell down allonced one upon another. So how fortune altered the case, and changed all in the left wing of the Romans. But in the right, Fabius (as is before said) at the first, lingered and drew on the day: but afterwards, when as he perceived, that neither the enemies shouts, nor their manner of giving charge, nor yet the darts and javelins which they lanced, had the same vigor and force, as before he commanded the Captains of the horsemen to wheel about with their Cornets, and to flank the Samnites, that upon a signal given, they might charge them overthwart with all the violence they could, whilst his own Legionary footmen by little and little advanced forward, and brake the ranks and disordered the enemy. When he saw once, no resistance made, and that without all doubt, they were wearied and out of breath: then he gathered together all his subsidiary companies of the rearguard, which he had reserved until that time and business, fresh and in heart: and at once, both set forward the Legions, and gave the horsemen also a signal to set upon the enemies. But the Samnites could not endure this violent charge, but ran as fast as ever they could to recover the camp fast by the battailon of the Gauls, leaving their fellows behind them in fight to pay the reckoning. The Gauls having likewise made a target-sense, stood thick and close together under it. Then Fabius advertised of the death of his brother Consul, commanded a wing or Corner, to the number almost of 500 horsemen of Capua, to withdraw themselves out of the conflict, to cast about and to play upon the backs of the Gauls: after whom, he caused the Principes of the third Legion to follow: and wheresoever they espied the ranks of the enemies by force of horsemen disordered and broken, there, to second them, and press on still, and kill them whilst they were in disarray, and afraid. Himself vowed a Temple to Jupiter Victor, together with the spoils of his enemies. Which done, he advanced straight forward to the camp of the Samnites, thither all the multitude of them were driven in great fright and disarray. And for that the gates were not able to receive so great a multitude, crowding together, they that were kept out, and could not get in, by reason of the throng of their fellows, began again to fight under the rampart. Where Gollius Equatius, the General of the Samnites was stricken down and slain: after this, the Samnites beaten within their rampart, were killed every one, and their camp after small resistance won. The Gauls behind their back were environed and cut in pieces. That day were slain of enemies five and twenty thousand, and 8000 taken prisoners. Howbeit, this victory cost the Romans blood: for of P. Decius his army, there died 7000 and of Fabius, 1200. Fabius then having sent out to seek out the body of his Collegue, gathered up all the spoils of the enemies into an heap, and burned them, to the honor of Jupiter Victor. But that day could not the Consul his body be seen, for reason it was covered and hidden under heaps of the Gauls that lay there dead. The morrow after it was found and brought again with many a tear of all his soldiers. Then Fabius setting all other matters for the time aside, solemnized the burial and funeral obsequies of his fellow Consul, with due commendation and condigne praises, and with all honor that could be devised.

In Tuscany also about the same time, Cn. Fulvius Propretor, had fortunate success to his hearts desire: for besides great damage done to the enemy, by invasions & rides into the country, he fought also

Also a notable battle: wherein of Perusins and Clusins were slain above 2000, and twenty on signs won. The Samnites, as they fled through the territory of the Pelignians, were by them intercepted and enclosed: and of five thousand, they were left but one thousand. Great is the fame of that day, and of the battle that was fought in the Sentinate territory, if a man hold him on to the truth, and make no more of it than it was. But some have overreached a little, and written, that the enemies were 40330 foot, and 46000 horse strong: also, that they had a thousand chariots or waggons, reckoning and comprising the Umbrians and Tuscans withal: who also (as they say) were at the battle. And to encrease also the power and forces of the Romans, they report, that L. Volturnus Propretor, was a Commander, together with the Consuls, and that his army was joined with the Legions of the Consuls. But I find in most Chronicles, that this victory was achieved by the two Consuls only. Volturnus in the meantime warred in Samnium: and having forced and driven the army of the Samnites, to take the hill Tifernum, nothing afraid for the disadvantage of the place, discomfited them, and put them to flight. Q. Fabius, having left the army of Decius behind him in Tuscany, reduced his own legions into the City, and triumphed over the Gauls, Tuscans, and Samnites. His soldiers followed him in his triumph, who in their rude military thimes and songs, celebrated no less the brave and noble death of P. Decius, than the worthy victory of Quintus Fabius. And they revived the memorial of his father late deceased, comparing him in equal degree, for the illustrious and event, as well publick as privat, with the praises of his son. Of the booty and pillage gained from the enemies, the soldiers had given unto them 80 Asles apiece, with a livery cloak, and coat of good reward for a soldiers service in those days.

For all these notable victories achieved, yet neither the Samnites nor the Tuscans were at quiet. For, both the Perusins began to rebel: so soon as the Consul had away his army: and also the Samnites came down to forrage and spoil into the territory of Vulturnum and Formisium, and another way into Etruriam, which lie along the river Vulturnus. Against them was Appius Claudius the Pretor, sent with Decius his army. And Fabius in Tuscany, which began new war, slew four thousand and five hundred Perusins, took prisoners 1740, who were ransomed for 3000 Asles a piece. The rest of the spoil was all bestowed upon the soldiers. The Legions of the Samnites being pursued hard at heels, partly by Appius Claudius Pretor, and partly by L. Volturnus Proconful, met all together in the territory of Stella. Where both the Samnite Legions abode, and also Appianus and Volturnus joined and encamped together. There was a sharp and cruel battle fought on both sides. The Romans were incensed with anger and choler against those that had so often rebelled: the other, upon a desperate mind were resolute to hazard the utmost. So there were slain of the Samnites, 16300; 2700, taken prisoners, and of the Romans there died two thousand seven hundred.

This year so fortunate in war, was by reason of pestilence much afflicted; and for certain prodigious tokens, full of care and perplexed. For it was reported, that in divers places it rained earth and that in the army of Appius Claudius, there were many lightning & blasted with lightning. In regard hereof, the books of Sibylla were perused and sought into. The same year Q. Fabius being Consul, his son, fined and punished by the purse, certain wives who had been convicted and condemned before the people, of Adultery: of which money so raised by their fines, he caused to be built the Temple of Venus, which standeth near the Cirque or Race.

There remain yet behind certain wars of the Samnites, whereof we have now continued our history in these four books, for the space of six and forty years, ever since that M. Valerius, and An. Cornelius were Consuls, who were the first that warred in Samnium. To let pass therefore, and not to trouble the readers, with a prolix narration of the alternative overthrowes given and received between both nations (so many years one after another, for all which calamities and losses their hearts and courages could not be daunted or conquered: the very last year, the Samnites, in the Sentinate country, in the Pelign territory, at Tifernum, and in the territory of Stella, were defeated both by themselves, with their own legions, and also mingled with others; and that, by four armies, and four Roman Captains: I left the bravest and most noble General of all their nation: saw their confederates and allies in war, the Tuscans, Umbrians, and Gauls, in the same predicament as themselves, not able to stand and maintain their estate any longer, either by their own power, or with help of forraign forces; yet for all this, would they not abstain from war, so little weary, were they of defending their liberty, although it were unfortunately: choosing rather, to be vanquished, than not to attempt the winning of victory. Who is he, that would not think it irksome, and tedious, either to write or read this long suit and train of wars, which they in fighting were never wearied?

After Q. Fabius and P. Decius, succeeded Consuls L. Posthumius Megillus, and M. Atilius Regulus. To them both, was committed charge of Samnium, for that the brute went, that the enemies had prepared three full armies, the one to go again into Tuscany, the second to invade and over-run afresh the territory of Capua, and the third to defend their own frontiers. Posthumus by reason of sickness remained at Rome, but Atilius went presently with an army forth, to the end that he might surprize the enemies on a sudden in Samnium, before they had taken the field: for so the Senat had given direction: and he found the enemy in the way to meet him, as if it had been so of purpose before by them determined, ready there to keep him from entrance and so far off were they from wasting the lands of the Samnites, that they could not once enter into their their confines; nay, the Samnites debarred them from departure thence, into the peaceable parts and territories of their allies. Now when as they were encamped affront one against another; that, which the Romans being so often conquerors, would hardly have adventured, (see how utter despair driveth men to rash projects and extremities) the Samnites attempted: even to give assault upon the Romans camp. And albeit this so venturous enterprise sped not well in the final effect, yet was it not altogether in vain attempted. There chanced to be a foggy mist, which continued a good part of the day, so thick and palpable, as men could not see before them. I say not, so far as without the trench, but not so much as those that came close to speak one to another. The Samnites hereupon taking the advantage fit for an ambushment, before it was full day light, and the same much overcast and dim with the mist, came as far as the Corps de garde of the Romans, who in the gates and entrance of the camp were but negligently: being thus taken on a sudden, they had neither courage nor strength enough to resist. At the back-side of the camp, they assaulted the great gate Decumana, seized the Questors pavilion, and that quarter about it where the Questor himself (L. Opimius Pansa) was slain, and thereupon the alarm was given. The Col. being with this tumult raised, commanded two bands or cohorts of allies, to wit the one of Lucanians, and the other of Suessans, which haply were next hands, to defend and guard the Pretors pavilion, and that quarter. In the mean while he marched with the legionary bands along the high broad street in the camp, called Principalis, and before they had buckled and fitted their armor about them, they were ranged in battle array: and had knowledge of the enemy, by the ear and oncries, rather then by the sight of the eye: neither could they give an estimate what K number they were. At the first, as doubtful of the event, and mistrusting their fortune, they retreated, and received their enemies in, and let them come even into the midst of the camp: but then the Consul cried out, and asked, Whether they meant to be turned out of their own ramparts and holds first, and alter have a new piece of work to assail and win them again? So, they set up a shout, and put all their might together, and first made resistance only and kept their ground: but afterwards they set forward, and pressed upon them: and having once beat them back, they drove them afore them: with the same fear, that they themselves began, yea, and chased them out of the gate and the trench: but to proceed further, for to pursue the chase, they durst not, for fear of some ambushment, by reason of the misty and troubled weather, contenting themselves with the saving of their camp and no more: and so they retired within their ramparts having slain to the number welnear, of three hundred enemies. Of Romans, as weltho that were in the first Corps de garde and Sentinels, who kept the watch, as of those that were surprised about the Questors lodging, were killed 230. This bold adventure of the Samnites speeding so well, made them take better hearts: so as they would not permit the Romans to encamp farther into the Country, no, nor so much, as to go a foraging into their territory: whereupon they were compelled to retire again, and to parvey forage in the quiet and peaceable quarters of their friends about Sora.

The bruit of all these occurrences more troublesome and fearful then truth was, being come to Rome, caused L. Posthumius the Col. before he was well recovered of his sickness, to take the field: but ere he departed the City, he proclaimed the Rendezvous at Sorbus: for his soldiers there to meet. Himself now dedicated unto the goddess Victoria, the Temple: which in the time of his Carnie Edilship he took order to be built, with the money raised of certain fines taken of persons condemned. Then took he his journey to the army, and so went forward from Sora directly into Samnium: to the camp of his brother Consul. But the Samnites distrustful themselves, as not able to withstand two armies, were dislodged, and departed back: and the Consuls also parted one from another, sundry ways, to waste the country, and assault the towns. Posthumius at his first coming, assayed by meet force to assail the town Milvonia, and seeing he could do small good that way, at length by rolling trenches and platforms; he approached close to the walls, and waited: and albeit the town were thus forced, yet there continued a sharp and long fight in all streets and parts thereof, from the fourth hour of the day until the eighth, with doubtful and variable events for a good while: but in the end the Romans became masters of the town. Of Samnites were slain 3200 and 4000, were taken prisoners: besides the gaining of other booty and pillage. From thence, he led forth the legions to Ferentinum, but the inhabitants with their bag and baggage, and all that ever they could drive or carry, had quit the town in the still night season, and departed in great silence at a contrary postern gate, which opened from the camp of the enemy. The Consul so soon as he was come, at the first approached the walls, as well appointed and provided of all things, as if he should have found as much to do, as at Milvonia: but afterwards, perceiving all silent and desolate throughout the City, seeing neither men nor munition within the towers and upon the walls: he held back his soldiers: desirous and greedy to enter upon the bare walls, so abandoned and disformed of defence: and doubting to fall headlong ere he were aware, into the trains of some hidden and privy ambush, he commanded two Cornets of the Cavalry of Latine confederates, to ride about the walls about the counter-tarp, and well to view and consider all places: The horsemen finding one or two gates near together standing wide open, and in the very face ways that led from thence, the fresh tracks and footing of the enemies, as they fled by night; rode softly neerer and neerer to the gates: and there they might see straight afore them safe entrance, and the City lying open even from one end to the other: whereupon they brought word back to the Consul, that the City was abandoned, and the enemies

A enemies gone: which was very evident and apparent, as well by the very solitude thereof, as the new and fresh marks and traces of their dislodging and departure: as also by the stuff and goods that lay here and there scattered all abroad, whiles they halted fearfully in the dark, to take their flight. The Consul upon this report, with his host drew to that side of the town, which the horsemen were at: and pitching down his ensigns not far from the gate, commanded five other three of them should stay behind in the lane place, if they saw all safe and out of danger: and the other two, bring him word what they had seen and found. Who being returned, made relation of nothing but silence and vast desolation all about, both far and near: then forthwith, the Consul entered the City, with certain cohorts lightly appointed, and charged the rest in the mean while to fortify the camp. The soldiers being once entered, fell to break open the doors: where they found a few filthy old folk, and some feeble and diseased persons, with such moveables as were hard to be conveyed and transported: those they rifled, and ransacked: and by certain captives they understood, that divers other towns thereabout, were all with one accord fled and gone: and as for their own countrymen, they departed at the first watch of the night, and they thought no other verily but that in the rest of the Cities, they should find the like emptiness and solitude. And as the prisoners said, so it proved indeed: and the Consul possessed himself of those forlorn and abandoned towns.

C The other Consul M. Attilius, had so calie war for his part: who as he was marching with his Legions toward Luceria, which he heard was besieged by the Samnites: the enemy encountered and met him in the very entry of the frontiers, and gave him battle: and the anger and indignation on both parts, but the end and issue more heavy and dolorous on the Romans side: both because they were not used to be vanquished; and also for that in the very loose and retreat, rather then in combat and skirmish, they found that many more were hurt and slain of their part. Which fearful sight and terror, as it began in the camp, if it had surprised them in the conflict, it would have been an heavy day with them. No doubt they had received a notable overthrow. And even then, being as it was, they had a carefull night, and full of anguish, thinking verily that the Samnites would presently assault their camp, or at leastwile that in the morning betimes they must of necessity fight with the conquerors. But the enemies, as their loss was less, so their heart and courage was never the more: For so soon as the day brake, desirous were they to be gone without any battle. Howbeit there was but one way, & that lay close and near to their enemies: which they were not so soon entered into, but they made shew a far off, as if they marched straight to the assault of the camp. The Consul commanded his men to arm, and to follow after him without the ramparts. To his Lieutenants, Colonels and Captains of the Allies, he gave several charges to do as he thought needful and requisite. They all promised to execute any direction whatsoever; but they said withal, that their soldiers hearts were done, that they had watched and sit up all night, amongst the grievous wounds and uncomfortable groan: of them that lay a dying: and no doubt if the enemy had come before day against the camp, so daunted were they, that they would have abandoned their colours and even now for very shame and nothing else, they forbore indeed to run away, but otherwise their hearts were gone, and they clean spent. The Consul hearing this, thought good to go about him self in person, unto every one of his soldiers, and to speak unto them: and even as he met with any of them, and saw them so backward, and going about so coldly to take arms and weapon in hand: he checked and rebuked them: crying aloud, and asking why they sat still? why they loitered and made such delay? saying, that the enemies would come to them within the very camp, and cut their throats, unless they made more haste to fall forth: yea, and forced they should be to fight before their rent doors, if they would not give battle without the trench and ramparts. They that are armed (saith he) and will fight manfully, shall obtain undoubted victory: but the unarmed and naked man that attendeth the enemies coming, must either die for it, or endure captivity. As he rated and rebuked them in these terms, they answered flatly again, that they had enough of yesterdays work, and were utterly done and had neither strength nor blood left them in their bodies: and now the enemies (say they) seem more in number then they were the day before. Amid these speeches the army approached and being now but a little way off they might take a full view of them more certainly, and see every thing. Whereupon they said confidently, that they saw the Samnites to bring with them their stakes and pales to cast a palliado, no doubt, round about their whole camp. At this, the Consul cried out upon them for very shame to suffer so foul a reproach and disgrace of a most daftardly enemy. And shall we be (quoth he) beset and empaled within our own camp there to die for hunger and famine with shame rather then by edge of sword (if there be no other remedy) with honor, like men? G The gods speed us well (quoth he) and their will be done: and do every man as he thinks best: as for M. Attilius the Consul, he is resolved even himself alone (if no man else will follow) to meet the enemy in the face, and rather be beaten down and die amongst the Samnite ensigns, than see the Roman camp besieged with arrows, cast, and ramparts rife about it. The Lieutenants, Colonels, and all the bands and Cornets of the Cavalry, yea, and the principal Centurions of the foremost companies liked well of this, and repeated the Consul his words. Then the soldiers for stark shame, full faintly take weapon in hand and as slowly God woe go forth of camp. And thus in long ranks and files; not close united together but broken here and there, with heaty cheer, and as men half vanquished already, they marched after a sort toward the enemy, who discovered the Roman Standards, suddenly from the vanguard to the reereguard, there went a muttering and bruit from one to another, that the Romans were come forth (the only thing they always feared) to empeach and stop their passage, so as now there was no way for them to fly and escape from them, and save themselves, but must either die in the place, or slay their enemies and make a land even over their bodies. All their packs and fardels, they cast together upon an heap in the midst: and being armed as they were, every man ranged and marshalled themselves in their own arrays. Now was there a very little space between the two armies, and they stood looking one upon another, waiting when their enemies would begin to give the first charge, and set up the first shout. But neither of both had any Romack to fight, And surely on both sides, they had gone fundry ways untouched, and without any blows given or taken, but that they feared both, lest if they had dismarched of one part first, the other would have come upon them, Thus of themselves they began a faint fight, as unwilling and loath thereto, with an uncertain and unequal flourish: neither flured any man one foot. Then the Roman Consul, to begin the skirmish, sent out some few Cornets of horsemen from a side, without the battailions: whereof the most part sel from their horses; and others were disarrayed and put out of order: whereupon both Samnites ran out to kill those that were fallen, and Romans also to rescue their fellows. Then the skirmish began a little to wax hot: but the Samnites advanced forward in greater number far, and bestrid themselves (as it seemed) more lustily: and withal, the Roman horsemen being disordered and in confusion, with their horses affrighted trod under their feet the footmen that came to rescue. Who beginning once to flie, cauled the whole Roman army also to turn their backs. And now the Samnites played upon the backs of the Romans, as they fled: whereat the Consul rode before a gallop to the camp gate, where he bellooded a good corps de guard of horsemen, opposit in the way: and made proclamation, that whosoever came toward the camp, were he Samnit or were he Roman, should be taken and used as an enemy. With these and such like threats, he put himself against the fouldiers, that marched to fall in heaps to the camp. Withther away sirrah, (quoth he to every souldier that he met) even here shalt thou find men in arms to fight withal: here shalt thou meet with thine enemy, as well as in the field behind: no entering here into the camp without victory, so long as thy Consul liveth: chuse therefore whether thou hadst rather fight with thy own countrimen or thine enemies. While the Consul entreated them with this welcom, the horsemen also with spear in rett, and bent full against them, came all about, charging the footmen upon their peril to turn again to battel. Thus not only the Consul his virtue and prowess firmed in good deed, but fortune also went on their side: for the Samnites followed not the chase to hard, but that the Romans had both time and ground enough to turn about their enligns, and to direct their battailions from their camp against the enemy. Then one encouraged another to go to battel again. The Centurions furnished the banners out of the bearers hands, and advanced them forward: declaring to their fouldiers, how few the enemies were in number, and how disorderly and out of all array they came against them. In this while the Consul lift up his hands to heaven, and with a clear and audible voice, vowed a Temple to Jupiter Stator, if so be the Roman army slayed their flight, and by rennyng the conflict should kill and vanquish the Samnites Legions. Hereupon endevoured they on all hands, the Captain and souldier, both horsemen and footmen, to re-encloise the battel. And even the very gods from heaven seemed to have a special regard of the Romans at that time, so quickly the dice turned, and the enemies were repelled from the ramparts, and withina small while forced again to the very place where the bat-tel began. Where by reason of their fardels and packs which they had heaped together in the midst, and now lay in their very way, they were stopped in their very passage, and for fear lest their goods should be rifled and spoiled, they cast a ring round about their bag and baggage. Then the Roman Infantry afront, and the Cavalry behind, compassed them, and charged upon them right fiercely: where in the midst between, they were either slain or taken. The prisoners were in number 7300, who were all put naked under the yoke, and sold: the number of them that were slain was about 4800. The Romans for all this had no great lift to boast and brag of their victory, for the Consul taking view and account of his loss the two days, found by computation, that he misd 7300.

on, that he missed 7300.

While these things thus passed in Apulia, the Samnites with another power, assayed to surprize and get again Interamna, a Colony of the Romans: situate upon the Latine high-way: but when they could not be masters of the town, they overran and plundered the territory: and having got a good booty of men, women, and cattle, one with another; whiles they were driving the same before them, together with certain Colonizers whom they had taken prisoners, they light upon Confil as he returned with victory from Luceria: where they not only lost their spoil, but were themselves slain as they marched disorderly in long files. The Confil made proclamation, That every man should repair to Interamna, for to own and challenge his own goods, and to receive the same again: and there leaving his army, went to Rome, against the Election of new Magistrates. When he laboured infinitely for a triumph, he was denied that honor; both for that he had lost so many thousands, and also because he had put his captives under the gallows, and fold them, without farther imposition.

Times are the Samnites

The other Col., Posthumus, wanting subject matter of war to work upon among the Samnites, passed

A passed with his army into Tuscany and after he had first pillaged and spoiled the Volturnians territory, he gave them battle not far from their walls, who issued forth to defend their frontiers: where there were 2200, Tuscans slain: the rest, by reason that the City was too near, escaped and saved themselves. Then led he his army into the territory of Reffellum, where he not only laid the fields waste, but won the town also: took prisoners above two thousand and slew under two thousand before their walls. Howbeit, in that year, the peace obtained in Heimria, was more honorable and renowned than the war had been. For three of the strongest and most puissant States, even the very Capital Cities of Tuscany, to wit, Pisum, Perusia, and Arretum, desired accord. And having conditioned with the Consul, and promised, to find his soldiers clothing and corn, so they might

And for that present, each City was fined to pay * 500000 Asles. For these acts done, the Consul having requested triumph of the Senat, for manner and fashion, rather then upon any hope to speed; and perceiving some of them to deny him flatly, as pretending that it was to late ere he departed the City; and other some, for that without order and direction of the Senat, he passed out of Sabinum into Tuscanay; and that partly his adversaries, & partly the friends of his Colleague, who might take some comfort and contentment, that heallo had the repulle with him, were against his triumph: My Matters (quoth he) you that are Senators of Rome, I will not be so far mindful of your honor and majesty, as that I will forget my self to be a Consul: and by vertue of the same authority of commision, wherewith I have conducted and managed these wars: for so much

Cass, I have happily brought them to end, and subdued Seminum and Tifany, achieved victory, and obtained peace; triumph I will, and ask you no leave. And with that he departed out of the Senat. After this, there arose a debate and disention among the Tribuns of the Commons. Some of them said, they would enterpole their negative, that he should not in this manner triumph, and give so illa precedent. Others gave out, that they would assit him in his triumph, maighe the heads of all their Collegues. After much ado, the matter was referred unto the people, and the Consul being thither called, alleged, that L. Horatius, and M. Valerius Con'suls, afo'said Cains Martius Routine of late days, even the father of him, who then was Cenfor, triumphed without the authority and approbation of Senat, only by the ordinance of the people. Over and besides, he added and said, that himself also would have moved the people therein, but that he knew that the

D Tribuns of the Commons, who were become vassals and slaves to the Nobles, would have nipped and crost the bill. As for himself, he protested, that he did and would account of the will and favour of the people, agreeing together, as well as of all their Acts and Decrees whatsoever. So the morrow after, by the assistance of three Trib, banded against the opposition and negative voices of seven yea, and against the general resolution of the Senat, he triumphed: and all the people with great joy folemnized and celebrated the honor of that day. But the records do vary much about the acts and affairs of this year also, Claudius writeth, That Polphemus having won certain towns in Sannium, was after in Apulia discomfited and put to flight: and that himself in person being hurt, was with some few slaves, driven to take Luceria for refuge: and that it was Artilius, that fought in Tusfany, and triumphed, Fabius contrariwise reporteth, That both Consuls E were in Sannium, and at Luceria: and that one of the armies was transported into Tusfany: but which of the Consuls had the conduct thereof, he hath not set down withal: also, that before Luceria, there were on both parts many slain: and how in that battel, there was a Temple vowed to Jupiter Stator, like as Romulus had done before in times past: howbeit, before this time, there was no Temple erected, but only a Fannus, [i. a place pronounced, destined, and consecrated before to build a Temple on], but in this year at that place, the City being now twice bound and obliged to perform one and the same vow, made a conscience of it, and moved the Senat to decree and take order, that the house and temple aforesaid should be edified accordingly.

After this year, there succeeded a brave and noble Count, L. Pappius Censor, as well in regard of his fathers glory, as his own reputation. Also a mighty great war, and such a victory as never any General was like at the Samnitis hands before that day, but L. Pappius again the Consul father. And as it fell out, they made the like preparation for war, with the same endeavor and furniture of most costly and brave armor, as before time. Moreover, they used the help and favor of the gods beides, by a frange kind of induction and institution of the fouldiers, binding them to take their oath, after an old ceremonial custom, as if they were to take orders in some holy mysteries; yea, and levied mutters throughout all Samnium, after a new form of a law and edict: That whosoever of the younger sort and serviceable men, fit to bear arms, shewed not themselves, and gave attendance at the Generals appointment and proclamation, and whosoever departed without his leave and licence, his head should be forfeit unto Jupiter as accursed and damned. Which done, the Remanensis was appointed at Aquilonia, for all the forces to assemble. Where there gathered together, to the number of forty thousand fighting men, even the whole flower and manhood of Samnium. There, about the middle of the camp, was a plot of ground let out, well fenced and enclosed all about with hurdles and boards, and the same covered all over with linnen cloaths: the place was two hundred foot square, every way. Then there was a solemn sacrifice celebrated and divine service paid, according to an order read out of an old book made of linnen and the same by a certain Priest, one Ovius Paccius, a very aged man: who avouched, that he set these sacred and holy ceremonies from the old ancient Religion of the Samnites, according to the manner and custom, which in times past their ancestors had used, at what time as they conspired secretly and conspired, to surprise Capua out of the Tuscans hands. When the sacrifice was done, the General of the army by his Porfivant at arms, commanded to cite and call forth by name, the noblest persons, either for parentage, or ads achieved: who were brought into the place aforesaid, one by one. Amongst other preparations of this sacred solemnity (which were able to strike a religious fear and devotion in a mans mind) there were certain altars erected in the midst of this place closely covered in all parts, and sacrifices lying slain all about, and the Centurions standing round with their swords ready drawn. Then the souldier was caused to approach near the altars (like a sacrifice himself, rather then one that should have his part of the sacrifice) and urged by virtue of an oath, to promise, that he would never utter abroad and reveal, whatsoever he there should see or hear. Afterward he was put to swear, after an horrible and dreadful form of words, framed and tending expressly to the cursing of his own person, his house and all his race and linage, in case, he went not into any battel, whereoever the Generals should lead him, and if either himself fled out of the field; or saw any one to run away, and slew him not outright in the place. At the first verily, some there were that refused to take such an oath, and presently were massacred by the Altars side. And lying there along together with the beasts, which had their throats cut for sacrifices, they served for a warning to teach all the rest how they made refusal. When the chief of the Samnits had taken this abominable and cursed oath, ten of them were elected and nominated by the sovereign Captain, who every one had in charge to chide himself a fellow, and they likewise successively to take other to them, man by man, until they had made up the number of 16000. And these were called Limenta Legio [i. the linen Legion] taking the name of the covering of that inclosure, wherein the Nobility of the Samnits were sworn. These had given unto them brave and glorious armor, with helmets crested and plumed, because they should seem taller then the rest. Another army there was, consisting of twenty thousand and better, who neither in goodly and tall personage, nor in martial prowels and reputation, nor yet in furniture and setting out, were inferior to the linen Legion aforesaid. Lo, what a number there was of fighting men, even the whole strength and manhood of all Samnium, assembled and encamped in Aquilona.

The Roman Consuls took their journey from the City of Rome, and C. Carvilius first; unto whom were appointed the old Legions, which M. Attilius the Consul of the former year, had left in the territory of Interamna. And with them he marched into Samnium. And, mean while that the enemies were over much busied and amused about their superstitious ceremonies, and held their secret and mystical counsels, he won by force from the Samnits, the town Amisernum. Where almost 2000. men were slain, and 4270. taken prisoners. But Papirius, having by direction from the Senat enrolled a new army, forced the town Duronia: took fewer prisoners then his Collegue, but in lieu thereof, put many more to the sword. A rich booty there was got, both in the one place and the other. Afterwards, the Consuls overran the whole country of Samnium, but they spoiled and wasted especially the lands about Atinum. Carvilius marched as far as Cominium, and Papirius to Aquilona, where the whole power of the Samnits lay encamped. There, for a good while they neither sat still, and were altogether idle in the camp, nor yet was there any hot service in the field. They spent the time in provoking them to fight, that gladly would have succin still; or in lying off and giving ground, to those that assailed them: and thus, I say, with threatening, rather then offering battel, they passed the day. For whilst they began ever and anon, and gave over as quickly, there was no issue seen of any skirmishes, & the decision even of small matters and occurrences were prolonged and put off from day to day. The other camp of the Romans lay twenty miles off: and albeit the other Consul was absent, yet his hand and counsel was in every enterprise and exploit. For as there lay a greater weight and charge at Aquilona, then at Cominium: so Carvilius had a more careful eye that way, then to the place which himself besieged. L. Papirius being now at all points provided to fight, dispatched a messenger to his Coluegue, to signify unto him: that he minded the next day, if he were not checked by the Auspices to give the enemy battel: and withal, that it was expedient and needful that he likewise should with all his forces assault Cominium: that the Samnits within, might have neither means nor leisure to send any succour to Aquilona. This post had that one day allowed him to doe his message, and attend his dispatch; and by night he made return, and brought word unto the Consul from his Collegue, that he liked well of his purpose and advice. Papirius then immediately dismissed and sent away the courier aforesaid, and assembled his souldiers to an audience, where he discoursed at large concerning war in general. Much he spake also as touching the present preparation and magnificent furniture of the enemies, more brave and goodly for shew and ostentation then effectual and of importance in the end: "For they are not the plumed crests (quoth he) that give the deadly wounds, but the Romans spear and lance it is, that is able to pierce their gilded and damasked shields: yea, and that other glittering army with milk white diaper coats must be died red in blood, when they come to strokes, and to try it out by dint of sword. The golden and silvered armies of the Samnits, were sometimes by my father put to the sword, and killed to the last man: and they served rather for rich spoils to honour the victorious enemy, then for armor of proof, to defend and save themselves. This is a fatal gift, and destined to our name and family, for to be chosen Generals, and to be opposed against the greatest puissance and attempts of the Samnits, and to bring away with them, those spoils which might be ornaments to beautifie the publick places of the City. And the immortal gods

A "no doubt are present to defend and assist us in our quarrel, against those that so oft have sought for peace and alliance, and as often broke the same themselves. And if a man may conjecture and guess of the will and providence of the Gods, they never were to any army more adverse and full of indignity, then to that, which being tainted and polluted with the blood of beasts and men, massacred and mingled together in an horrible and execrable kind of sacrifice; and vowed to a double anger of the gods, having in dread and horror of one side, the vengeance of the same gods, witnesses off their breach of covenants with the Romans; and on the other side the detestable and abominable curses, comprised in an oath, taken against all covenant and promise; hath sworn by constraint and perforce: hatred and detesteth the oath whereby they are perjured, and at one time, is in fear of the gods, of their own selves, and their enemies. Thus having shewed unto his souldiers (who were already of themselves badly and maliciously enough bent against the enemies) that he had certain intelligence of all these things, by the constant relation averted by certain fugitives that were fled from them unto him: they all being now full of assured hope of Gods help and mans, with one uniform cry called for battel: and nothing grieved them more then this. That it was put off until the morrow; hating in their hearts the rest of that day behind, and that one night, for being so long. About mid-night, Papirius having received letters back from his Collegue, gat him up closely when all were fast asleep, and sent the chick-matter to take token, & observe the presage of the pullets. There was not one throughout the whole camp, of what quality or degree soever but had a desire to fight. The highest as well as the lowest were earnest and eager: the Captains might behold and see the souldiers affection and courage that way, and the souldier likewise the Captains; in so much that the same ardent desire of battel which was in all the rest, reached also even to those that had the charge of the Auspices. For when as the chickens would not peck, the chick-master adventured to lye and falsifie the token, and made report to the Consul, that it was Tripudium solistimum. Whereat the Consul right glad and joyous, pronounced that the token was lucky, and that they were to fight under the favour and conduct of the gods; and hereupon he put forth the signal or bloody banner of battel. As he was now marching forth into the field with his army, behold a fugitive out of the enemies camp, brought word, that twenty cohorts or companies of Samnits, and those were about 4000 in a cohort, were gone to Cominium. And because his Collegue Carvilius should not be ignorant hereof, he presently dispatched a courier in post unto him, and himself commanded the Ensigns and Standards to be advanced and set forward with speed, ordaining the bands in the rearward for succours, and disposing them in divers places, with Captains over the same, accordingly. He appointed L. Volturnius to lead the right wing, and L. Scipio the left, and the horsemen he committed to the conduct of two other Lieutenants, C. Cedinius, and Trebatius. As for Sp. Nautius, he charged him in all haste to take off the pack-saddles from the Mules, and to mount the cohorts of the light armed footmen that serve in the wings, upon their backs, and with them to fetch a compass, and to seize upon an hill there in sight, and in the heat of the conflict, to shew himself from thence, and to raise as great a cloud of dust as possibly he could. Whiles the General was occupied hereabout, there arose some warbling amongst the chicken-masters touching the Auspice or presage of that day; in so much as they were overheard of the Roman horsemen: who supposing it a matter of good consequence and to be regarded, advertised Sp. Papirius, (the Consuls Nephew, or Brothers Son) that there was some doubt and question about the Auspice. The youth born in those days when there were no Atheists, nor Lecturers read of despising God and Religion; enquired farther into the matter, because he would not certify any thing whereof he was not sure: and when he had found out the truth, gave knowledge thereof to the Consul: who said thus unto him, "God blest theemy ion, and be not thou dimayed thereat, but fight hardly more valiantly, and do thy best endeavour. As for him that has the charge and oversight of the Birds and Auspice, if he have made a wrong report, and give up a contrary presage, or false sign, all the mischief and perill light upon his own head for his lewd lye. As for me I was told of a Tripudium, and that the birds fell heartily to their meat and I hold it for a lucky Auspice and token of good success unto the people of Rome and the army, and for no other. This said, he commanded the Centurions to set those pullerets, in the forefront of the battel. The Samnits also for their part set forward their Ensigns, and their battalions follow after gallantly set out in gorgeous armor and brave apparel, in such sort, as the very sight of the enemies repented a magnificent and stately shew to the beholders. But few what hapned before the first shout given, before the first volly of shot and encounter, the principal Pulleriet chanced to be stricken with a javelin, lanced at adventure and at random, and fell down dead even before the Ensigns, which being reported unto the Consul, "Behold the handy work of God (quoth he) the gods are present in this battel, the guilty person hath his due reward. And as the Consul was a speaking these words, lo, just before him a Raven set out a wide clear throat, and cried with a loud noisate which Augury the Cons. rejoiced, and avowed, that the gods appeared never in mens affairs more evidently. And herewith he commanded the trumpets to sound, and to set up a lusty shout: then followed a cruel and terrible fight on both sides, but with hearts and courages far unlike. The Romans were ravished and carried on end to the battel, with anger, hope and heat of conflict greedy of bathing their swords, and embruing their hands in the enemies bloodshed. But the Samnits many of them by force of necessity, and constraint of a blind and superstitious religion, even against their wills, were forced to make resistance, and defend themselves rather then to fight and offend the enemy. Neither had they sustained and held out the first shout, charge and shock of the Romans (as having now for certain years past been used ever more to go away defeated and vanquished) but that a mightier fear imprinted and settled in their heart roots, held them perform from running away: for they ever had continually represented in their eye, the whole furniture of that secret sacrifice; of those armed sacrificers and Priests with naked swords that hideous butchery of men and of brute beasts; lying slain one with another in their blood intermingled together: of the Altars besprinkled and stained with the lawful shedding of the one, and the detestable effusion of the other of the dreadful and horrible execrations and to conclude, of that frantic, furious, and detestable form of words, composed and devised to the detestation and malediction of their line and race. Being fast bound, I say, with these bonds for fleeing away, they stood to it, and stirred not back, fearing their own countrymen more than the enemies. The Romans from both points; and from the middle and main battalion charged hotly, beat them down, killed and cut them in pieces; thus amazed and astonished as they were with dread of gods and awe of man. Small resistance made they, as who only feared to flee and run away: so as by this time, there was execution and havoc made of them almost to the very Standards. At which very instant, there appeared overhead from the one side a dust, as if a mighty army had raised it to their march; namely, Sp. Nautius (or as some say, Obolus Metius) who had the leading of certain Cohorts called Aleria, mounted upon Mules, which on purpose made a dull greater, then for that number they were. For those varlets and new horsemen, as they sat on their Mules and Sampter-beasts, drew after them trailing on the ground, boughs of trees full of boughs and leaves: and first, there appeared in the fore-front (as it were, through a duskish and dim light) their armour and ensigns: but the dust behind them, rising higher and thicker, made shew of a troop of horsemen flanked an army of footmen: wherewith not only the Samnites but Romans also were deceived. And the Consul himself, to avow the error and bear them down it was so: cried aloud amongst the former Ensigns, so as his voice reached unto his enemies; That Cominium was won, and his Brother Consul was come with victory: and therefore, they should endeavour and enforce themselves to get the day, before that another army should win the honour out of their hands. Thus cried he out on horseback galloping among the ranks to and fro. Then he commanded the Colonels and Centurions, to make a way for the men of arms. Himself afore, had willed Trebonius and Cedinius, that when they espied him to bear his spear upright and to shake it, then they should with all the might they had, put forth the Cavalry and charge the enemies. Every thing was done at a beck, according as they were directed and instructed before-hand. The ways were made wide between the files. The horsemen flung out, and with spear in rest charge upon the middle battalion of the enemies, and brake their arrayes whersoever they charged. Volumnius and Scipio seconded them with the Infantry: and while they were disarrayed overthrow them, and bare them to the ground. Down went these linen Cohorts now, when God and man fought against them, and were discomforted: and as well those that took the oath, and the other that were unworn, fled again: and without respect of one thing or other, feared none but their enemies. All the footmen that escaped the battle, were beaten into their camp at Aquilonia. The Gentlemen and the men of arms fled toward Bovianum. The Cavalry of the Romans pursued the horsemen, and the Infantry chased the footmen. The wings took divers ways, the right toward the camp of the Samnites, the left unto the Town. Volumnius was somewhat before, and got the Camp. Scipio found more resistance in the City: not for that vanquished men, as they were, had more courage and resolution, but because that walls are stronger to endure an assault, and better to keep out armed men, then a plain trench and rampart. For, from the Couraine, with stones they beat and repulsed the enemy. Scipio foreseeing well enough that they should be longer about the assault of a strong and fortified town, unless he dispatched the matter quickly and went through with it, in their first affright and confusion, before they took heart again: demanded of his souldiers, If they could take it well, and abide to see the camp won by the other point of the battle, and themselves (being likewise Conquerors) to be repelled from the City Gates? When they all cried, No: and said they would never endure that disgrace: himself with his target over his head, approached the gate, the others following after under a target-kenel, rush into the City, thrust down the Samnites about the Gate, and gat to the Walls: but to engage themselves farther into the City, they durst not, being so few as they were. The Consul himselfe at the first knew nothing of all this, but was occupied about the retreat, and rallying of his men: for now the sun was well near down, and the night coming on apace, caused every thing even to the very victors to seem dangerous and suspicious. But when he was advanced farther, he saw on the right hand the camp taken: and on the left, he heard a confused cry and tumult in the City, compounded of the noise of fighting men, and frightened persons: and even at that instant, it fortuned, that they skirmished at the gate. Then he rode on, neerer and neerer, and saw his own men upon the Walls, howbeit nothing yet fully performed; but through the rash adventure and fool-hardiness of some few, an overtone only made, and some advantage got of performing a great piece of service and worthy exploit. Whereupon, he commanded the forces that were retired to be called, and with banner displayed to enter the City. So soon as they were in, they took the next quarter to the Gate, and for that the night approached, there they rested, and went no farther. But even in that very night, the enemies abandoned the Town.

There

A There were slain that day before Aquilonia 30340 Samnites, and 3870 taken prisoners: and of field enighs they went away with 90. Moreover, this is reported and recorded of Papirius, that there had not been lightly seen a General in any battle more lightome, chearfull, and merry; were it of his own natural disposition, or upon assured confidence of victory. Upon which courage and resolution, he could not be revolved from battle, albeit there was some question and scruple about the Auspice: and even in the hottest time, and dangerous point of the conflict, at what time as the manner is to vow temples to the immortal gods: he vowed unto Jupiter Fitor, if he be that he defeated the Legions of the enemies, to present him with a cup of a sweet and pleasant mead; before he drank any strong and heady wine of the grape: which vow the gods accepted and liked of, and turned the ill presage of the Auspices to good.

The other Consul had as good speed at Cominium: For at the break of day he approached with all his forces to the wals of the town, and invested it round about: and set strong guards at the gates, for fear they should issue or fall forth. And even as he was about to give the signal of assault, there came a messenger post from his fellow Consul, who in great affright brought word of the coming of twenty cohorts to the succour of them within the City: which both kept him short from giving the assault, and caused him to call back again part of his forces, which were arranged and ready under the counter-camp to assail the defendants. Then he gave charge to Diems Brutus Scaevola, one of the Lieutenants, to take the first legion and twenty cohorts of the wings, and other horsemen, to make head against the rescue of the enemies aforesaid; and whersoever he met them, there to impeach them, yea, and if occasion served, to give them battle; and in no case to suffer that power to come to Cominium. Himself commanded that ladders should be reared on every side of the town, and under a fence of targets approached the gates. So that in an instant the gates were burst open, and the wals scaled on every part. The Samnites, as their hearts served them well enough to keep the enemies from entrance, before they saw any armed men upon the wals: so, after they perceived, that they were assailed not aloof with stones and darts, but fast by and with hand-strokes: and how that they, who hardly and with great difficulty from the plain gat up the wals, having now gained and surmounted the place (which they most feared before) could fight at ease from aloft with their enemy, who was not able to match them in the even ground; quiet their towers and wals, and gathered all together in the market place, and there for a while tried the utmost hazard of battle. But afterwards throwing down their weapons, 15400 of them yielded themselves to the Consul his mercy. There were slain 4380. Thus went the game at Cominium, and thus at Aquilonia.

In the mid way between these two Cities, where a third battle was looked for, the enemies were not to be found. And when they were seven miles off from Cominium, they had a counter-march to their own country-men, and were called away, and so came not to the rescue, neither in the one battell nor the other. In the shutting in of the evening, when it began to be dark, being within the sight of the Camp of one hand, and Aquilonia on the other; they might hear a like noise and cry from both parts, which caused them to pause. But afterwards, when they were over-against the Camp which was fired by the Romans: the flame spreading far abroad declared the defeat of the Samnites more evidently, and staid them there for going farther. In which very place they laid down here and there in their armour (as they were) and passed a restless and unquiet long night, expecting (and yet fearing) the light of the day. At the dawning whereof, and so soon as it began to peep, while they were uncertain and doubtful what way to take, they hapned to be discovered by the cavalry of the enemies: and suddenly in a fearful amazement and affright, they took them to their heels and fled in great disorder. Those horsemen having pursued the Samnites, who in the night season escaped out of the town, chanced to spy this foresaid multitude, and perceived they were neither entrenched, nor defended with a good corps de guard. This company was defrased also even from the wals of Aquilonia: wherupon, by this time the legionary footmen likewise made after them; but they could not overtake them in the chase, so fast they fled: howbeit the horsemen cut off some, and slew two hundred and fourscore in the tail of the reregard. In this affright they left much armour behind them, and eighteen ensigns, and so the rest of the army saved themselves, and as well as they might in so fearful confusion, recovered Bovianum. The joy of these two Romans armies was wonderfully increased, to see one another have so good and fortunate success in their enterprises. Both the Consuls, by each others advice and consent, gave their towns thus won unto the souldiers to be sacked and filled: and after the goods were out, to set fire on the empty houses: in such wise, that in one and the same day both Aquilonia and Cominium were burnt to ashes: and the Consuls, with mutual congratulation and joy, as well between their Legions as themselves, feasting one another joyned both their Camps in one. Afterwards in the sight of both Armies, Carvilius highly commended and praised his souldiers every one as he was deserved, and rewarded them with gifts accordingly. Papirius also for his part, who had performed many and lundry skirmishes as well in the field and battle, as about the winning of the Camp and forcing the City, bestowed by way of honour upon Sp. Nautius and Sp. Papirius his brother-son, as also upon four Centurions and the band of the Haspi or Javelineers, bracelets and coronets of gold: namely, Nautius for that he bare himself so worthily in that journey and expedition, wherein with his counter-camp troop of horsemen upon Mules, he so terrified the enemy, as if he had conducted a main army of men at arms: and young Papirius for his good service with his cavalry as well in the battle and con-

first, as also in that night, wherein he forced the Samnites to flee secretly, and quit the City Aquidunum. The Centurions and soldiers, in this regard, that they were the first who seized the gates and walls of that town: as for all the horsemen, in consideration of their manifold travels, and brave exploits (threw in sundry places, he gave them bracelets and little horns of silver. This done, forasmuch as it was time now to withdraw their army from out of Samnium, either both twins, or at least one alone, they late in Council and consultation thereupon: and thought it was the better course (to the end that the Samnites might be brought lower, and their state more sensibly decayed) to go forward still, and charge them with greater force and resolution, and to pursue the rest that was behind; that Samnium might be delivered up to the Consuls their successors, utterly tamed and subdued: since that the enemies now had no army abroad in field, like either to give or abide another battle; and there remained but one manner of making war, even to besiege and assault their Cities and strong Towns: by the winning and subversion whereof, they might with the pillage enrich and make their own soldiers for ever, and withall impoverish their enemies, and make a hard of them quite being now at the last left forced to fight for Church and Home. Hereupon the Consuls dispatched their letters to the Senat and people of Rome, containing the effect at large of all their exploits: and then divided themselves, and took two several waies: Papirius marched with his legions to the siege of Stipurnum; and Carvilius with his to besiege Volturnum.

The Consuls letters were read and heard with exceeding joy, as well in the court of the Council of the City, as in the Common Hall of assemblies; and this publique contentment and rejoicing was solemnized with general processions, for the space of four daies, and with marvellous zeal, affection, and devotion of private persons in particular. And to lay a truth, this victory was to the State of Rome not only great and honourable, but also of great consequence, in regard that it fell out in so good and commodious a time. For even then, news came, that Tuscanus was revolted and rebelled, and men began to cast in their minds, and discourse how they should do (in case ought should hap but well in Samnium) to withstand the forces and invasions of the Tuscans: who taking heart, and presuming upon the Samnites, and their cusied and everable oath, by vertue whereof they were obliged to fight to the utmost extremity, embraced the occasion and opportunity of taking arms again, whilst both the Consuls and the whole forces of Rome were diverted and withdrawn into Samnium, and there employed. The Embassadors of their allies and confederates, were by M. Attilius the Praetor brought into the Senat, and had audience given them: where they complained, that their Territories were over-run, burnt, and spoiled, by the Tuscans their next neighbours; and all because they were unwilling to revolt from the people of Rome: humbly beseeching the LL. of the Senat, to defend and protect them against the violence, wrong, and outrage of common enemies. Answer was returned unto the Embassadors: That the Senat would have regard, that their allies should have no cause to repent of their faithfull allegiance, and constant loyalty; and that ere many daies went over their heads, the Tuscans should taste of the same cup that the Samnites had begun unto them. Howbeit, they would have been slack and cold enough in dealing with the Tuscans, had not fresh news come, that the Falsci also, who had for many years continued in amity and friendship with the people of Rome, were combined with the Tuscans, and entred into arms, as well as they. The near neighbourhood of this nation, gave anedge to the Senators, and whet them on, to take care and ordain, that their Fecial Heralds should be addressed thither to demand restitution and amends for harms done: which being denied, and no goods restored; by the advice and authority of the Senat, together with the grant of the people, war was proclaimed against the Tuscans: and the Consuls were commanded to cast lots, whether of them should pais out of Samnium with his forces, unto Tuscany.

By this time now Carvilius had won Volturnum, Palumbinum, and Herculanum, towns appertaining to the Samnites. Volturnum was forced within few daies: Palumbinum, the same day that he came before the walls: but at Herculanum, he fought two severall battels, with doubtful and uncertain issue, yea, and with more loss of his own part than of the enemies. But afterwards, he pitched his camp before the town, beleaguered the enemies, and kept them within their walls, gave the assault, and won it in the end. In these three towns there were either taken prisoners or slain in all, to the number of ten thousand: but so, as through fear the greater part by far, suffered themselves to be captives, rather than to dye on the edge of the sword.

The Consuls cast lots for their Provinces; and it fell unto Carvilius to go into Tuscany, as the soldiers wished and desired, who could no longer away with the rigour of cold weather in Samnium. As for Papirius, he found a greater power of enemies, and more resistance, before Stipurnum. Many a time he was fought withall in battell arranged: oft skirmished with in his march: yea, and oftentimes under the very walls, the enemies sallied out against him from the Town, in such sort, as he could not tell what to make of it: for neither was it to be called properly a siege alone, nor yet altogether a battell fight; considering that the enemies were no more protected and covered themselves, by the strength of their walls: than the walls were defended by force of arms, and men of war: howbeit in the end, what with fighting, and what with skirmishing, he hedged them within the City, so as they durst come abroad no more, but kept themselves close, and were besieged indeed: and after long siege, as well with forcible assaults, as by trenches, battels, and rampiers, he was master of the town: and therefore after he was possessed of it, upon anger and choler

A cholier that they had so long stood out and put him to so much trouble, that there was more blood-shed; and seven thousand died by the sword, whereas under three thousand were taken prisoners. The spoil and pillage, which was exceeding great, considering that the Samnites had laid up all their goods in some few Cities, was given to the soldiers. And now lay the snow thick all over upon the ground: neither could men endure abroad in the field without house and harbor: and thereupon the Consul retired his Army out of Samnium. Against his coming to Rome, it was decreed by the general voice of all men, that he should triumph: and so he triumphed whilst he was in his Magistracy, with great magnificence, and impetuous pomp, as those daies would afford. For as well his footmen as horsemen marched and passed by in a shew, adorned with their gifts and prizes of honour. Many a civick, vallare and mirale garland was seen worn that day. Much looking and wondering there was at the spoils also of the Samnites armour and apparel: for with their goodly beauty and glorious hues, were they comparable to those that his father had won before him, which were commonly seen, and well known in the publique places of the City, adorned and beautified therewith. Moreover, there were led before him in this triumph and pompous entrance of his into the City, certain captives and prisoners of noble blood descended, men of great worth sometime, and name, as well for their own deeds, as their fathers acts. Great store of Bras Bullion in Ingots, and not coined, was carried in shew, amounting to the weight of 2000533 pound: which malle of bras or copper was raised of the ranome of prisoners. But the bras and silver was laid up in the common Treasury of the City, and nothing at all of the by, was so much the greater in the common people, by reason they were charged besides with an exaction and contribution for soldiers pay; whereas if the Consul had not upon a vain-glorious humour brought into the City-Chamber, such sums which he had gained from the enemy there might a good portion thereof have been bestowed freely amongst the soldiers, & so the forlump Temple of Quirinus, which his father, being Dictator, had vowed: for that he himself vowed it the very time of the battell. I find not in any ancient writer; and certainly in so short a space, he could not possibly have built and finished it. He trimmed it besides, and garnished it with the spoils of the enemies, whereof there was such store and abundance, that not only the foreland Temple and the market-place were therewith fet out and bravely decked, but they were distributed abroad to their allies also and Colonies, near inhabitants, for the decoration and beautifying of their Churches and publique places. After the triumph ended, he brought his Army to winter in the Territory of the Vetins, because those quarters were distressed and annoyed by the Samnites.

In this mean while, Carvilius the Consul, having at his first coming given the assault unto Trojanum, a City in Tuscany, granted license to 470 of the richest Citizens, to depart from thence and by composition, to pay a great sum of money unto him. The rest of the multitude fell into his hands, after he had won the town by mere force. This done, he took five Castles, situate in places of great strength: where were slain of enemies 2400, and not all out 2000 taken prisoners. He granted to the Falsci (who sued for peace) truce for one year, and yet to make present payment of 100000 Asles, and to discharge the soldiers wages for that year. After these exploits achieved, he departed to his triumph: which as it was less honourable and glorious than that of other of his companion in government, in regard of the service performed against the Samnites: he brought into the common Chest 300090 pound: of the surplussage of the pillage of the same goddes, dedicated by King Servius Tullius. To the soldiers that served on foot, he gave of his booty 102 Asles a piece, and twice as much to every Centurion and horseman. Which reward they accepted more thankfully at his hands, by reason of the nigardi: and misery of his Colleague before him. And so gracious was this Consul, that he protected and saved L. Volcanius, one of his Lieutenants, against the people: who being arrested and called to his answer by M. Cincius, a Tribune of the Commons fled for his last help to his Lieutenantship (as they say) and avoided thereby the danger of their judgement: for that during his absence in that charge his accusation might well be set on foot and followed, but brought to a final end and definitiv cience, it could not be.

After this year expired, the new Tribunes of the Commons entred their office: and for that there was supposed some error in their creation, the fifth day after were other chosen in their stead. The same year there was a Lustrum or solemn survey of the City, held by P. Cornelius Arvina, and C. Marius Rutilius Censors. In which were numbered and assessed 262322 pols of Roman Citizens. These were in order the six and tweneth Censors from the beginning: and this was reckoned the nineteenth Lustrum after the first institution. In this year, and never before, the spectators of the Roman Games and Plaies, in regard of their happy success in wars, flood adorned with wreaths and garlands of flowers upon their heads: and then came up the fashion at Rome, borrowed from the manner and custome of Greece, to honour those with branches of the date tree, who won the prizes, and were victors in those solemn Games.

The same year the Ediles Curule, who exhibited the idle pastimes and exercises of activity, paved paid the caufey or high-way with flint or pibble ftone, from the Temple of Mars unto Bouille H and the fines of certain Publicans or farmers of the City, that were graiers and condemned, paid the charges. Then Papirius held the great Affembly for election of new Confuls, and created Q. Fabius Gurges the fon of Maximus, and D. Junius Brutus Scaeva, Confuls. Papirius himfelf was chofen Prætor. This year, fo joious and fortunate in many refpects, could hardly countervail chofen Prætor. This year, fo joious and fortunate in many refpects, could hardly countervail which confumed and devoured both town and country. In fuch a manner, as for the ftangeneſs and extremity thereof, it was held for a prodigious and portentous ſign beyond all courſe of nature, and reach of reaſon. Whereupon, the books of Sibylla were perufed, to know out of them, what iſſue and remedy the gods would vouchſafe to ſhew of this malady and miſery. Wherein they found, that the Image of Æſculapius muſt be ſent for, from as far as Epidaurus to Rome. But for that by year, reaſon that the Confuls were buſied in the wars, nothing was done, but only one day beſtowed wholly in ſupplications and devout Letanies, to the honour of the ſaid god Æſculapius.

The ten Books next following of T. Livius (uſually called the ſecond Decade) are loſt: The Arguments whereof remain yet extant in the Abridgments or Breviaries of L. Florus, which inſtead of the Hiſtory it ſelf, are ſet down in this place.

VVhen Fabius Gurges the Conful, had fought an unfortunate battle againſt the Samnites, and the Senate were about to diſcharge and remove him from his Army; Fabius Maximus his father, beſought them for his ſake, not to offer him that diſgrace and diſhonour. For rather than that ſhould come to paſs, he promiſed to ſerve in perſon under his ſon in quality of his Lieutenant. Which moved the Senate, and prevailed more than any thing elſe. And he was his words maſter. For he went to the field, and by his means and good advice, the Conful his ſon was ſo well aſſiſted, that he defeated the Samnites, triumphed over them, led captive before his triumphant Chariot C. Pontius, Lord General of the Samnites, and afterwards ſtruck off his head. Whiles the City [of Rome] was pitifully viſited and afflicted with the plague, there were certain Embaſſadors addreſſed and ſent to Epidaurum, for to tranſlate the Image of Æſculapius from thence to Rome. And inſtead thereof they brought away a great ſnake or ſerpent, which of it ſelf embarked in their ſhip, and wherein they were verily perſuaded, that the piſſance and divine power of the ſaid god was reſident. And when they had conducted it with them by ſea as far as to Rome, it went forth of its own accord, and ſwam to the Iſland within Tyberis, where it ſetled: and in that very place where it took land, they erected a Temple to Æſculapius. L. Poſthumus, a Conſular man [i.e. who had been Conful] having the charge of an Army, was condemned, and had a round ſue ſet upon his head, for that he employed his ſoldiers about ſome work in one of his farms. The League was now the fourth time renewed with the Samnites, at their earneſt ſuit and requeſt. Curius Dentatus the Conful, after he had defeated and ſlain the Samnites, vanquiſhed the Sabines, who were revolted and rebelled, and received them under his obedience, triumphed twice during the time of one Conſulſhip. Three Colonies were erected, and poſſeſſed, to wit, Caſtrum, Sena, and Adria. The three Triumvirs to ſit upon capital crimes werethen created. A ſiſſing was holden, and a ſolemn Lutrurn, wherein by juſt account were numbred 273000 Citizens of Romans. The Commons, becauſe they were deeply engaged in debt, in regard of grievous and long ſeditious and diſſentions, retired in the end to Janiculum, from whence they were reclaimed and brought again into the City, by the means of Q. Hortenſius the Dictator, who died in the very time of his Magiſtracy. This book containeth moreover the exploits againſt the Volſinians, and alſo the Lucanis, againſt whom it was thought good and ordained, to ſend aid and ſuccours to the Tyrrenians.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the twelfth Book.

The Roman Embaſſadors being murdered by the Senonis in Gaul, and war thereupon denounced and proclaimed againſt them, Lucius Cæcilius the Prætor, furniſhed with his whole army, to be defeated by them, and put to the ſword. When the Roman fleet was ſpoiled and raiſed by the Tarentins, and their Admiral beſides ſlain, the Senate diſpatched their Embaſſadors unto them to make complaint of theſe wrongs and outrages: but they were evilly intreated and ſent away with great abuſe. Whereupon, ſiſſance was likewiſe given unto them, and war proclaimed. The Samnites revolted. Againſt whom together with the Lucanis, Brutians, and Tuſcans, ſundry battels were fortunately fought by divers Roman Captains. Pyrrhus the King of the Epirots [or the Albanos] paſſed over into Italy for to aid the Tarentins. When a Legion of the Campanians was ſent under the conduct of Decius Jubellius to Rhegium, there to lie in garriſon, they treacherouſly ſlew the natural inhabitants, and ſeized the City of Rhegium to their own behoof.

Valerius Levinus the Conful laſt the field againſt Pyrrhus: by occaſion principally that his ſoldiers were rariſhed and amazed at the unuſual ſight of the Elephants. After that battell, when Pyrrhus viewed and beheld the dead bodies of the Romans, lying ſlain on the ground; he ſhewed and marked, that all their faces were threatward the enemy affront. From thence he went forward ſpeſting and miſting all the way to Rome. C. Fabricius was ſent unto him for to treat about the redemption and ranſom of the priſoners: and was ſollicit by the King (but in vain) to abandon the ſervice of his own country. The foreſaid priſoners were enlarged and ſent home without paying any ranſom at all. Cynæas was ſent as Embaſſador from the King unto the Senat; who required, that the King his Maſter, ſhould to end and compoſe all quarrels, might be received into the City and amity of the people of Rome: but when it was thought meet to debate and conſult of this important matter, in a more frequent aſſembly of the Senators, Appius Claudius who many a day had not intermeddled with the affairs of State and Council, preſented himſelf in the Court among the Senators: where his opinion carried the matter clear away, and Pyrrhus his demand was ſtily denied. P. Domitius beſt Cenſor of the Commons, held a Lutrurn or ſurvey of the City, in which were found 278222 Roman Citizens by the poll. A ſecond field was fought againſt Pyrrhus, but with doubtfull event and iſſue. With the Carthaginians, the alliance was renewed now the fourth time. When a certain fugitive traitor that ran from Pyrrhus, offered to *C. The Tarentins being vanquiſhed both peace granted, and liberty alſo reſtored unto them. The ſoldiers of the Campan legion aforeſaid, which had poſſeſſed themſelves of Rhegium, were beſieged; and after they had abſolutely yielded were every one made ſhorter by the head. Certain luſty youths of Rome, who had miſuſed and beaten the Embaſſadors of the Apolloniats, ſent unto the Senat were delivered unto their hands to be uſed according to their diſcretion. The Picentes were overcome in battell, and obtained peace. Two Colonies were ſent, the one to Ariminum within the marches of Picenum, (i.e. Ancona) the other to Beneventum in Sannium. Now and never before began the Romans to uſe ſilver coin for their money. The Umbrians and Salentinians were vanquiſhed, and their ſubmiſſion of obedience received. The number of the Queſtors was augmented [to be eight].

The one and twentieth book of T. Livius.

THe same may I well say, in the Preface and entrance of this one part of my work, which most writers of histories have promised and made profession of, in the beginning of the whole, to wit, That I will write the most famous and memorable war that ever was, even that, which the Carthaginians under the conduct of Annibal fought with the people & State of Rome. For neither any other Cities or Nations are known to have warred together so more wealthy and puissant than they; nor at any time ever were they themselves so great, so strong in forces, and so mighty in means, as now they were. Moreover, they came notoriously now, to wage war, without knowledge of the prowess and martial skill, one of another; for trial they had made thereof sufficient already, in the first punick war. Besides, so variable was the fortune of the field, so doubtfully were their batels fought, that nearer loss and danger were they, who in the end won the better; and achieved the victory. And to conclude, if a man observe the whole course and proceeding of these their wars, their malice and hatred was greater in a manner than their forces: whilst the Romans took foul scorn and disdain that they, whose hap before was to be vanquished, should unprovoked begin war against with the Conquerors; and the Carthaginians were as male-content, and thoroughly offended, as taking themselves (notwithstanding they were overcome) to be abused too much at their hands by their proud, insolent, and covetous rule over them. Over and besides all this, the report goeth, that Annibal being but nine years old, or thereabouts, came fawning and flattering as wanton children do to his father Amilcar, that he would take him with him into Spain; at what time, as after the African war ended, his father was offering sacrifice, ready to pass over thither with an army, where he was brought to the altar side, and induced to lay his hand thereupon; and to touch the sacrifice; and so to swear, that so soon as ever he were able, he would be a professed and mortal enemy to the people of Rome. Vexed (no doubt) at the heart, was Amilcar himself, a man of high spirit and great courage; for the loss of the Islands Sicily and Sardinia: for not only Sicily was overthrally yielded (as he thought) as despairing too soon of the State thereof; and doubting how it should be defended; but also Sardinia was by the cunning and fraudulent practice of the Romans surprised out of the Carthaginians hands; L whilst they were troubled with the commotion and rebellion of Africa; and a Tribute besides imposed upon them. He being disquieted, I say, and troubled with these griefs and discontents, to bare himself five years space in the African war, which infused immediately upon the peace concluded with the Romans; and likewise after, in Spain, for nine years together, enlarging ever still the dominion of Carthage; that all the world might see, heightened and designed a greater war than that he had in hand; and if God had spared him longer life, it should have been well seen that the Carthaginians under the leading of Amilcar, would have made that war upon Italy, which afterward they waged by the conduct of Annibal. But the death of Amilcar happening in so good season [for the Romans] and the childhood and tenderness of Annibal together, were the cause that this war was put off and deferred. In the mean time, between the father and the son, Asdrubal M bare all the rule for the space almost of eight years. This Asdrubal had been Amilcar's minion, grown highly into his grace and favour, at the first (as men say), for the very prime and flower of his youth; but afterwards in regard of the singular towards of a brave and haughty mind, which his soon appeared in him, and for his forwardness to action, he was preferred to be his son in law, and married his daughter. Now, forthwith as he was Amilcar's heir in law, he was advanced to the sovereign conduct of the war, with no good liking at all and content of the Nobility and Peers, but by the means and favour only of the Barbin faction, which bare a great stroke, and might do all in all, among the souldiers and the common people. Who managed all his affairs, more by policy and face counsel, than by force and violence: and using the authority and name of the Princes and great Lords of those countries; and by entreating friendship with the chief Rulers, won daily the hearts of new nations still; and by that means enlarged the power and influence of the Carthaginians in Spain, rather than by any want of force of arms. But for all this peace with foreign States, he was never the more sure of his own life at home. For a certain barbarous fellow, for anger that they were attendant about Asdrubal's person, he kept the same counsel hold on by them that were attendant about Asdrubal's person; as he kept the same counsel still; as if he had escaped and gone clear away; yea, and when he was by cruel tortments all manner mangled and torn, he looked so cheerfully and pleasantly on the matters; as if he had seemed to smile at his joy of heart surpassed the pains and anguish of his body. With this Asdrubal, for that he had for singular a gift and wonderful dexterity in soliciting and annexing unto his dominions the most far situate, the people of Rome had renewed the League, upon these two capitulations and conditions; first, that the river Tiber should limit and determine the feigneries of them both: Teem, that the Saguntines, leaved in the midst between the territories of both nations, should remain free, and enjoy their ancient liberties. No doubt at all there was now, but when a new Commander should succeed in the room of Asdrubal, the favour of the people would go clear with the prerogative voice and choice of the souldiers: who presently brought young Annibal into the General his pavilion, and with exceeding

A ding great acclamation and accord of all, saluted him by the name of Captain General. For this you must understand, that Afamb by his letters misivive had lent for him, being very young, and hardly fourteen years of age, yea, and the matter was debated first in the Council-tious at Carbage, where they of the Barchine side laboured and followed the matter earnestly, that Ambib should be trained in warfare, and grow up to succeed his father in equal prowess & greatness. But Hamo the chief man of the contrary faction : " It is but meet and reason (quoth he) " that Afamb doth demand : and yet for mine own part I think it not good, that his request " should be granted. When they muted and marvelled much at this doubtfull speech of his, and wist not what contruction to make of it, " Why then? quoth Hamo, to be plain, That Afamb " and beaury of youth, which Afamb himself yielded and parted withall sometimes unto Amnibals father, for to use or abuse at his pleasure : the same he thinketh by good right he may " challenge and have again, from the son, to make quittance. But it becometh not us so to acquaint our young youths with the Camp that under the colour, and instead of their military institution and teaching, they abandon and give their bodies to serve the lust and appetite of the " Generals. What? Is this the thing we fear, That the son of Ambur should tarry too long ere he see the excessive grandeur and sovereignty of his father, and theately shew as it were of his " royalty? Or doubt we, that we shal not soon enough serve in all dutiell allegiance his natural son, unto whose son in law all our Armies have been leafe (as it were) in lawfull right of inheritance? Nay, I am of opinion, and this is my judgment, That this youth be kept in awe at home, under obedience of laws, under civill Magistrates, and learn a while to live in equall condition with the rell of the Citizens and subjects : for fear least at one time or other, this little spark do burn outright, and raise a mighty flame. A few, and those were, in a manner, all of the best sort and foundest judgment, accorded with Hamo. But, as commonly it is seen, the greater number over-weighed the better.

Thus Annibal was sent into Spain, and immediately at his first coming, drew all the whole army after him: so highly he was regarded and beloved. The old souldiers beleev'd verily, that Annibal was alive again, and came amongst them: they thought they beheld and saw the same vigour and spirit in his countenance & visage, the same quickness and liveliness in his eyes, the same proportion, feature and lineaments of his face. And afterwards, within short time, he had wrought and wound himself into their favour, that the late remembrance of his father was the least matter of all others, that won him grace and love among them. Never was there one and the self-same nature, framed and fitted better, for two things that are in quality most contrary; namely, to rule, and to obey. Whereby, a man could hardly discern and judge, whether he was more dear unto the General for the one, or to the Army for the other. For neither Annibal would make choice of any one before him, when there was some valiant service or brave exploit to be executed: nor the souldiers put more confidence in any other Leader, nor go more boldly and resolutely to any enterprise, than under him. Most forward he was and hardy to all hazards and dangerous adventures: right provident and wary again, at the very point of peril and jeopardy. No travel was able to weary and tire his body: no pains-taking could daunt and break his heart. He could away with heat and cold alike. For his diet and feeding, he measured both his meat and drink by his natural appetite, and not by pleasure and delight some taste. For sleeping, for waking, day and night was all one with him. When he had once performed his service, and finished his exploit: if there were any spare time after, therein would he take his rest and repose: so that should not be upon a foot bed neither, nor procure with great civility by still silence, and making no noise about him. Full often many a man hath seen him lying on the hard and bare ground, under a good souldiers jacket and homely caskock call over him, even among the sentinels and corps de guard. For his apparel, it was not more costly nor braver than his fellows and companions: many, in his armour and hories he loved ever to be goodly be-seen above all other. Amongst footmen and horsemen both, he would always be a great way foremost. And to conclude in giving a charge upon the enemy, and to begin to battell, he was by his good will ever the first: and when the fight was done, the last man seen to retire out of the field. Of these his noble qualities and many virtues, he had not so many, but there were as great vices and imperfections in him again, to counterpoise the same. Cruelty most savage and inhumane, ill-mood and treachery more than * Punick: no truth, no honesty, no fear of God, no regard of oath, no conscience, nor religion.

Disposed thus as he was, and inclined by nature, to virtues, and vices, he served still three years under General Asarbal. During which time, he omitted and forgot no one thing that was meet either to be executed or enterprised by a man that was himselfe another day to be a Captain and Chief Commander in the wars. From the very first day that he was chozen and declared Lord General; as if at the same instant, Italy had been the Province assigned unto him. as if, I say, he had received Commission to war with the Romans, he thought good to make no delays, for fear lest haply whiles he lingered and slackt the time, some mischance might prevent his designs and cut him short, like as it had overtaken his father first; and Asarbal afterwards: but pre-determined to make war upon the Saguntines, by assailing whom, the Romans no doubt were touched, and would take arms and enter into the quarrel. But first he led his army into the marches of the Oleades (a nation beyond Iberus, rather siding and taking part with the Carthaginians, than under their jurisdiction) that he might not seem to have set out the Saguntines and

of a Senator in Carthage.

Now had the Provinces been nominated and appointed before to the Consuls: but then were they commanded by calling lots, to part them between them, to Cornelius fell Spain: To Sempronius Affrick and Sicily. Likewise decreed it was, that for that year, there should be levied six Legions of Romans: and of allies, as many as they thought good: also that as great an army as might be, should be rigged and set out. So there were enrolled 24000 Roman footmen, and of Horsemen 1800: of allies 44000 foot, and 4000 horse, 220 galleys, with five course of oars on a side, and twentyfoils, were set afloat. After this, a bill was preferred unto the people, that it might please them to determine and grant, that war should be proclaimed against the people of Carthage. And in regard of that war, there was also a solemn supplication holden through the City: wherein the people adored and prayed the Gods to prosper and bring to an happy end, this war which the people of Rome had determined. And betwixt the Consuls thus were the forces divided: Sempronius had the conduct of two Legions, consisting of four thousand foot, and three hundred horse a piece: also of allies sixteen thousand foot, one thousand and eight hundred Horse, besides 160 galleys, and twelve barks or foils. With this power for Land and Sea he went, Sempronius lent into Sicily, from thence to pass over into Affrick, in case the other Consul were able to impeach the Carthaginians for coming into Italy. Cornelius had the charge of a smaller power: for that L. Manlius the Pretor, was sent in person into France with a sufficient army: but in the number of ships especially, was Cornelius scant 60 galleys of five banks of oars he had, and no more, (for it was supposed that the enemy would neither come by Sea, nor fight in that kind of service) and two Roman Legions with the full proportion of Horsemen, and 14000 footmen of allies, with 1200 men of arms. That Province of France (in those parts where the Carthagian was expected) had that year two Legions of Roman footmen, 14000 allies, besides 2000 Horse from them, and 6000 of the Romans. When all things were thus prepared, to the end that before war began, it might appear they dealt by order of law, and with justice: and that all due complements might be performed, they sent certain grave and ancient personages in Embassie into Affrick, to wit, Q. Fabius, M. Livius, L. Amilius, C. Licinius, and Q. Publius. First, to demand and know of the Carthaginians, Whether Anubius by their publick warrant and authority, besieged and assailed Saguntum? then, if they avowed the Act, and stood to it (as they were like to do) confessing that it was done by the counsel of the State; to give defiance, and proclaim open war against them. The Romans being arrived at Carthage, had audience given in their Senat-house: where, after Q. Fabius had briefly demanded nothing else, but that one thing which he had in charge and commission, then a principal Senator among the Carthaginians stood up and said:

“Your former Embassage, my masters of Rome, was even as vain as this, when ye required and F “would needs have Ambial to be yeelded unto you; as if he had beleeved Saguntum of his own “head. And as for this, that you come with now, howsoever in words it seem more mild and “flood, yet in deed and in truth it is more rude and rigorous: for then, was Ambial only “charged and demanded to iustice; but now are we both urged to acknowledge a fault, and also “to make ample restitution and satisfaction out of hands: as if we had avowed and confessed the “action. For mine own part, of this mind am I, that the case ought thus to be laid, and the ques“tion brought to this issue, not whether Saguntum was besieged by a privat person, or publike “Council; but whether by right, or wrongfully. For to enquire and examine whether our citizen “and subject have done this by our advice, or of himself, pertaineth to us alone, as also to censure “and punish him accordingly: with you we are to debate this point only, Whether it might stand G “with the league to do it, or no? And therefore since it pleaseeth you, that we should dispute and “distinguish, between the action of a General, warranted by the publick State, and an enterprize “proceeding from his own motive; ye shall understand, that there was indeed a league between “you and us, contracted by Lutetia the Confil, wherein there is a clause, comprising the allies “of both parties: as concerning the Saguntins (who as then were none of your confederates) there “was not one word at all therein: but in that league, (ye will say) that was contracted with Af- “ricus, the Saguntins are expressly named and excepted: to which I have nothing to plead, but E “even that which I have learned of you, For ye say yourselves denied, that ye were bound to stand to that accord which C. Laetanius your Consul first made with us, because it passed neither by consent of the nobles, nor grant of the people. Whereupon, there was another league anew drawn out, and by publick agreement enacted. If you then, be not tied to observe your leagues, unless they be authorized by the nobles, or ratified by the people, more can the league of Afrubal oblige us, which he concluded without our privy and knowledge. Forbear there fore to speak either of Saguntum, or Iberus: and what your mind hath so long conceived, let it hatch now at length, and bring it forth. Then Q. Fabius the Roman Ambassador, having made a hollow lap within the plait and fold of his side gown, Here quoth he, within this lappet, we present and offer war and peace unto you, take whether ye will. At which word, they all cried out at once with as great romack and boldness: Marry even which you will your self, I Whereat he let his robe loose again: Why then, there is war, quoth he, take it amongst you. Let come fay they all again, and welcome be it: and as willingly as we accept thereof, so shall we follow and manage it as thoroughly.

This direct demand, and round denouncing of war, seemed more for the honor of the Romans, than to make much dispute and argument about the right of the cause, and of the covenants: a vain matter before, but now especially, after the winning and destruction of Saguntum. For if the question were to be decided by words and reasoning, that league of Afrubal which was exchanged for the former of Laetanius, was not the same nor the tenor thereof to be compared: seeing that in the accord of Laetanius, this bran h and proviso was expressly added, [That it should stand good, and be ratified, if the people approved thereof:] but in this of Afrubal, K there was no such condition at all: and besides, the covenant for so many years space during his life, was so established and confirmed, and no word to the contrary: that when the very maker and author thereof was dead, there was no change and alteration. And yet, put case they should have stood upon the former alliance: the Saguntins weretherein well enough complied and provided for, in that the allies of either part were excepted and comprehended. For neither was this clause added [They who at that time were allies:] nor yet were they excepted against, who afterwards should become, or be admitted allies. And seeing that it was lawful to entertain new confederates, who is it that would judge it reasonable, either that no man should be received unto amity for any good desert whatsoever: or being once received into protection, should not be defended accordingly? Provided always, that no allies of the Carthaginians should either be solicited to rebellion, or received again, if of themselves they once revolted.

The Roman Ambassadors, as they were commanded at Rome, passed the seas from Carthage into Spain, for to visit all the Cities, and to see whether they could either draw them to their society, or withdraw them from the Carthaginians. And first they came to the Bargusians, where being courteously entertained [for weary they were of the Carthaginians government] they fired up many other nations beyond Iberus, to have a desire to change for a new world. From thence they came to the Volcians, whose notable answer reported throughout all Spain, turned away all other States from banding with the Romans: for thus in a solemn assembly a sage and ancient father among them framed his answer, "With what face can ye Romans require us to prefer your friend ship and amity before the Carthaginians? seeing that the Saguntins who did the same, have been M more cruelly by your allies betrayed, than by their enemies the Carthaginians destroyed? By my advice go and seek you confederates there, where the woful calamity and misery of Saguntum is not known, The lamentable ruins of which City, as it is a doleful example, so it shall be a notable warning to all nations of Spain, that no man ever after repose trust in the protection of society of the Romans. Whereupon, they were commanded to depart the borders of the Volcians immediately, and in no Diet or Council of Spain, had they afterwards any better entertainment, and more courteous language. Thus having in vain gone through all Spain, they took their way into Gaul: where they saw a strange sight, and a fearful fashion: for all in armour (such was the guise and manner of the country) they came to their publick assemblies: and there, these Ambassadors after they had set out in goodly words the greatness and glory of the people of Rome, N and highly magnified their large empire and dominion, and thereupon made request, that they would not give the Carthaginians leave (who minded to make war upon Italy) for to pass through their Cities and Towns: hereat they set up such laughter, with a certain grumbling and murmuring, that scarcely could the youth be filled and quieted by the Magistrates and Elders: so foolish, so foolish, and shameless seemed this demand, in their conceit: that they should once imagine that the Gauls were such Asles, as they would be content (rather than to let the way pass into Italy) to avert and turn it upon themselves, and to suffer, yea, and offer their own territories to be spoiled and foraged, for the safety (soforth) of other mens Lands, who were but meer aliens and strangers unto them. The noise and garbail being at length hushed and appeased, this answer was returned to the Ambassadors: "That neither the Romans had deserved so well, nor the Carthaginians so ill, at their hands, that they should take arms either for Romans, or against Carthaginians. But contrary-wise, they were advertised, that some of their nation, werety the people of Rome driven out of the marches and confines of Italy, put to pay tribute, yea, and "indured other outrages and indignities. The like demands and answers passed to and fro in other Councils and Assemblies of Gaul: neither could they meet with any friendly entertainment, or have peaceable words given them, before they came to Massila: where, after diligent inquiry, and faithful search made by their allies; they had true advertisements, that Annibal above had wrought the hearts of the Gauls to his own purpose, and was possessed of them: that they understood withal, that they were not like to continue long in good terms of friendship: and so even to him, (so fierce and savage, so untractable are they, and untamed by nature) unless their Princes and Rulers be ever and anon, well fed and plied with gold, wherof that nation of all others is most greedy and covetous. The Roman Embassadors, having thus gone their circuit over all the States of Spain and Gaul, returned to Rome, not long after that the Consil had taken their journey into their Provinces: where they found the whole City possessed with the expectation of war: so ripe and current was the rumor and bruit abroad, that the Carthaginians were already passed over the River Iberus.

Annibal after the winning of Saguntum, had retired him self to winter in new Carthage: and there having intelligence what had been done and decreed, as well at Rome, as at Carthage (in Africk) and that he was reputed not only the Captain General and Conductor, but also the very author and cause of all this war, so soon as he had divided and sold the reit of the booty and pillage that remained, thought good now to make no longer delays, but assembled the rouldiers of the Spanish Nation, and to them he spake in this manner, "My trusty friends and loyal confederates, I am persuaded, that ye yourselves do see as well as I now, that all the States of Spain are in peace and quietness, that either ye are to make an end of soldiery, and all our forces to be cast off and discharged from service; or else that ye must remove the war into other Lands. For to shall these Nations prosper and flourish, and not only enjoy the blessings of peace, but also reap the fruits of war, if we will seek to gain riches, and to acquire glory and honor from others. State therefore we are to war shortly far from home, and doubt it is, when you shall see again your houses, and whatsoever there is dear unto you: if any of you be desirous to visit home, his wife and children, kinsfolks, and friends, I give him license and free passport. But I command you withal, to shew your selves here again before me, in the beginning of the next spring: that with the help of God, we may in hand with that war, whereby we shall purchase both worship and wealth. There was not one in a manner but, well accepted of this liberty so frankly offered by himself, and were desirous to have a sight of house and land both for that every one ready longed for their friends and kindred, and for as yet in farther time to come, a greater mis, and cause of more longing after them. This reit all Winter time, between their travels path, and those they D were soon after to endure, refreshed as well their bodies as their minds, and prepared them to abide and endure all new pains whatsoever. So in the very prime of the spring, according to the Edict aforesaid, they all assembled together again. Annibal having taken a muster and survey of the aids that were sent unto him from all those Nations, went to Gades: and there, to Hercules he paid his old vows, and bound himself to new, if the reit of his enterprises should speed well and have good success. After this, dividing and casting care indifferently, as well for offensive as defensive war, doubting lest whiler he went by Land through Spain and France into Italy, Africk should lie open and naked to the Romans from Sicily side: purposed to forsake and make that part sure with strong garrisons. In lieu whereof, he sent for fresh supply out of Africk, especially of Archers and Javelottiers, and those lightly armed: to the end, that the Africans might serve in E Spain, and the Spaniards in Africk: like (both the one and the other) to prove the better soldiers, far from their own countries, and being bound as it were, with mutual and reciprocal pledges. So he sent into Africk 13850 footmen, armed with light targets, and 870 slingers of the Islands: * Baleares, 1200 Horsemen also out of sundry Nations, Which forces he disposed, partly for the defence of Carthage, and partly to be divided through Africk, for the guard thereof. He sent withal, certain Commissioners into all their Cities to take up soldiery, and enrolled 400 of their chosen youths, who should be brought to Carthage, there to lie in garrison, and to serve for hostages. And supposing that Spain was not to be neglected, and the rather, because he was not ignorant how the Roman Ambassadors had visited the same round to see how they could solicit and work the Princes and rulers to their mind, he committed the charge of that Province to his brother Afrubal, a valiant and hardy man: and furnished him with good forces, especially out of Africk, to wit, 11850 Africans footmen, 300 Ligurians, 500 Balear Islanders. To this power of footmen, three hundred Horse of the * Libyphoenicians, a Nation mixt of Carthaginians and Africans, Of Numidians and Moors, that coast upon the Ocean, 1900, with a small corner of 200 Horsemen of Ibergetes out of Spain. And because he should want no manner of Land help, fourteen Elephants besides. Moreover, there was a fleet allowed him for the defence of the Sea-coasts. For by what forces and service the Romans had before got victory, thereby it was likely, that they would fill maintain and continue their wars, so Gallies there fore of five banks of oars, he had at Sea, two of four, and five of three. But of the five oared gallies aforesaid, he had no more but two and thirty, fitted and well appointed with rowers and mariners, and so were the G five of three banks.

From Gades, the army of Annibal returned to winter in Carthage: and from thence he passed by the City * Etroussa, and marched forward with his forces to Iberus and the Sea-coasts. Where it is reported, that in his sleep he dreamed, and saw a vision namely, a young man of divine shape and semblance, saying, That he was sent from Jupiter to guide him in his voyage into Italy, and willed him therefore to follow him, and in no way to turn his eyes from him one way or other. Also, that at the first he being scared and affrighted durst not look either about or behind, but followed him still: afterwards (as men by nature are curious) when he cast and discoursed in his his mind, what it might be, that he was forbidden so to see behind him, he could not hold and rule his eyes, but must needs look back: and then he beheld behind him, a report of huge greatness coming again, and all the way as it went, to bear down trees, groves, and thickets; and after all that, he perceived a great storm and tempest coming, with mighty thunder-claps. Now when he was desirous to know what this to be, common and strange sight might signify, he heard a voice, saying, That it befokened the time and waiting of Italy, whilest him they force to go hill forward with his voyage, and fear not further into the secrets of the Gods, but leave them to the hidden destinies: Annibal signe joyous at this vision, passed over Iberus with his whole power, divided into three parts, having sent certain before him with gifts and rewards, into all parts wheres he should march with his army, to gain the hearts of the Gauls; and wisheth, to seek out and discover the passages of the Alpes. So he crossed the River Iberus with 30000 foot, and 13000 Horses, strong. After this, he subdued the Illyriæ, the Bargaulians, Auleians, and Aquitain, which lyeth under the hills Pyrenæ. The government of all these Nations, he let over to Hanno, that he might have at his command the heights which joyned Prælia and Spain together. Unto whom he allowed 10000 footmen, and 1000 horses, for to defend and keep inobedience those countries. After that his army was on foot, and began to march through the forest Pyrenæus, and that there ran among the barbarous people a more certain bruit. That they were to make war with the Romans; three thousand footmen of the Carpetans, returned back: and for certain it was known, that they departed not for fear so much of the war, as the tedious journey and unpassable wayes of the Alpes. Annibal, considering that either to retreat, or to keep them by violence, was a dangerous matter; for fear lest thereby he should provoke the fierce stomacks of the rest; sent home again above 7000 Illyriæ, as he perceived to be weary, and to have no mind to the service: and made semblance withal, that the Carpetans were by his leave discharged. And doubting lest long stay and ease there, might tempt his soldiers, and give occasion of mutinies, with the rest of his forces he passed Pyrenæus, and pitched his Camp before the Town of Ilberis. The Gauls, albeit they were advertised, that it was Illyriæ, were by force subdued; yet because the bruit was blazed, that the Spaniards beyond Iberus, were by force subdued, and strong garrisons placed in their Cities: certain Nations of them, for fear of the Trade and bondage, rose up in arms, and assembled together at Rufino. Which being related to Annibal, he fearing more that they would stay him in his journey, than endanger him in fight, sent certain Orators or Embassadors to their Princes and great Lords, to signify unto them, that himself in person would gladly parley with them, and that it should be in their choice whether they would come nearer to Ilberis, or himself go forward to Rufino. Where, being met together, they might more easily meet and confer. For as he was willing to receive them into his camp, and would be glad to see them there: so he would not think much of his pains, to repair unto them himself, as one that was thither come, as a friend and guest unto France, and not as an enemy: and would not by his good will draw a sword (if the Gauls would let him alone) before he were entered within Italy. And thus much verily passed by messengers and couriers between. But so soon as the Lords of France, who presently removed their camp to Ilberis, were come willingly enough to Annibal, as being bribed and corrupted with money and presents, they gave his army good leave to pass through their countries along the Town Rufino.

In Italy this while, the Embassadors of Marcellus had brought no other word to Rome, but that Annibal was only gone over Iberus; but, by that time, the Boii had stirred up the Insubrians to mutiny, and were revolted themselves, even as if he had passed the Alpes already: which they did not so much upon old rancor and malice to the people of Rome, as for that, they took it ill, and were discontented, that there were Colonies brought lately into the Gauls country, to be planted about Padus, Placentia and Cremona. Whereupon they arose suddenly, took arms, and entered by force into those parts, and made so foul work and fearful havoc, that not only the country people and villagers, but also the three Roman Commissioners called Triumvirs, to wit, Caius N. Lucilius, Ant. Servilius, and Titus Annius, who were come to set out the Lands and territory to the said Colonies, not trusting the walls of Placentia, fled to Medina. That Lucilius was one of them, it is not doubted: but some records have Q. Aclius and C. Hærennius, instead of A. Servilius and T. Annius; and others again, nominate P. Cornelius Afina, and C. Papirius Mafio. It is uncertain also, whether they were the Embassadors sent to the Boii, to reason of expulsiat the matter, that had above offered them, and were evil intreated; or that the Triumvirs above said, were for upon and assailed as they were measuring out the Lands. But whiles they were thus besieged at Medina, and those Boians lying at siege (a nation unkillit altogether in the fear of assaulting Towns, and likewise of all other most cowardly to attempt any martial exploits) whiles they lay idly about the walls, and never once advanced against them, they began to make shew of a treaty for peace. Whereupon the Roman Embassadors or Commissioners, being by the chief of the Gauls called out to parley, were not only against law of nations, but with breach also of their faithful promise, and word which they had given that time, apprehended: and the Gauls said plainly, they would not let them go, unless their hostages were delivered them again. These news touching the Embassadors being reported and Medina with the garrison in danger: L. Manlius the Pretor, in great anger and indignation, brought his army in more hast than good order, before Medina. There were in those dayes great woods about the high way, and most part of the country wilds and waits, not inhabited: where he having engaged himself without his espials, was intrapped within an ambush; lost many of his men, and hardly recovered the open champaign country. There he incamped himself strongly: and for that the Gauls had no heart to assault, nor hope to seize a shew of soil, and knew their forces to be much impaired. Then began he to march on, in not in sight: but when they were entered the forests again, they set upon the rearward of them: the place, and the enemies went away with his ensigns. But afterwards, the Gauls ceased to molest and trouble, and the Romans gave over to fear, so soon as they were passed, and escaped the rough, symbrous, and unpassable forests. And the Romans being now able in the open and champaign country to march with safety, made hast to get to Tarentum, a village near unto the river, and the aid also of certain Gauls called Brixians, they defended themselves against the enemies, whose number daily encreased. After this sudden tumult was reported at Rome, and that the LL, of the Senat were advertised, that besides the war with the Carthaginians, the Gauls were up in arms: they gave order, that C. Atilius the Pretor should go (with him a Roman Legion, and four thousand allies, who were enrolled by the Consul Scipio to aid Manlius: who without any skirmish (by reason that the enemies were fled for fear) to aid Manlius: who Cornelius having newly levied one Legion in lieu of that which was sent with the Pretor, departed from the City of Rome, and passing with 60 Gauls along the coasts of Tifany, Liguria, and so forward of the S. Iser, shortly arrived at Medina, and encamped near the next mouth of Rhodanus: (for the river is divided into many branches; and so discharge it self into the Sea) being not fully of belief that Annibal as yet had passed over the mountains Pyrenæ. But when he understood that he was ready, even then to pass Rhodanus also; and doubting in what place to encounter and meet him, his people as yet not recovered, after their being sea-sick: he sent before 300 elect men of arms, guided by the Malissians, and certain Gauls that came to aid: for to desciver all, and to take a full view of the enemies lately without danger.

Annibal having appeased the rest of the country, either for fear or by means of money, was now come into the country of the Volcans: a pusillart people and a valiant. These inhabit along both the banks of Rhodanus; and mistrusting that they were notable to defend their Lands against the Carthaginians, on that side of the River which lay to them: because they might have the whole River to serve them for a good defence and rampier, transported over the Rhospe all in manner that ever they had, and kept the bank on the other side. The rest of the inhabitants next to the River, and even those also in whose territories Annibal had let foot already, both he himself with gifts allured to get together from all parts shipping; and to frame new vessels: and they themselves likewise, were as willing to have his army transported and their own country eased and delivered (they cared not how soon) of so great a multitude of troublesome guests. Whereupon, there was got together an huge number of lighters, barges, and boats especially, which were made in hast without great workmanship; in which the people inhabiting thereby used to transport wares and commodities from one to another. Other new wharries also, the Gauls began first to make of the hollowed trunks of trees; and after them, the soldiers for that they had both store of timber and saw the workmanship but slight and easy, made in hast certain bottoms, such as they were, like troughs without form or fashion, regarding no handiworkmen at all, so they would but float on the water, and receive burden, in which they might convey over themselves and that which they had.

Now when they had prepared and made all ready for their passage, the enemies on the other side sight against them, kept and covered all the bank along with men and Horses, putting them to much trouble and fear. Annibal therefore to withdraw them from that place, commanded Hanno the son of Bomilcar, at the first watch of the night, to go up the stream along the river side, one first could espie a convenient place, to cross the river, and to land as secretly as he could: and then Hereunto were appointed certain Gauls for guides: who from thence conducted them some 25 miles above, to a little Island compassed about with the river, which here spread out in breadth, by place of passage. There, in all hast they cut down and hewed timber, and made boats to let over to vessels of leather like bladders, full of wind, and laying their bucklers thereupon, sat aloft and let over. The rest of the army also, with joyning planks and troughs together, was toilsome work, they rested one day to refresh themselves, whiles their Captain studied and was occupied, to execute his commission and his intended service in good and convenient time. The morrow after they removed from thence, and gave knowledge by smoke that they were passed over and not far off. Which when Annibal perceived, for that he would not lose the vintage of that time, he gave signal to his men also to get over the water. Now had the footmen already their boats prepared and fitted. And the couriers and tanks of barges (which to receive and break nothing inferior, either in wealth and puissance, or in fame and reputation to any people or State of the Gauls whatsoever. But at that very time there was some discord and variance among them, by occasion of two brethren who were at strife for the crown and Kingdom: the elder, whose name was Brancus, and had before enjoyed the Signory; the elder, whose name was Brancus, and had before enjoyed the Signory; the younger brother, and a lully crew of the youth; who as they had els right on their side, fo they were the mightier. The deciding of this variance, was referred and put over unto Ambul, in good and fit time for his purpose, as he could have wished: and the foreloft was made the umpire and judge, to determine whether of them should be King. And he restored the elder to the Kingdom: like as it would have been adjudged by the award of the Senators and Nobles of the country. For which benefit and good turn, he was rewarded with signal, and store of all things abundantly, yea and with payment and apparel, which he was driven to provide aforehand, for the name that went of the Alps, which for their coldness were in great distress.

Having thus appeased the debate of the Allobroges, and minding now to set forward to the Alps, he would forego the direct straight way, but turned on the left hand to the Tri alpins, and from thence passing by the frontiers of the Vocontins, he marched into the Tri alpins; and never was he stayed or impeaded in his journey before that came to the River Druentis; which defending also out of the Alps, is of all other Rivers in France most hard to be passed over: for although it carry with it a mighty force of water, yet still it becoms so vefel, because it is kept and restrained with no banks, but running at once by many divers chanel, maketh ever

While the Elephants were thus transporting over, Annibal in the mean time had sent 500 Numidian light Horsemen to the Romans camp, as espials to discover the grounds where they were to learn what forces they had, and listen after their designs and purposes. This wing and troop was encountered by three hundred Roman Horsemen, sent as a forefall, from the mouth of Rhodanus: where there was a more cruel skirmish than for so small a number, for besides many hurt, there were slain on both sides in a manner alike; but in the end, the fear and flight of the Numidians gave the victory to the Romans, being now already much traveiled and wearied: on whose part (being the winners) were slain 160 not 100 Romans, but some Gauls: and on the losers whole part (being the overcome, there dyed above 200. This beginning and prognostication it were fide who that it portended and prefiged an happy end and success to the whole unto the Romans: of the war as it portended and prefiged an happy end and success, not without much effusion of blood, and danger of their part. The conflict being thus determined, they returned each one to his own Captain. As for Scipio, he could not resolve to take any count himself; but according as he saw the pious and enterprizes of the enemy, to frame his own, and Annibal according as he saw the pious and enterprizes of the enemy, to frame his own, and to give battle gain being uncertain whether to go forward with his journey begun, into Italy, or to give battle unto the first army of the Romans that came in his way and met him: was drawn away from all present conflict by occasion of the coming of the Embassadors of the Boii, and of a great Lord and Potentate, called Matalus, who promising to be his guides unto him in his voyage, and companions in his perils, thought it good, and gave advice to invade and set upon Italy first of all before any

A poſe to lead his army ſafe through the ſtreights, if he loſt the carriages : for fear hereof, he ran down from the higher ground, and albeir, with the violence of his charge, he diſcomfited the enemy, yet he encreaſed the trouble and fear of his own people. But that was ſoon appeaſed in a very moment, after the wayes and paſſages were once cleared, by reason of the Mountaineers that were ſled : ſo that within a while the whole hoſt paſſed through, not only at eaſe and leiſure, but alſo in a manner without any noiſe at all. This done, he retired upon a Cattel, which was the chief ſtrength of that country, with other villages lying about it : and for three dayes ſpace he viſtalled and maintained his whole army, with the Cattel of his priſoners. And for that he was now neither moleſted with the Mountaineers, who were at the fiſt diſcomfited, nor

B greatly encumbered with the difficulties of the wayes, in choſe three dayes he rid a good deal of ground, and journeyed a great way into the country : until at the length he came to another coaſt well peopled (for ſuch Mountain and Hilly quarters) where he had like to have been overtaken, not by open force, but even in his own proſpected cunning : fiſt, by a ſubtile practice, and after by a ſecret ambuſh. Certain ancient men, the Rulers and Governours of the Citieſes, repaired unto Annibal as Orators, ſaying, That they having been taught and made wiſe, by the profitable example of other mens harms, made choiſe, rather to trye the amity, than prove the force of the Carthaginians : and therefore were willing to do his commandment, and be at his devotion : requeſting him to take at their hands victuals and guides for their journey. yea, and hoſtages alſo for better affurance of promiſes to be performed. Annibal neither overhaſtily believing them, nor yet churliſhly diſtruſting, after trying their offer, lett being rejected and calloſe anſwer, received the hoſtages whom they gave, accepted victuals, which they had brought with them to maintain his army by the way, and followed their guides, but ſo, as his army was not diſtraied in their march, as it he had been amongst his friends, and in a peaceable country. Fiſt, went in the van-guard the Elephants, and the Horſemen : himſelf marched after with the flower and ſtrength of his Footmen, looking all about him with an heedful eye. So ſoon as he was entered a narrow paſſage, which of the one ſide lay under a ſteep Hill that commanded them aloft, the barbarous people roſe out of their ambuſh from all parts at once, both before and behind, and charged upon him both a far off and neerer hand : yea, and rolled down mighty huge ſtones upon them as they marched. But the greateſt number came be hind upon their backs : againſt whom he turned and made head with the power of his footmen, and without all peradventure (if the tall both of his army, had not been ſtrong and well fortified) they muſt needs have received in that lane and ſtreights, an exceeding great overthrow. And even then, as it was, they came to an extremity of danger, and in manner fell into a preſent miſchief. For whiles Annibal made long ſtay, and doubted whether he ſhould engage the Regiment of footmen within the ſtreights, for that he had not left any ſuccours in the rereguard to back the footmen, like as himſelf was a defence to the Horſemen : the mountaineers came overthrowward, and flanked them : and breaking through the files of the battel, beſet the way, and croſſed upon him. So that Annibal took up his lodging for one night, without his carriages and Horſemen. The morrow after, when as the barbarous people ran between them more coldly than before, he joyned his forces together, and paſſed the ſtreight not without great damage and loſſe : but with more hurt of the ſumpter Horſes than of men. After this, the Mountaineers (fewer in number, and in robbing wile rather than in warlike ſort) ran in heaps, one while upon the van-guard, other while upon the rereguard, as any one of them could either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by ſtaying another while behind, win and catch any occaſion and opportunity. The Elephants as they were driven with their leiſure, becauſe through thoſe narrow ſtreights, they were ready ever and anon to run on their notes : ſo that way ſoever they went, they kept the army ſafe and ſure from the enemies ; who being not uſed unto them, durſt not once come neer. The ninth day he won the very tops of the Alps, through by-lanes

F and blind cranks : after he had wandred many times out of the way, either through the deceitfulneſs of their guides : or for that when they durſt not truſt them, they adventured raſhly themſelves upon the vallics, and gueſſed the way at adventure, and went by aim. Two dayes abode he encamped upon the tops thereof, and the ſouldiers wearied with travel and fight reſted that time : certain alſo of the ſumpter Horſes (which had ſlip and ſlown from the rocks) by following the tracks of the army as it marched, came to the camp. When they were thus overtaken and wearied with theſe tedious travels, the know that fell (for now the ſtat Vergily, was ſet and gone down out of that horizon) increaſed their fear exceedingly. Now when as at the break of day the ſigns were ſet forward, and the army marched ſlowly, through the thicke and deep ſnow ; and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, fooliſhneſs and deſperation : Annibal advanced before the ſtandards, and commanded his ſouldiers to lay upon a certain high Hill, (from whence they had a goodly proſpect and might fee a great way all about them) and there ſhewed unto them Italy, and the goodly champaign fields about the Po, which lie hard under the foot of the Alpine Mountains : ſaying, That even then they mounted the wals, not only of Italy, burſo of the City of Rome : as for all beſides, (ſaith he) will be plain and eaſy to be travelled : and after one or two battels at the moſt, ye ſhall have at your command, the very Cattle and head City of all Italy. Then began the army to march forward : and as yet the enemies verily themſelves adventured nothing at all, but ſome petty robberies by ſeaſth, as opportunity and occaſion ſerved.

Howe

How

Howbeit they had much more difficult travelling down the hill, than in the climbing and getting H up; for that most of the passages to the Alp from And side, as they be thoner, so they are more upright: for all the way in a manner was steep, narrow, and slippery, so as neither they could hold themselves from sliding, nor if any tripped and stumbled were so little, as they could possibly (they staggered so) recover themselves and keep sure footing, but one fell upon another, as well as Horie as Man. After this they came to a much narrower rock, with crags and rags so steep down right, that hardly a nimble souldier without his armor and baggage (do what he could to take hold with hands upon the twigs and plants that there about grew forth) was able to creep down. This place being before naturally of it self steep and pendant with a down-fall, now was choked and dammed up with a new fall of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful and monstrous height. There the Horie-men stood still as if they had been come to their wayes end: and when Annibal marvelled much what the matter might be that stayed them so, as they marched not on: word was brought him, that the Rock was unaccessible and unpassable, Whereupon he went himself in person to view the place, and then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compass about, yet he had gained nothing thereby, but conducted his army, to passe through wilds and such places as before had never been beaten and troden; And verily that (of all other) was such as it was impossible to pass through. For, whereas there lay old snow untouched and not trodden on, and over it other snow newly fallen, of a small depth: in this soft and tender snow, and the fame not very deep, their feet as they went, easily took hold: but that snow, being once with the going of so many people and beasts upon it, fretted and chewed, they were faine to go upon the bare ice underneath, and in the slippery snow, broas it is relented and melted about their heels. There they had soule ado and much struggling, for that they could not tread sure upon the slippery ice: and again going as they did (down hill) their feet sooner failed them: and when they had helped themselves once in getting up, either with hands or knees: if they chanced to fall again, when those their props and stayes deceived them, there were no twigs nor roots about, whereon a man might take hold, and rest or stay himself, either by hand or foot. And therefore all that the poor beasts could do, was to tumble and wallow only, upon the slippery and glasse ice, and the molten slabby snow. Otherwhiles also, they perished, as they went in the deep snow, whiles it was yet soft and tender: for when they were once flidden and fallen, with flinging out their heels, and beating with their hoofs more forcibly for to take hold, they brake the ice. I through: so as most of them, as if they had been caught fast and fettered, stuck still in the deep, hard frozen, and congealed ice. At last, when as both man and beast were wearied and overtired, and all to no purpose, they enamped upon the top of an hill, having with very much ado clenched the place aforehand for that purpose: such a deal of snow there was to be digged, shovelled, and thrown out. This done, the souldiers were brought to break that rock, through which was their only way: and against the time that it was to be hewed through, they felled and overthrow many huge trees that grew there about, and made a mighty heap and pile of wood: the wind stirred fly for the time to kindle a fire, and then they set al a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hot, they powred thereon Vinegar for to calcine and dissolve it. When as the rock was thus baked (as it were) with fire, they digged into it, and opened it with pickes-axes, and made the M descent gentle and easy, by means of moderate windings and turnings: so as not only the Hories and other beasts, but even the Elephants also might be able to go down. For dayes he spent about the levelling of this rock: and the beasts were almost pined and lost for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of graze: and look what forage there was, the snow overhilled it. The dales and lower grounds have some little banks lying to the sun, and rivers withal, near unto the woods, yea, and places more meet and becoming for men to inhabit. There were the labouring beasts put out to graze and pasture, and the souldiers that were wearied with making the wayes, had three dayes allowed to rest in. From thence they went down into the plain country, where they found both the place more easy and pleasant, and the natures of the inhabitants more tractable.

In this manner, and by this means principally, entred the Carthagiuians into Italy, five months after they departed from new Carthage (as some write) : and within fifteen dayes overcame and passed the Alps. What power Annibal had, when he was arrived in Italy, the historians do not agree. They that speak with the most, write that he was 100000 foot, and 20000 horse strong: they that make the least of it, say they were 20000 foot, and 6000 horse. L. Cincius Alimentus, who hath delivered under his hand, that himself was taken prisoner by Annibal (a writer of great authority) would induce me sufficiently to believe him, but that he setteth down the number of confusely, by adding to the rest, the Gauls and Ligurians. He recordeth, that counting them, the Infantry was 80000, and the Cavalry 10000, which was conducted into Italy (but likely it is that from all parts there came more thither than so, and so some Authors do report) and that he heard from Annibal his own mouth, that after he had passed Rhodanus, he had lost 36000 men, and a great number of Hories and other beasts of burden. When he was come down into the Taurins Country, which was the next Nation in Italy, adjoining to the Gauls. Which being a thing agreed upon amongst all, I marvel so much the more, that there is any doubt, on which side he went over the Alps: and that commonly it is believed that he passed by a place called Penninus, and that thereupon the top of the Alps took the name, and was called, Celivus faith, he took his way over by the top of Cremona: both which passages surely would have

A brought him not into the Taurin country, but through the mountain foretts, unto the Gauls, called Lipuri. But neither is it probable, that in those days the same passages were open into Fra: considering, that the ways which led to Penninus were environed with nations all Germani. And certainly the Veragians, who inhabit this very top (in case a man may build upon this conjecture) never knew that these mountains took the name of any passage of the Carchaginians, that way: but of some one place consecrated in the top of the hill, which the pealants and mountaineers called Penninus.

Very happily and fitly it fell out for the enterprise of his first designs, that the Taurins the next nation he came unto was made war upon the Insubrians, But Annibal being busied in refreshing his army (that now had most feeling of their harms which they had caught before) could not arm the same to the aid and gratifying of either party: for ease after travel, plenty upon fear, and good keeping and delicate, after loathsome nativities, did by a sudden change greatly alter and stemper their lean and pinned bodies, well near larded and wild grown. Which was the cause that P. Cornelius the Consul, being arrived and landed at Pisa, after he had received of Mamilius Attilius an army of new and raw fouldiers, feigned for some shameful disgrace and defeat lately received, made haste and bighed him to the Po, for to give battel unto the enemy, before he were well refreshed and in heart again. But by that time that the Consul was come to Placentia, Annibal had dislodged and removed his camp, and won by assault the chief City or Town of the Taurins, because it willingly yielded not to accept of his amity and protection; and luredly not by fear only, but also of voluntary good will, he had gained unto him the Gauls that inhabited about the Po, but that the sudden coming of the Consul interrupted and surprized them, as they were calling about to spie some opportunity of rebellion. So Annibal dislodged, and removed out of the Taurins country, with this opinion, that the Gauls especially being doubtful as yet what part to take, would follow him being present in place. Now were the armies in manner one in sight of the other, and the Generals approached nigher together: and as they were not yet well known one unto the other, so they had already both of them a great opinion, and reciprocal admiration one of the other. For as Annibal was much renowned, and his name right well known among the Romans, even since before Saguntum was lost: so Scipio was taken of him, and reputed for some singular and excellent man, in that he effectually above all other, was chosen General against him. Which mutual conceit and impression they had, they augmented themselves one to the other: for that Scipio, albeit he was left behind in France, yet he met Annibal, and was ready to make head against him, so soon as he was passed the Alps: and Annibal again, because having enterprised to great an adventure, as to pass the Alps, and now brought his camp to good effect. But Scipio to prevent Annibal in crossing the Po before him, removed his camp to the river Ticinus: and for to encourage his fouldiers, before he brought them forth to battel, he made an Oration unto them; and began in this manner.

"My valiant fouldiers and truithy friends, if I were now to lead that army into the field, which I had with me in France, I would have foreborn to make any speeche at all unto you for to what I purpose need I to exhort, either that Cavalry, which so valiantly had vanquished the horiemen of the enemies at the river Rhodanus: or those legions, with whom I followed in chase as it were, even these very enemies, and whose falling off and refusing battle, I take to be a confession of victory? But now for as much as that army, being indeed levied for the province Spain, serveth with my brother Cn. Scipio, under my name and commiffion, where it pleaceth the Senat and people of Rome, they should be employed, to the end that they might have a Consul to be your Captain, against Annibal and the Carthaginians; I have willingly offered my self to this war. If being then, your new Captain, and you my new fouldiers, meet it is and convenient I should use a few words unto you. And to the end you should not be ignorant, either of the manner of this service, or quality of your enemy; with those men ye are to fight, whom in the former Punick war ye overcame both by land and sea; of whom for these twenty years ye have received tribute; from whom ye have won (as the due wages and reward of the war) Sicily and Sardinia both, and them do hold and occupy. In this battle therefore, both you and they are to carry that mind, and so to be affected, as winners and losers are to befor never think that it is valor and hardines that provoketh them now to fight, but meer necessity and compulsion enforceth them to the field. Unless you will believe, that they who when they had an entire army and unfoiled, refused battle, should now have greater hope, and take more courage, after they have lost two parts of their horle and foot, in the very passage of the Alps; and of whom, they have more perished in a manner, than remain alive. But will some man say, True it is, few they are in number, but stout in heart, and tall of hand, whole strength & pufiance, no force is hardly able to abate. Images they are, nay, to say more truly, the very shadows of men, and no better; with hunger bitt, with cold fared, left for want of keeping, spoiled with maffines, and filthy ordure, bruised and weakned among hard rocks and craggy cliffs: over and besides, joints and marrow dried up and burnt, their fiewes shrunk, hard, and stiff again with cold and chilling snow, their limbs finged with bitter frost, their armor crufted, bruised and their weapons broken; their horles, no other then lame jades and poor hide-bound Tits. See what harmen lo what footmen ye are to fight withal. Believe me, ye shall have the very relatives and last remnants of enemies, and not enemies indeed. And I assure you, nothing fear I more than this, that before ye shall skirmish with this kind of enemy, it will be thought that the Alps already have vanquished

"vanquished and defeated Annibal. But peradventure it was so meet, and reason would, that the gods themselves without mans help, should against that Captain and nation, which had broken league and covenants, begin the war first, set it in good forwardness, and bring it to the point of an end: and then we, who next to the gods have been offended and wronged, should finish the same thus begun to our hands, and brought to us good a pain, I fear not that any man here doth think, that I utter these brave and glorious words only for to hearten you; and that my self think otherwise in heart, then I speak with tongue. I might have gone my self well enough into Spain, my proper and peculiar province, (where I had been sometime) and with an army of mine own: I should have had my brother there, both a counsellor to me in my distresses, and a companion with me in my dangers. I found Adrubal rather than Annibal mine enemy, and "no doubt" the affairs and charge of the war far less then here. But when I failed by the coast of France, and upon the bruit and news of this enemy was set a land, I sent my Cavalry before and removed camp as far as to Rhodanus, and in a battell of horsemen (for with that part of my forces it was my hap to encounter and fight) I discomfited the enemy: and for that by land I could not overtake his Infantry, so hastily they marched away, like men that fled) I was faine to return to the sea, and embark again into my ships: and with as great expedition and speed as I could make (considering to great a compass about of sea and land) at the very foot of the Alps, I was ready to encounter and affront him. Can he be thought then, that whiles I stummed and avoided fight, I fell by chance and at unawares upon this dread and redoubted enemy? or rather, that I followed him hard at heels? and challenged him, to draw him forth unto a battell, thereby to K have it decided who should have the victory in the end? I would gladly make trial, whether all of a sudden the earth hath brought forth for these twenty years, Carthaginians, of whom ye sent away, and let go from Eryx, valued after the rate of 18. * deniers a piece, and no more: and fain would I see, whether this Annibal be the concurrent of Hercules, to undertake his journeys and voyages, as he saith himself: or that he is tormented in conscience for the outrage and cruelty committed upon Saguntum, would have some respect and regard, if not of his native country (conquered and subdued) yet of his own house, of the peace and covenants written ten by his father Amilcar, and his own hand: Amilcar (I say) who at the commandment of our I. Confulmeured his garrison from Eryx: who fuming and storming, received with sorrowful heart the grievous and heavy conditions of peace imposed upon the conquered Carthaginians: who capitulated and covenanted to abandon Sicily, and to pay a tribute to the people of Rome: I would have you therefore (my hardy souldiers) to fight against him, not only with the same courage as you do with other enemies, but in a certain heat of choler & indignation, as if you should see your own servants and slaves on a sudden to rise up in arms against you. We might well, if we had been so minded when they were encloied and shut fast within Eryx, have put them to the utmost extremity of all worldly pain, and famished them. We might have passed over with our victorious Armado into Africa, and within few days forced and razed Carthage, without any M battell fought. We pardoned them at their humble request and took them to mercy: we let them M out where they were besieged and beleaguered; and notwithstanding that they were by us subdued, we made peace, and contracted amity with them: and afterward, when they were molested and distressed with the Africans war, we counted them within our protection. In recompence of these good favours and demerits, they come against us, under the leading of an humorous brain-sick and furious young man, to invade and assail our country. And I would it had pleased God, that we had all this war for our honor only and reputation, and not for our safety and our lives. But we are to fight now, not for the holding and possession of Sicily and Sardinia, as in times past: but for our freedom, and the inheritance of Italy: and that which more is, there is no army behind our backs, to withstand and make head against the enemy, if we chance to fall of victory: neither are there any more Alps, which while he is getting over, we might have N leisure in the mean time to assemble and prepare new forces. Here in this very place, we must stand to it, and make resistance, as if we were fighting under Rome walls. Let every man think that he is not only to defend and ward his own body, but to protect his wife and little children: and let every one regard and take care, not for his privat affairs and domestical charges, but often consider this, That even now the Senat and people of Rome beholdeth and seeth our hardy deeds, and look how our force and valor now speedeth and sheweth it self, such from henceforth will the state and fortune be, of that City and Empire of Rome.

These words had the Consul to the Romans. But Annibal, supposing that his men were first to be encouraged by representation of some deeds, & then exhorted with words having marshalled his army in a round compass (as it were), to behold some spectacle in a Theatre: he set in the midst of them all, the prisoners mountaineers, bound (as they were) hand and foot: and calling down at their feet, the armor and weapons of the Galls, he demanded of them by a truchman or interpreter, Which of them (upon condition to be eased of his bands, and to have armor, and an horse of service, given him for a prize of victory) would enter into combat, and fight at the utterance for his life. And when they all answered with one voice, That they would with no better, and not one of them but called for a sword, & required to fight: and thereupon, the lots were shuffled to be cast, & not one there was but wished himself to be the man, whom fortune would chuse for the combat.

Then

A Then every man as his lot fell, in token of cheerfulness and contentment of spirit, leapt for joy among his fellows that rejoiced in his behalf, fell a dancing after their manner, and so (hastily) took arms and weapons: all the while that they were in fight there appeared such affection and disposition of mind, as well in them that were in the same state and condition, as also in those who stood there as spectators only in the multitude to look on: that no less happy and fortunate were they accounted, whose chance it was to die in the place, then those who had the upper hand. Upon the fight of some couples that were thus matched in combat, he dismissed them and whiles he saw them in this good mind, so well affected and resolute, then he assembled them all together to an audience, and thus by report he spake unto them.

B "My valorous souldiers, if in the consideration of your own fortune, ye will anon but bear that mind, which even now ye shewed in beholding the example of the state of others: the journey is ours, and we have the victory. For that was not a dumb shew and bare pageant, but a very mirror and pattern of your own condition: and I wot not, whether fortune hath compassed about with harder bonds and greater necessities, your own selves, or your prisoners. On both hands, as well the right as the left, enclosed ye are, and shut up within two seas: and have not so much as one ship to embark in for to escape away, and save your selves. Before you neer at hand is the Po, a greater river, and more violent then Rhodanus: behind you are the Alps to hem you in: the Alps, I say, which ye hardly passed when you were in heart and lusty. Here mult ye either get victory (irs) or lose your lives, even where ye have first encountered your enemy: and the same fortune, which hath laid upon you necessity of fight, presenteth and profereth unto you C (if you go away with victory) such rewards, as men use not to wish for greater and more honorable at the hands of the immortal gods. If by our manhood and valour we should but recover and win again Sicily and Sardinia, which were got from our fathers: those were rewards and prizes sufficient: but now, over and besides, what riches or treasure the Romans in so many triumphs, have gathered, laid up, and held in possession, all that will be ours yet, and the owners thereof themselves withal. Go to it then a Gods name, and take arms, in assured hope of gaining so rich a booty and reward. Ye have all this while been long enough a courting and chafing; the wild beasts in the wide and desart mountains of * Lusitania and * Celiberia, and have been no recompence and fruit of your travels and dangers: it is now high time for you to serve in D the wars for good pay and rich rewards, and to receive great wages and prizes for your Labour and painful service: you that have measured so long a voyage, passed over so many mountains and rivers, and marched through so many armed and warlike nations. Here is the place where fortune hath set down the utmost bound, and pitched the farthest point & limit of your labors: here will she give you a condigne recompence and salary, after you have served and followed the wars the full time, by order and law required. Never think that the victory will be so hardly achieved, as the war in game is counted difficult. For oftentimes an enemy of small or no reckoning and regard, hath given a bloody battell: ya, most noble States, most renowned and glorious Kings, have in the very turning of an head been overthrown. For, setting aside this goodly, gay, and glittering name only of the Romans, what is there wherein they are with you E to be compared? To say nothing of that continual warfare of yours, for 20 years (pace, with such valour and happy success: even from Hercules pillars, from the Ocean, from the utmost bounds of the earth, through so many nations of Spain, and most fell and cruel Gauls, ye are come thus far with victory. And now shall ye fight with an army of new and untrained souldiers, who no longer ago then this very summer, were beaten, put to the sword, vanquished and besieged by the Gallician army (to say a truth) not known at all to their own Captain, & as little acquainted with him. And to speak of mine own person, if not born yet at leastwise brought up in the very tent and royal pavilion of my father (a most noble warrior and renowned Captain of his time) who have subdued Spain, conquered Gauls, overcome not only the people of the Alps, but that which is much more, the very Alps themselves. Should I make comparison between my self, and this half-year Captain, who hath abandoned and left his own camp and army? Unto F and this half-year Captain, who hath abandoned and left his own camp and army? Unto whom, if a man should this day, present the Carthaginians and Romans together, without their ensignes and colours, he could not tell, I dare well say, of whether army he were the leader and Consul. For I make no small account, I tell you of this (my tall fellows) that there is not one of you all, who hath not many a time and often seen and beheld my self in person, performing some warlike and military exploit: and unto whom I (as beholder and eye witness of his valor) cannot recount the time and place of his worthy deed & service. Then ye praised and commended me, then ye rewarded & honored me with divers gifts & presents. And even I (who have been a souldier trained up and taught by you, before I was your General) will march in battell against them, that know not one another, and are unknown likewise unto their Captain.

G Which way soever I turn and cast mine eyes, me thinks, I see all full of courageous stomach, and so forcible puissance. The footmen, old bearen and practised souldiers, lances and men of arms, with bard horses, and the light horsemen likewise, chosen forth of most hardy and valiant Nations: of one side, most faithful and resolute allies; on the other, doughty Carthaginians, ready to fight, as well in countries defence, as also for most just and due revenge. We come of our selves to make war, and we descend into Italy with banners displayed, resolved to fight with so much more courage, as they commonly who are assailants, have greater stomach and more hope then the defendants. Over and besides, our hearts are kindled, and our minds pricked

"on and provoked with sense of injuries and indignities. First and foremost they required, that your General should be delivered unto them; as a condemned prisoner at the bar: they they would have had all you that were at the assault of Saguntum yielded up into their hands, to be put to most extreme tortures & execution. A people they are, full of all excessive cruelty, insolent and proud beyond all measure; they would have but all in their power, and at their disposal; they must prescribe, limit, and set down, with whom we should war; with whom we may make peace; restraining and enclosing us within the terms and bounds of hills and rivers; which, forsooth, we must not pass; and they themselves keep not the limits, which they appoint. Pass not (say they) Iberus in any wise; meddle not at all with the Saguntines: Come not near them, Saguntum standeth upon the river Iberus; step nor one foot forward; we advise you. If I suffice not their turn, that they have taken from us our ancient Provinces, Stellis and Sardinia, unless they may have away Spain too. And if I should depart from thence, and quit that Realm also, they would not stay there, but will pass over straight into Africa; stay; they have sent over this year already two Consuls, the one into Africa, the other into Spain: nothing have they left for us, but that which we can win and hold with the sword's point. Well may they be cowards, and play the idle larks, having a place of refuge to retire unto, who in their own country and ground may be received, when they take their heels and run through ways without danger, to save themselves. As for us, it stands us upon to play the men, and to make account of no mean designs between victory and death, but upon certain despatch of all shifts besides, either to obtain victory; or if fortune shall fail and give us the foil, chuse rather to die fighting, than to be killed flying. If this be setled and deeply imprinted in your hearts, if this be your resolution, I will say once again, The day is yours. A more pointed and sharper good, than this, to provoke men to victory, never gave the immortal gods to any whatsoever.

When by these Orations, the soldiers hearts of both sides were inflamed to fight, the Romans made a bridge over Ticinus; and for defence of the bridge, erected a fence and fort thereupon. But Annibal being the enemies were busy at work, sent Maharbal with a Cornet of Numidians; to the number of 500. light horsemen, to overrun and waste the territories belonging to the allies of the people of Rome: commanding him withal, to make as great spare of the Gauls as he could, and to solicit and persuade their Nobles and Lords unto rebellion. After the Gauls was finished, the Roman army passed over the Indubians country, encamped themselves upon certaine hills, five miles off from a village where Annibal also lay in camp: who seeing there was a battel toward, sent speedily for Maharbal back again, and the horsemen: and thinking belike, that he could never say enough to his soldiers, and admonish them sufficiently to do well, and animate them to fight, he called them all again together to an audience; where he proposed; and promised unto them openly, certain assured rewards, the hope whereof might incite them to fight manly. Impressis, that he would endow them with fair lands in Italy, Africa, or Spain, where they would themselves, to have, and to enjoy to him and to his heirs for ever as free hold in frank tenure, without service: if any one would chuse to have money rather than land, him he would content with silver. Item, of the allies, as many as hereafter were desirous to be enfranchised: Citizens of Carthage, they should have their free burgeoisie; & those that had a mind rather to return home again, M he would endeavor and bring about that he should live so well, as not one of them would wish for to exchange his state with any of his neighbors and countrymen whatsoever. Last of all, look what bond-servants attended and followed their masters, to them he promised freedom; and that in lieu of them, he would deliver again unto their masters, two for one, of the slaves taken captives in war. And that they might be assured, that he would perform all these promises, he held with his left hand a Lamb, and in the right a flint stone, and prayed solemnly, That if he failed herein, Jupiter and the rest of the gods, would fo kill him, as he flew that Lamb: and presently after his prayer done, he smote the Lamb on the head, and dasht out the brains. Whereat they all every one, conceived and embraced assured hope unto themselves, that the goddiss Ammon and were on their side: and supposing that the only stay of enjoying their hopes, and obtaining their N rewards, was, because they had not fought already: with one heart and voice they called for battel.

The Romans for their part, were nothing so lusty for besides other things; they were affrighted with new prodigies and fearful sights. For it happened that a Wolf entered their camp, & after he had worried and torn those that came in his way, escaped unhurt. Also a swarm of Bees settled upon a tree that grew over the General's pavilion. Which strange tokens being purged and cleared by an expiatory sacrifice, Scipio with his Cavalry and darts lightly appointed, went toward the camp of the enemy to view their forces, and to observe how many and of what condition and quality they were; and there he encountered Annibal, who also was gone forth with his horsemen to discover the country about. At the first they saw not one another, but afterwards, by reason of the thick dust that rose upon the march of so many men and horses, they knew that enemies approached near. On both sides the battalions made a stand, and every man buckled himself to the skirmish. Scipio placed his Archers and horsemen of the Gauls in the forefront: the Romans and strength of Allies, he bestowed behind for succours in the rereguard. Annibal set in this battel, his great barbed horses with his lances and men of arms, and strengthened the wings with Numidian horsemen. The very first charge and shout was scarce done, when the Archers afore said retired among the rereguard in the second battalions: by occasion whereof, the horsemen alone fought a good while in equal

A equal battel; yea, and after wards, because the footmen that were intermingled among troubled and disordered the horses, many either fell, or else alighted from their horses, to go thither where they saw their fellows to be environed and overcharged. The conflict became very doubtful in many places until such time as the Numidians (who were in the wings) wheeling about by little and little, shewed themselves behind the backs of the Romans: this fearful sight troubled them greatly, and the fear was increased by reason of the Consul his hurt: the extreme danger whereof, was put by and avoided by the rescue of his son (then a very tripling as yet, and scarce had a year upon his face) this youth is he, who had the honor of happy ending this war, summoned afterwards upon the noble victory and memorable conquest over Annibal and the Carthaginians Africanus. But the Archers were they that fled fastest away, even the whom the Numidians set upon first: The rest that were horsemen, keeping thick and close together, recovered their Consul within their files into the midst of them: and protecting him not only with their weapons, but also with their bodies, brought him back late into the camp: retiring all the way rather disorderly, nor like fearful men over hastily. The honor of saving the Consul, Caelius attributeth unto a bond slave of Liguria. But I verily would rather believe it of the son: which also the greater number of authors do affirm, but the common lame goeth of the said bond slave. This was the first battel with Annibal: wherein it easily appeared, that the Carthaginians were better in Cavalry, and therefore the open plain field such as were between the Po and the Alps, were not so good for the Romans to fight in. The night following therefore Scipio commanded his soldiers secretly without any noise to truss up bag and baggage, and to dislodge: and removed from Ticinus, and made haste to Po: that whiles his boats were not yet unloosed one from the other, in which (as upon a bridge) he had brought over his army, he might without any trouble and pursuit of the enemy, conduct the same back again. And they came to Placentia before that Annibal knew they were departed from Ticinus; howbeit, he took some of them that made stay on the higher side of the bank, as they were too slow about disjoining and loosening the forehead bridge of boats: upon which he could not pass over, by reason that when both ends were let loose, the planks and all, went down the water with the stream. Caelius writeth, that Mago with his horses, and Spanish footmen, presently swam over the river; and that Annibal himself led over his army at the upper floods of Po: for which purpose, he set the Elephants along on a row to break and bear off the violence and stream of the current. A thing surely that they were hardly able to do, who were skilful and by long experience knew the nature of the River very well. For it soundeth not like a truth, that horsemen with their armor and horses safe, could overcome to great a rage of the river, although we should grant that all the Spaniards gat over upon blown bladders or leather vessels, and besides, they had needed many days to fetch a compass for to find the foord of Po, over which, the army (laden with carriage) might be conveyed. But those authors carry more credit and authority with me, who write that scarcely in two days they found a place to make a bridge (of planks joined together) over the river, and that Mago and the Spanish light horsemen were sent that way over before.

Whiles Annibal on this side of the River, staid in giving audience to the embassages of the Gauls, he conducted over the regiments of footmen more heavily armed: in the mean while, Mago and the horsemen, after they had passed the river, marched one * days journey apiece toward the enemies at Placentia. And Annibal (few days after) encamped himself strongly far miter from Placentia: and the morrow after in the sight of the enemies he put his men in array, and made them offer of battel. The night following there was a petty massacre committed in the Romans camp by the Gauls that came to aid: but greater was the garboil and tumult, then the harm indeed. For about 2000 footmen, and 200 horsemen, having slain the warders at the gates, fled away to Annibal: whom he spake courteously unto, and when he had drawn them on in hope of great gifts and rewards, he dismissed every one into his own City and Country, to solicit and persuade their countrymen to side with him. Scipio taking that massacre as a foretoken and overture to the Gauls revolt in general; and supposing, that now being one gully and tainted with this offence, they would in a madnes run all to take arms and rise. Although still he were fore of his late wound, yet the night following at the relief of the fourth watch, he marched thily, and removed his camp near the river Trebia, into the higher countries, and hills, that were more troublesome for men of arms. But he wrought not so closely and without the knowledge of the enemy, as he did at Ticinus. For Annibal having sent out, first, the Numidian light horse, and then all his Cavalry without question had disordered and endamaged the rereguard, but that the Numidians for greediness of prey and booty, diverted aside, and turned into the tents, abandoned and forsaken of the Romans. Where, whiles they spent time in ransacking and sifting every corner of the camp (and when all was done, could find no pillage worth the stay) the enemy escaped their hands. And when as they had espied that the Romans were newly got over Trebia, and pitched over a plot for a camp, they intercepted a few of them that lingered about the river, and flow them. Scipio not able now to abide any longer the grief and pain of his wound, by reason of the shaking and flogging of his body as he travelled, and thinking it good to expect the coming of the other Consul his Collegue, (whom he heard already to be sent for out of Sicily) chose out a place near theriver which seemed most safe for to encamp in, and it he fortified. Annibal also lay not far off in camp: who as he was proud upon the late battel of horsemen, so was he perplexed for want of visuals, which scarcity increased upon him every day more and more.

as he travelled through the enemies country, finding in no place provisions beforehand. Whereupon he went to Clisidium, a town wherein the Romans had bestowed and laid up great store of grain: where, as he prepared with violence to force the town, there appeared some hope of treason; by corrupting of P. Brundisius, the captain of the garrison there, and that with no great sum of money: for in consideration only of 400 pieces of gold given unto him, Clisidium was betrayed unto Annibal: the very forethought and parcel of corn that the Carthaginians had, all the while they were in league near Trebia. Upon those prisoners that were taken when the garrison and fort was betrayed, he exercised no cruelty, because that in the beginning of his affairs, he would win himself a name and opinion of clemency.

While the war by land continued thus at Trebia, there had been some warlike exploits achieved both by sea and land about Sicily, and the Islands that lie against Italy next unto it, both by Sempronius the Consul, and also before his coming. Twenty galleys with five ranks of Oars, and a thousand armed men, were sent from the Carthaginians to invade and waste the coasts of Italy. Nine of them arrived at Lipara: eight fell with the Island of Rulcan, and three were driven by tempest into the Straights of Sicily. Against them being destroyed within kenneing, there were twelve ships set out from Messana, by Hiero King of the Sicilians, who happened at that time to be in Messana, attending the Roman Consul's coming; and without any resistance made he boarded those three ships, and brought them away into the Haven of Messana. By which he was taken prisoners, it was known, that besides the twenty ships aforesaid, sent against Italy (of which Fleet they were) 35 galleys of five couple of Oars, made sail for Sicily, to sollicite and persuade the old allies there to revolt. Hiero, that the especial point and design that they thought it was to seize upon Lilybaeum: but they thought verily that by the same gift or tempest wherein they were scattered, that other Fleet also was cast upon the Island Regates. And according to this intelligence, the King from Messana wrote to Emilius the Roman Pretor or Governor of Sicily, advising him to keep a strong garrison in Lilybaeum: whereupon the Lieutenants and Colonels about the Pretor, were sent from him with all speed to all the Cities aforesaid, to give order, that their people might be in readines, to keep good ward, and above all, to hold Lilybaeum fast. And for preparation of war, there went forth a proclamation, that the sailors and mariners should bring into the ships ten days provision of victuals and meat ready dressed, so the end that upon the signal given at an hours warning, without any delay, they should a shipboard: also that all that dwell along the coast, should from their sentinels, watch-towers, and beacons; espy when the enemies fleet approached. Now (albeit the Carthaginians, of purpose stayed the course of their ships, that they might come just before day to Lilybaeum they were discovered, both for that the Moon shone all night, and also because they came under sail which they had hoisted up. So soon therefore as the signal was given out of the sentinels and watch-towers, & alarm cried in the towne the mariners were soon embarked the soldiers also were bestowed, some to man and guard the walls, and guard the gates, others to enter in the ships. But the Carthaginians perceiving, they were to deal with them that were provided for them, (as being advertised of their coming) forbore to enter the haven until day, and employed the time in striking sails, in untackling their ships, and preparing them for a battle. When it was broad day lights, they retired into the deep, to have less room enough to fight: and that the enemies ships might have free egress out of the haven, The Romans for their part refused not battle, comforting themselves with the remembrance of the valiant exploits performed in that very place, and trulling also upon the number and valour of their soldiers. They were not so soon launched into the open sea, but the Romans were desirous to grapple; and to come close to hand fight: but contrariwise, the Carthaginians held off also, willing to proceed by cunning and policy more than by strength and meer force: and to make trial rather of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, then either of the prowels of men, or goodness of armor: for as their Fleet was sufficiently furnished, and to the full, with a multitude of mariners, so was it ill provided of soldiers: and wheresoever they grappled together, and came to hand-fight, they had not an equal number of men armed to hold play with the enemies: which being once perceived, the Romans gathered heart, and redoubled their courage, by reason of their number: the other side again were discouraged and out of heart, for their default of soldiers. Insumch as seven Carthaginian galleys were soon invested round and boarded the rest fled. Of soldiers and mariners together, 1700. were in them taken: amongst whom, there were three great Gentlemen of Carthage. The Roman fleet still entire and whole, save one vessel only that was boughed and pierced (yet able to be brought back) returned into the haven.

Presently after this battle, and before that they of Messana had knowledge thereof, T. Sempronius the Consul arrived at Messana: and as he centred within the found. King Hiero met him, with a fleet well furnished and richly decked, and coming forth of his royal ship into the Admiral of the Consuls, he welcomed him, and rejoiced for the late return of his men and ships, and prayed God, that his voyage into Sicily might prove happy and fortunate. Then showed he unto him the present estate, and the affairs of the Island: opened the designments of the Carthaginians; and promised withal, that with as good a mind and sound heart, as in the former war against the Carthaginians, when he was a young man, he had aided the people of Rome: to now in his old age he would assist them: and for proof hereof, he would of his own free cost furnish both the Consuls legions, and also the mariners with corn and payment. Among other matters he informed him how Lilybaeum, and other Cities on the sea coast were in great danger; by reason of

A some among them that desired a change and alteration. Whereupon the Consul thought good to make no delay, but to set sail with all speed to Lilybaeum, whom the King and his royal fleet accompanied: and as they were sailing, tidings came of the foreaid battle before Lilybaeum, and how the enemies ships were either scattered and put to flight, or boarded and taken.

The Consul having bid King Hiero adieu, with his fleet set sail from Lilybaeum, leaving behind him the Pretor to defend the coast of Sicily, and crossed the sea himself to the Island Melina, which was held by the Carthaginians. At whose coming, Amilcar the son of Gisco, Captain of the garrison there, rendered himself, and 2000. soldiers within a very few, together with the town and the Island. From whence, within few days he returned to Lilybaeum: where the prisoners (excepting certain noble persons of high parentage) were by the Consul and the Pretor both sold openly in port-sale. When the Consul thought Sicily on that coast free enough, he set sail from thence towards the Islands of Vulcan, for that the bruit went that a fleet of Carthaginians there lay at road: but there were no enemies to be found about those Islands: for it chanced they were already passed over to waste along the river and coast of Sicily; and having foraged the territory of Vibo, they put the City also in great fear. As the Consul returned back again to Sicily, tidings came that the enemy had made rodes into the country of Vibana: and he received letters also from the Senat, concerning the coming of Annibal into Italy, and therefore that he should with all speed possible aid and succour his Collegue. The Consul being at once troubled with many cares, presently embarked his army, and by the Adriatick sea, sent them away to Ariminum. To Sext. Pomponius his Lieutenant, he gave the charge of 25 Gallies for the defence of the territory of Vibo, and the sea-coast of Italy. With M. Emilius the Pretor, he left a fleet augmented to the number of fifty sail: which done, and all things yet in order in Sicily, himself with ten ships coasted along Italy, and arrived at Ariminum, from whence he put himself in his journey, and marched with any army to the river Trebia, where he joined with his fellow Consul. Now were both Consuls, and the whole puissance and force of the Romans opposed against Annibal, so as it appeared plainly, that either with that power the Empire of Rome might be defended, or else all their hope was gone. Howbeit, one of the Consuls being weakened and discouraged with the defeat of his horsemen in one battle, and dismayed besides with the hurt he had received in his body, desired to have the fight deferred: but the other coming fresh and lusty, and thereby more hardy, would abide no delay.

It fell out so at that time, that the Gauls inhabited all the Country between the two rivers Trebia and Po: who whilst these two most puissant nations were at strife and warred, held off as neutrals, and favoured neither side, making full account of the good will and grace of that part which should have the better. The Romans because they would now make no fit, and have no more trons in the fire, took the matter well enough: but Annibal was very much thereof offended, giving out very often, that he was sent for by the Gauls for their deliverance and liberty. Upon this indignation and displeasure, and for that also he would feed his men with booties, he commanded 2000 footmen, and a thousand horsemen, most of them Numidians, and some Gauls among, to overrun and spoil all the country forward, even to the banks of Po. The Gauls standing in need of help, and having until that time kept themselves in doubtful terms, were forced to turn from those that offered them wrong, and to incline and cleave unto the Romans that should revenge their injuries and protect them. Whereupon they sent Embassadors to the Consuls, requesting the Romans help for their land, which by reason of the exceeding fidelity, and too much loyalty of the inhabitants toward them, was now endangered. Cornelius liked neither the cause, nor yet the time to deal in such affairs: he had the nation besides in suspicion and jealousy, as well for many treacherous parts, as also (in case he would or could forget all or herlewd pranks of theirs) for the same disloyalty and faithhood of the Boians. Sempronius contrariwise thought it the strict bond to keep their allies in faith and allegiance, to defend those that came first to band and side with him. But notwithstanding his Collegue cast doubts and held off, yet he sent his own Cavalry, and a thousand well neer of footmen darters amongst them, to guard the country of Gaul beyond Trebia: who coming suddenly upon the enemies, and charging them at unawares, as they came scattered aunder, and out of order, yea, and most of them laden with spoil, mightily affrighted them, and made a foul slaughter, and pursued them in flight, as far as to their standing camp, and camp de guard. From whence, nevertheless, they were beaten back by the multitude that issued forth: but by new succours from their own companies, they renewed the fight again. The fight afterward was doubtful and variable: and although they made a saving bargain on both parts yet the common voice gave the honor of victory (such as it was) to the Romans rather than the enemies. But no man made a greater matter of it, and reckoned it more to the full, then the Consul himself. He joyed, he made his boast, that he had got the better, with the help of the same forces, which under the conduct of the other Consul, came by the worse. And now (saith he) the soldiers are comforted and refreshed well enough, and none there is but my brother Consul that would have the battle deferred: who no doubt is more heart-hearted than hardly hurt: and for the remembrance and smart of a little green wound, quaketh to hear of the field & of all things cannot away with edge-toos. But we must not thus sit still here and was need for the pleasure of one craft and slyly person. For what reason is it, that we should drive off longer, and spend more time in vain? What other Consul expect we to make up the third? or what army besides should we look for? The Carthaginians lie encamped in Italy, and well-neer within the view and fight

"of the City of Rome; and it is neither Sicily nor Sardinia taken from them by conquest, nor Spain on this side Iberus, which they shoot at, to win again: but that the Romans should be thrust out of their native soil and country wherein they were born, that is their drut and deſignment. Oh how deeply (quoth he) would our Fathers ſigh, how heartily would they groan, if they who were wont to mannaſe war about the walls of Carthage, if they ſhould ſee us deeply ſpring and children, two Conſuls with Conſular and ſoial armies in the midſt of Italy, frighted and panting for fear within our camp? And that Annibal hath ſubdued and brought under his ſubjection all the country between the Alps and Apenninum? Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches he uttered he to his Collegue, as he ſat by his beds ſide; where he lay ſick: thus ſpoke he, as in an open audience, in the Coſt, pavilion and all that quarter, to the ſouldiers. The time alſo of the ſedition of magiſtrates at Rome, being ſo near at hand, ſet him forward for fear, left the war ſhould be deferred unto the new Coſt, and the opportunity withal, of winning all the honor to himſelf whiles his Collegue continued ſick, pricked him on: Whereupon, for all the contradiction of Cornelius, which he nothing weighed and regarded, commandment he gave to his ſouldiers to be ready to give battel anon unto the enemy. Annibal was one that knew and ſaw well enough what was beſt and ſafeſt for his enemy, could hardly imagine or conceive any hope to himſelf: that the Conſuls would enterprize any thing raſhly, or without adviſement; but when he underſtood by hear-ſay, that afterwarde by good proof and experience he found true; namely, that the one of them by nature was hot, haſty, proud, and furious: and ſuppoſing, that he was the prouder and more furious for the late good hand he had of his foragers: made no doubt and diſtruſt of the happy ſuccels and iſſue of battel, whenſoever it ſhould come. Marry, careful he was, that no good time and opportunity preſented unto him, ſhould be overlapt: but to try the hazard and fortune of the field, whiles the enemies ſouldiers were raw and untrained; and the better and wiler man of the two Generals, was unmeet for ſervice; by reaſon of his wound as yet uncured and the courages of the Gauls luſty and forward: for well he wiſt, that a mighty number of them would the more unwillingly follow, the further they were drawn from their own home. Annibal, I ſay, hoping that by theſe and ſuch like occaſions, a battel would be ſoon offered: deſired alſo himſelf to bid battel: if the enemy ſaid long: and being adviſed beſides by the Gauls, his ſpialls (whom he employed to hearken out and learn what he deſired to know, and thought them more ſure, becauſe they ſerved in both camps) that the Romans were ready for the field: then began he (crafty Carthaginian as he was) to ſeek out a convenient place for an ambuſh. Now there was in the mid way between, a river running within the borders, having very high banks either ſide, and therefore lying cloſe hidden, and all about overſpread with moory weeds, with briars, brambles, and bruiſh-wood, as for the moſt part, ſuch ſort of places are overgrown withal. Which when Annibal in perſon had ridden about, and well viewed: perceiving that it would afford lurking holes handſome enough even for horſemen there to be hidden. This ſhall be the place (quoth he, to his brother Mago) which you ſhall keep. Chufe therefore out of all the horſe and foot a hundred luſty tall fellows of each: and ſee you repair with them to me at the firſt watch, for now is it time to take repaſt, and to reſreſh your bodies. And with that he ſent out to the camp the Criers, to call the ſouldiers to ſupper. And long it was not, but Mago was come with his choſen men, I ſee (quoth Annibal) ye are goodly men of perſon, and ſufficient. And that ye may be as able in number, as haſdy in courage, elect ye alſo out of the Cornets of of horſe and ſquadrons of foot, nine a piece ſuch as your ſelves to ſort withal. Mago ſhall ſhew you the ground where ye muſt lie in ambuſh: you ſhall find the enemy as blind as beetles, altogether unacquainted with theſe ſeats and cunning devices.

Thus Annibal having committed unto Mago a thouſand horſemen and as many footmen himſelf betimes in the morning, willed the Numidian Cavalry, when they were paſſed over the river Trebia, to ride braving before the gates of the enemies, and by daring and ſhooting into their guards, to provoke and draw them forth to fight: with this direction moreover, when the ſkirmiſh was begun, to fall off, and ſeem to retire by little and little, and ſo to train them on this ſide N the river. This charge had the Numidians. But the other Captains, as well of foot as horſe, were commanded to ſet their Companies all to their breakfast: which done, to arm themſelves, and with their horſes ready ſaddled, to attend the ſignal of battel. Sempromius upon the alarm and hubbly of the Numidians, as being forward and deſirous of fight, firſt brought forth all his horſemen, and bare himſelf bold and confident in that ſervice: after that fix thouſand footmen: and at laſt, all his whole forces: and led them to a place which before he had deſigned and appointed in his mind. It fell out to be in Winter, about the midſt of December, and a ſnowy day it was in thoſe parts lying between the Alps and Apenninum. Now by reaſon of the rivers and moors to neer, both horſe and men were exceeding cold: alſo ſo that they were baſtly on a ſudden, called forth laſting, and unprovided of all means againſt the cold, they had never a whif of heat left in them: and the neerer they came to the air and vapour of the river, the ſharper cold pinched and pierced them through. But when as once they followed upon the Numidians that gave back, and were entered into the water (which by reaſon of the rain that fell by night was riſen breſt-high) they were not ſo ſoon gotten out again of the cold: alſo ſo that they were baſtly on a ſudden, called forth again for cold that ſcarcely they could hold their weapons: and withal, as the day went further on, for very hunger they fainted. But Annibal his ſouldiers, who in the mean time had made fires before their tents, and had oyl lent them to every company, for to ſupple and ſoften their joints and and limbs, and taken their repaſt, and eate at leiſure: when they heard ſay, that the enemies were paſſed the river, with hearts courageous and bodies ſiſh and luſty, take them to their weapons, and come forth to fight in ordinaſe of battel. The Balaeres, and light armed men, to the number almoſt of 8000, he ſet before the ſtandards in the front: after them he placed the footmen, better appointed and armed to the proof, even the very ſtrength and manhood of all his forces: about the wings he ſet 4000 hoſemen, and behind thoſe wings, he divided and appointed his Elephants both on the one ſide and the other.

The Conſul Sempromius ſeeing his horſemen following the chafe on the ſpur, and out of order; and how at unawares they were charged again by the Numidians, who upon a ſudden turned and made head upon them, ſounded the retreat: and when they were rallied about him, he comforted his footmen with them, The Romans were in number 7000, of Allies and Latines 2000, beſides the aids of the Crenomani: which Nation of the Gauls only, continued faithful and true to the Romans. With theſe forces came they into the field; and began the battel. The firſt charge of the ſkirmiſh was given by the Iſlanders of Balore, upon whom, when the legions made head with greater violence, their light armed men were quickly brought into the wings: which was a cauſe that the Roman horſemen preſently were diſcharged and diſtreſſed. For whereas of themſelves they were but 4000, horſe, and hardly able to withſtand the ſhock of ten thouſand horſemen of the other, the Romans alſo were wearied, but moſt of the Carthaginians freſh and untaunted: over and beſides; they were overwhelmed with a cloud (as it were) of darts, flung and ſhot by the Balaere Iſlanders: Moreover the Elephants which appeared aloft from the hidden ſides of the wings frightened the horſes eſpecially, and not only with the ſtrange ſight, but alſo with a ſcent and favor, made them ſlie every way. The battel of the Infantry was equal in courage of heart, rather than in ſtrength of body: which the Carthaginians, (as having a little afore taken repaſt) brought freſh with them into the field: but contrariwiſe the Romans were faſting and weary, and for cold even ſtark and benumbed. Howbeit their ſtomacks would have ſerved to have held out and withſtood to the end, if they might have fought with footmen only. But both the Balaeres, having diſordered the horſemen, flanked them with their ſhor, and alſo the Elephants by this time were entered into the middle battailon of footmen: and withal, Mago and the Numidian light horſe (ſo ſoon as this battailon was unawares gone paſt) their ambuſhment and lurking holes) ſtart up and aroſe from behind, and put them in exceeding trouble and fright. Yet for all theſe inconveniences and diſadvantages (ſo many on every ſide) the main battel a good while ſtood unmoved and ſtired not, but kept the array, and eſpecially (beyond the expectation of all men) againſt the Elephants. For certain footmen placed for the purpoſe, by ſlinging of darts forced them to turn head: and when they were once turned forward, they followed hard upon them, pricking and galling them under the tails, in which place by reaſon of the tender ſkin they are ſoon wounded. Whom when Annibal ſaw thus feared and ready to turn upon their own part, from the main battel to the flanks and outſides, he commanded them to be driven unto the left wing upon the Gauls that came to aid, and preſently enforced them to run away. The Romans ſeeing their auxiliary Gauls put to flight, were driven unto a new fear. Where upon fighting now as it were in a ring and round on both ſides, there were among them to the number alſo of 10000, who ſeeing no way elſe to eſcape, brake through the middle battailon of the Africans, which was ſtrengthened with the aid of the Gauls, and that with a great slaughter of their enemies: and ſeeing they neither could return into their camp (the river being between) nor for the rain well diſcern how to ſuccour their fellows, they took the way ſtraight to Placentia. After this, the reſt brake forth in all parts. They that took the river either perished in the ſtreams and whirl-pools: or ſuch as made ſtay to enter, were by the enemy overtaken and ſlain. But as many as here and there fled ſcattering through the fields, following the footing and tracks of the battailon that retired back, came to Placentia. Some for fear of the enemy, adventured boldly to take the river, and being once over, recovered the camp. The rain and ſnow together, and the intolerable cold killed many, as well men as beaſts: in manner all the Elephants. The Carthaginians followed the enemies in chafe as far as Trebia, and there gave over: and returned into the camp ſo clumſie and frozen, as ſcarcely they felt the joy of their victory. By reaſon whereof, the night following; when as the guard of the Roman camp, and the remnant of that great company of ſouldiers paſſed Trebia with float-boats and flat barges, the Carthaginians either perceived them not indeed for the noiſe the tempeſtuous rain made, or for wearineſs and ſore wounds were not able to ſtir, and therefore made ſemblance, as though they knew not of it. And ſo whiles the Carthaginians were at reſt, the army was by Scipio the Conſul brought (in a ſtill march) to Placentia: and from thence having croſſed the Po, came to Cremona, becauſe one Colony alone ſhould not be charged with the wintering of two armies at one time.

Upon this deſeat and overthrow, there arrived ſuch fearful tidings at Rome, that they beleevied verily and looked for no other but that the enemy would come with banner diſplayed ſtraight to the very City: and that there was no hope nor help left behind to defend their gates and walls from aſſault and violence. For ſeeing that the one Conſul was vanquiſhed at Trebia and the other alſo, who was called unto him out of Sicily: ſince both Conſuls, and two conſular armies were thus defeated, what other Captains, what Legions remained now to be ſent for, to aid? As they were in this agony and fear, Sempromius the Conſul came home: who with very great danger had paſſed through the enemies Cavalry, which was ſpread here and there all about, ſo ſerch in booties: and

By

A By occasion hereof, Annibal departed from Apenninus, back again toward Placentia; and when he had marched ten miles on his way, he lie him down and encamped. The morrow after he led against the enemy 12000 foot, and 5000 horse. Sempronius the Consul also, being now returned from Rome, refused not battle: and the same day, the enemies were distant but three miles asunder. The morrow after they fought on each side most fiercely and courageously, and with variable event and fortune. At the first-on ice, the Romans had the better hand, so far forth, as that not only in fight they overcame their enemies, but also after they had discomfited them, and put them back, they chased them into their camp, and anon aflamed the same. Annibal having ordained some few to defend the rampart and the gates, retired the rest thick and close together into the midst of the camp, and commanded them to give ear, and be inventive to the signal, when he would have them issue forth. Now was it the ninth hour of the day, when the Roman Consul having toiled and wearied his soldiers to no purpose, and feeling no hope to win the camp, sounded the retreat. Which so loom as Annibal heard, and saw the fight wital to slack and was cold, and the enemy retired back from the camp, presently fallied forth himself with the whole strength of his Infantry, for he had sent out his horsemen both on the right hand and the left after the enemies. There had not been lightly a more fierce and cruel battel fricken, and more memorable, for the final mik-hief of both parts, if the day would have given them time to have fought longer. But the night parted the fray, which was hotly begun with exceeding stomack and courage. Whereupon, the confronting and charging one of another, was more eager, then the laughter bloody between them; and as the fight in manner was equal, lo they parted with loss alike. For of each side there died above six hundred footmen, and halts as many horsemen. But the loss on the Romans side was greater than in proportion of the number, because certain of the degree and calling of Knights, and five Colonels, and three Castains of the Allies, were slain.

After this journey, Annibal went into the country of the Ligurians, and Sempronius to Luca. To welcome Annibal at his first coming into Liguria, there were delivered into him two Roman Queeters or Treasurers, Cn. Fulvius, and L. Lucretius, who were intercepted by the Ligurians, &c taken in a train of ambush, with two Colonels, and five others besides, whose fathers by calling were as good as Senators fellows: and this was done, because he should assure himself the better, that the peace and amity contracted with them, would be faithfully kept and observed.

D While these things thus passed in Italy, Cn. Scipio who was sent into Spain with a fleet and army for sea and land; having first sail from the mouth of Rhodanus, and compassed the mountains Pyrenni, arrived at a place called Emporia: where he disembarked and landed his forces, and reduced into the Roman Empire all the country, beginning at the Lacetans, and so from thence all the sea coast as far as to the river Iberus, partly by renewing their ancient leagues; and partly by devising means o contract new. Whereupon, there arose a great name of him for his clemency; whereby he prevailed not only with the States by the sea side but also amongst the inlanders and mountaintainers, even to the Nations that were more fierce & savage: with whom he was let from among them, but also wrought them so, that they took arms in his quarrel; and there were let from among them, certain Frangib cohorts and bands for to aid and succour him. Hannu, whom Annibal had left for defence of that province, was not ignorant hereof: and therefore, before all was come, and the country alienated, he thought good to meet with this mischief: and having pitched his camp in sight of the enemies, let his men in ordiance o battel. The Roman Captain likewise resolved not to defer the fight; knowing that so, he might before, ed to encounter both with Hannu and Asdrubal, and rather yet he desired to deal with them one after the other single, than at once with both. But this battel was not so much dangerous. Six thousand enemies were left behind slain, and two thousand taken prisoners, together with those that were left for the guard of the camp. For both the camp was forced and won, and also the General himself with certain guards was taken prisoner. Moreover Stiffusa, a town neer unto the camp, was won by assault: howbeit, the spoil and pillage of the town were matters of small worth and value: namely, the household stuff, and such pelf and trimpery of barbarous people, and certain poor base fables. It was the camp that enriched the soldiers: by reason that not only the army which was now vanquished, but that also which with Annibal served in Italy, and left behind them about Pyrenus, all good things to speak of, that they set store by, because they would go lightly, and not be encumbered with carriages. Before any certain report of this overthrow came to Asdrubal, he had passed over Iberus with 8000 footmen, and 1000 horsemen, as purposing to make head against the Romans at their first coming: but when he heard how the field was lost, and the camp wital, he turned his journey to the sea. And not far from * Tarracon, he found the soldiers of the Armado, and the mariners besides, wandering and stragling over the fields (for usual it is, that happy success should breed careless negligence) whereupon he sent out his horsemen every way, and with great slaughter and flight he chased them to their ships: and not adventuring to make any longer stay thereabout, for fear to be surprisid of Scipio, he retired back to the other side of Iberus. Scipio also upon the first report of these new enemies, having rallied his forces together in great haste, after he had slightly chastised a few Captains, and left behind him a small garrison at Tarracon, returned with his fleet to Emporia. He had no sooner departed from thence, but Asdrubal was there in his place; and having induced and incited the State of the Ilergetes (who had given hostages to Scipio) for to revolt and rebel, even with their own youth waited the territories of all those that continued faithful confederates to the Romans. Afterwards, when Scipio was touled once out of the place where he wintered, the enemy retired again, and quit all the country on that side Iberus. Then Scipio having in hostile manner invaded the countries, abandoned and left by him that was the author and cause of their rebellion, and by this means the nation likewise of the Illegretes, after he had driven them all within Althabam, which is their capital town, he laid siege unto it round about, and within few days brought the whole territory of the Illegretes under his obedience: and besides a greater number of hostages then before (which they were constrained to deliver) he condemned them in a good round sum of money. From thence he went forward against the Aulcates, near to Thury, being associates also to the Carthaginians: and having beleaguered their City, he fore-layed and intercepted the Lacetans as they came by night to succour their neighbors, not far from the town, even as they were at the point to enter in. There were slain of them 12000, and the rest being well-veer all dismissed, fled every way scattering here and there over the fields home to their houses. All the help and defence that they had who were within, was only the foul and cold winter weather, evermore naughty and hurtful to assailants that lie forth. The siege lasted thirty days, during which time, seldom fell the snow less then four foot deep, and so covered the pentiles, and mantlets of the Romans, that when the enemies flung fireundry times thereupon, that alone saved the same, & nothing else. In the end, upon the departure of their Prince Amurcius, who was fled to Althabam, they yielded, upon condition to pay twenty talents of silver, & so Scipio returned to Tarragon, thence to winter.

* 3750 pound sterling, according to the last Antick. Talent.

But that year, at Rome and about the City, were many strange and prodigious signs seen, or at leastwise (a thing usual when mens minds are once touched with religion, and given to make scruple) many were reported, and soon believed. Among which, this was one, that a babe of condition free borne, and but half year old, cried with a loud voice in the herb market, Io Triumphe. Also in the beast market, an Ox of himself undriven, climbed up to the third loft or story of an house, and from thence being frightened with the stir and noise of the dwellers by cast himself down. Moreover, there was seen in the welkin or element, the resemblance of a navy of ships, and the Temple of Lady Spes, standing in the herb market, was smitten with lightning. Likewise at Lanuvium the hear of Juno shook and brandished of itself: and a Raven flew into Juno's Church, and lighted upon the very Shrine or Altar of Juno. In the territory of Antifrum, in many places were seen men; as it were, in white garments; but only off; for as folk went neerer and neerer, they appeared not, and could not be met withal. In Piceum it rained fishes; and at Cere the lots were found diminished; and in Genet, a Wolfe drew forth a watchman his sword out of his scabbard, and carried it away. For other prodigious tokens, order was given to the Decemvirs to peruse the books of Sibylla. But for the raising of flames in Piceum, there was ordain a Novendial feast for nine days: and for the expiation of other prodigies, the whole City in manner was occupied in their devotions. And now above all other things the City was solemnly purged, and greater beasts killed in sacrifice in the honor of those gods, for whom they were ordained, and a present of gold weighing 40. pound, was carried unto Juno at Lanuvium.

And the dames and matrons of Rome created a molten image of brass for Juno in Aventinum and at Cere where the lots were diminished, was appointed a Lectistern, and a procession of supplication to Fortune in Algidum. At Rome also there was a Lectistern solemnized to Juveta (the goddess of youth) and a solemn procession at the church of Hercules. Moreover, express commandment was given to all the people, to make procession and supplication at every Altar and Shrine of their gods. And to god Genius, they sacrificed five greater beasts. And C. Atrilius Scirranus the Pretor, was commanded to pronounce a solemn vow, in case the Common-yeal continued in the same good estate, ten years, and decayed not. These portentous prodigies thus expiated, and vows made according to Sibylls books, eased mens hearts mightily of their religious fear. Then one of the elect Consuls, to wit, Flaminius, to whom were allotted those Legions which wintered at Placentia, sent an Edict with Letters to the Consul, that the Army should bein camp at Ariminum, upon the Ides of March. His purpose was, to enter into his Consulship in the Province, remembering the old contentions and debates which he had with the Nobles, N first when he was a Tribune of the Commons, and afterwards when he was Consul, as well about the Consulship (of which, they would have deprived him) as also, about the triumph, which they denied him. Hated he was besides of the Senat, for the new Act or Law, which C. Claudius (a Tribune of the Commons) had made, so prejudicial to the Senat; and only C. Flaminius of all the Nobles, supported it and set it forward; namely, That no Senator, or father of a Senator, should have a Ship at Sea, bearing above 300. Amphores: for that was thought sufficient to transport their commodities and fruits to Rome, rising out of their Lands and livings. And as for all other gain by traffick, it was not beleeving a Nobleman and Senator. This matter having been debated with great contention, caused the proposer of this law (Flaminius) to incur much evil will and displeasure with the Nobility, but it procured him the affection and love of the Commons, and in process of time a second Consulship. Supposing therefore, that with irritating the Auspices, and putting him to take the prefaces anew by the sight of birds, and by finding other delays, upon occasion of the Latine holy days, and one business or other belonging to the Consuls charge, they would detain and keep him back still in the City, he let a countenance, as though he would take a journey like a private person, and so departed secretly into the Province. Which thing, when it was once blazed abroad, made the Nobles who were afore maliciously bent against him, to be angry anew: and they gave out, that it was not the Senat only, that C. Flaminius warred against against; but the immortal Gods also. For he, who before time had been made Cof. without regard of taking Auspices, and having the approbation of the birds, when he was reclaimed and called both by God and man out of the field, obeyed more: and now, having a heavy conscience, discharged with offences past, hath fled from the Capitol and the solemn nuncupation and making of vows, for that he would not upon the ordinary day of entering his Magistracy, visit the Temple of Jup. Opt. Max. nor (because he was odious to the Senat, and they likewise hated of him alone) see them, and ask their advice and counsel: nor proclaim the Latine Holy-days, and celebrate to Jup. Latiaris, the solemn yearly sacrifice upon the Alban Hill: nor yet, after he had entered into the Capitol by the lucky flight and token of birds, pronounce his vows there, and depart from thence in his rich coat-armour toward the Province. They said moreover, that he was slipsh and slothfully away like a drudge that followeth the camp, without the ensigns and ornaments of authority: without Sergeants and Officers, as if he had been banished, and so left his country, minding belike to enter his government more for the honor and dignity of Ariminum than of Rome, and to put upon him his purple robe of estate, embroidered with scarlet rather in an holterry and common linnen, than in his own hope. They all every one opined and judged that he should be recalled and brought back again peremptorily, yea, and be forced personally at home to perform all duties belonging to God and man, before that he went forth to the Province and to the army. About this embassage (for they thought meet to send Embassadors) went Q. Terentius, and M. Aemilius: but they prevailed no more than in his former Consulship the letters missive had done, which were sent from the Senat. A few days after he entered his office, and as he was sacrificing, the calf or young Bullock being already ficked, got away from the hands of the sacrificers, and spotted many of the Standers by with blood. But they that stood far off, not knowing what the matters was of that, fled away, and ran to and fro: which of most men was judged a foretoken and preface of some great fright and trouble. After this, when he had received the two legions of Sempronius the Consul of the year before, and other two, of C. Atilius the Pretor, he began to conduct his army into Tuscany by the way of Apenninum.

A Nnibal came into Hetruria, after he had lost one of his eyes by occasion of continual watching in the marshes, through which he marched four dayes, and three nights without taking his repose: sleep. C. Flaminius the Consul a rash and inconsiderate man, went forth, contrary to the warrant and approbation of the Auspices, and caused the field-ensigns to be digged out of the ground, when otherwise they could not be plucked up: and being wounded on his forehead, fell with his head forward. His horse, his fortune was to be surprised in an ambush by Annibal, which he had laid for him near the L. ge called Thrasymenus: where he and his army were defeated, and followed up the edge of the sword. Six thousand Romans, who brake through and made an escape, notwithstanding the faithful promise that Maharbal had made unto them, were by the falsehood of Annibal put in prison. When upon the news of this overthrow, there was great mourning and sorrow at Rome, there fortuned two mothers to die for very joy, that beyond their hope and expectation, they recovered their sons, and saw them alive, whom they supposed to have been slain in that field. In regard of the foresaid defeat, there was vowed a sacred spring, according to the books of Sibylla. After this, when C. Fabius Maximus the Dictator sent against Annibal, would not come to a set battel with him, for fear he should be slain, but the soldiers lately terrified and daunted with adverse overthrows, against an enemy lively and proud of so many victories, and by making heads, and opposing himself only against Annibal, embraced his attempts and enterprises: M. Minutius the General of his Horse, a man of a proud spirit and brain-sick humours, with charging the virtue of their power and authority, he was joined in equal command and command with the Dictator. By means whereof, the army and the forces were parted indifferently between them, and Minutius gave the enemy battel in a place of great disadvantage, whereupon his Legions were distressed & in great hazard: but F. Maximus came in time to his rescue with his part of the army, and saved him out of the present danger. By occasion of which good turn, he was overcome, and his horse came down in snuff, as he was content to join in camp with him, and saluted him by the name of Father: commanding all his own soldiers to do the same to their fellow soldiers under F. Maximus. Annibal after he had won and overrun Campain, chanced between the Town Castrinum, and the mountain Callicula to be inclosed and compassed about by Fabius: but by a device of tying little bairns of drie sticks unto overhorns and setting them on fire, put to flight and chased away the guards of the Romans, which kept the freights of Callicula, and by that means got through the passage of that Torrefit. The same Annibal, at what time as he made verence he had of the Gods themselves: which rashness, as it cost him nought, but was ingrafted in him by nature, so fortune had nourished and maintained the same with prosperous success in his affairs at home, and wars abroad; so as it appeared evidently, that since he respected neither God nor man, and deigned not to take their counsel and advice, he would go rashly to work, and do all in half a hand over hand, without discretion. And to the end he might be more forward to plunge himself headlong into these his infirmities and imperfections, Anibal devised to ward to plunge himself headlong into these his infirmities and imperfections, Anibal devised to anger him; and to move his patience. Leaving the enemy therefore on his left hand, he put himself into a way to Fejula for to wait and spoil the country of Tuscan; and shewed to the Consul a fair off, what foil work and havoc he possibly could make, with fire and sword. Then Flaminius, who of himself would not have rested and fate still, in case Anibal had been quiet; seeing once the goods of his allies and friends, harried and driven away even before his eyes, and thinking it tended greatly to his shame and dishonor, that a Carthaginian should march thus at his pleasure, through the mids of Italy, and without any impeaching and controulement, to pass on forward, even to besiege and assault the walls of Rome; when all others about him sitting in council, gave advice for profit and safety, rather than for shew and bravery; namely, to pause a while, and expect the coming of his Colleague, that they might with joynt armies, with one heart, and with common accord of council, conduct and manage the war: and in the mean time, with the Cavalry, with Auxiliary or aid-fouldiers lightly armed, repress the enemy, and stay him from spoiling so licentiously at his pleasure; in a great chafe and choler he role up, and departed out of the Council, and presently founded the march, and gave the signal of battail: and withal, "Nay we were best (quoth he) to remain and sit here still before the walls of Arretium for this, 'be like, is our native country, and here is our place of habitation: as for Anibal, let him 'escape forth of our hands, and wait all Italy; let him spoil aforesh, and over-run all with fire 'and sword, until he be as far as Rome walls: and let not us, in any case, once stir from hence, before that the Senators send for C. Flaminius from Arretium; as sometimes they called Camilus 'from Vell. With these and such like reproachful and taunting words, he commanded in all his standards and ensigns to be plucked up, and called for his Horse. He was not so soon mounted on his back, but the Horse fell presently, cast the Rider over and over with his hishead forward; and there lay Flaminius the Consul under foot. As they all, that attended about him, were affrighted and troubled in mind, at this unlucky preface and fore-token, in the very beginning of his enterprise; word moreover was brought unto him, that one of the port-ensigns was not: he pulled up his ensign, do what he could, and putting his whole strength unto it, the Consul turning to himselfenger. What? half thou any letters besides (quoth he) from the Senat, to prohibit me from giving battail? go thy wayes, and bid them dig up the ensign, with help of spade and mattock, if their hands be so benumbed for fear, that they can not pluck it up; and with that began the army to march. The principal Leaders and Captains, besides that they agreed not, but gained said this course, were much dismayed and terrified with this twofold prodigious sign: but the common fouldiers joyced and took great pleasure, to see this forwardness and animosity of their General: having an eye rather to the end of their hope, than to the cause which they had to hope for. Now Anibal wasted in all manner of hostility that he could devise, the territories between the Town Corona, and the lake Therapsmentus, and all to whet the edge of the Consuls stomach, to chafe his hot blood, and to provoke him for to be revenged, for the harms and wrongs done to his good friends and allies. And come Anibal day they were to be certain places, naturally made as it were for an ambush, whereas the lake Therapsmentus lieth hard at the foot of the Hills of Corona: for there is between, but a very straight and narrow passage, as if there had been left so much space of ground, only for that purpose, and nothing else. For if a man go but a little further, the plain lieth more open, and growth larger, and from thence the hills begin to arise aloft. Anibal in the open ground pitched his camp: for himself with his Africans only and the Spaniards to lodge in, and made abode. The Balaerians, and the other light armed fouldiers, he led about behind the Mountains: the Horsemen he placed at the very gullet of the straight passage, where the little hills handsomely covered and hid them close: to the end that so soon as the Romans were entered in, when he had put forth his horsemen against the gullet of the straight, all might be enclosed within the lake and the Mountains. Flaminius being come to the lake the day before at the Sun setting; the morrow after, before it was full day light, without discovering and clearing the coasts by any scouts and spies sent out before, passed through the streights. After that his army began to be spread and displayed more at large, as the plain opened wider, he espied and perceived those enemies only which he had before his face: for the ambush lay close hidden, both behind his back, and over his head. Anibal having once got the enemy (as he would) enclosed thus within the lake and the Mountains, and environed with his forces; gave the signal to them all for to charge: who came down every man the nearest way he could; so much the more were the Romans affrighted and troubled with this sudden occurrence; by reason that the mist which arose out of the lake, was felled thicker in the plain, than upon the hills: whereby the Companies and Squadrons of their enemies coming out of many Vallies, were seen well enough one of another, and therefore more joyntly gave the charge all at once together. The Romans hearing the cry and shout which arose from all parts, before they could well discern and see, perceived themselves compassed all about and surprised, and were assailed both affront, and on their flanks, ere they could put themselves in battail-ray: as they ought, make their

their armour and weapons ready, and draw their swords. When all the rest were thus amazed, and at their wits end, the Consul alone, for all this imminent danger, shewed himself nothing daunted or afraid, but set in order the ranks and files which were shuffled and blended together, according as time and place would give him leave: and marshalled his fouldiers, (who turned every way as they heard the sundry and divers noises) and in the best manner he could devise, he comforted, and encouraged them, willing them to stand to it, and fight like men, for that there was now no means else to escape. "All the vows and invocations upon the Gods for their help, to make way by dint of word, through the midst of their enemies battailions: and the less men feared, the less danger commonly beideth them. Howbeit, by reason of the noise and hubbub of their own Ensigns, their ranks and places, that scarcely their heart would serve them to take arms, and to buckle them, as they should, fitly for fight: in such sort as some of them were surprised and born down laden rather with their harness, then covered and defended therewith. And in so great a mist and darkness, more use they had of ears than eyes: for at the groans of their wounded fellows, at the blows and strokes upon the bodies and armour resounding again, at the confused shouts and shrieks of hardy and fearful men one with another, they turned their faces, and cast their eyes every way. Some as they would have fled, light into the press of those that were fighting; and there were let fast: some again as they returned for to fight, were born backward by companies that ran away. Afterwards, when they had assayed in vain every way to get forth, the enemies battailions hemmed them in; then they knew evidently there was no hope of life but in their tight hand and force of arms. Then every man became a Captain, and encouraged himself to fight manfully: so as the battail began afresh, not in order by the Principes, Hastati, and Triarii, nor according to the accustomed manner, whereby the vanguard should fight before the main battail, and the standards, and behind them the rereguard, and that the fouldier should keep his own sign, his own cohort, band, and company: but at a venture, even as it happened, so they went to it and buckled, pell-mell: and as every mans heart served him, so he marshalled himself to fight, either before or behind. Their courage and animosity was so ardent, their spirits and minds so intensive to the battel, that being as there was a terrible earthquake at the very instant, which overthrew and turned upside down, a great part of many Cities in Italy, turned aside the copies of great Rivers out of their channels, and drave their streams against the current, forced the Sea into fresh Rivers, yea, and overturned Mountains with mighty falls, and laid them flat; yet there was not a man who fought in that battail, that once heard or perceived it. The conflict lasted almost three hours. Sharp it was in every place, but about the Consul most cruel: aided them. By reason that the flower and bravest gallants followed him, and was himself for his own person goodly beset in his rich armour, he both assailed the enemy most furiously, and also defended his own citizens as valiantly: so long, until a certain Insulbian, a man of arms (Diogenes, was his name) one that knew his village well enough, this is (quoth he) to his countrymen, the Consul that defeated our army, put to the sword our Legions, wasted our territories, and he that destroyed and sacked our City. Now will I offer him as a sacrifice out of hand to the ghosts and spirits of those our fellow citizens, who by his means have been piteously slain: and, therewith, setting spurs to his Horse, he rode through the thickest troop and press of his enemies: and when he had first slain his Equier outright (who opposed his body between, and set himself against him, seeing him coming so furiously) he ran the Consul quite through the body with his lance. And when he would rather than his life have disarmed and rised him, the many began to flee; but upon, neither deep lake nor high mountain could impeach and stop their fearful flight: like blind men they ran and sought means to make escapes, were the lane never so narrow, were the Hills never so steep and craggy, horse and man, man and armour, fell headlong one upon another. A number of them seeing no way else to escape, entered into the Lake by the first edges and shallow brims thereof, waded so far, and went up so high, that they left their heads and shoulders only above the water. Some there were, who unadvisedly (such was their fear), sought to save themselves by swimming: Which being an endless piece of work, and beyond all hope, their wind and breath failing them; they were either stifled and swallowed up of the gulfs, or after that with too much haste, they had over-laboured and toiled out themselves, they did what they could to swim back again, and with much ado to recover the Land: and there, by the enemies Horsemen who had taken the water, were they killed every where, and cut in pieces. Six thousand or thereabout, of the vanguard, who lustily brake through the ranks, among the heads of their enemies, unwitting of all that was done behind, escaped safe out of the gullet: and having seized the top of a little hill, there they stood, and might hear only the gibber of men, the rattling and rustling found of their armour, but how the battel went or sped, neither could they know, nor yet discern for the thickness of the dark mist. But now, when they were come to some odds, and one side went down and had the worse, by which time the heat of the sun had broken and dispatched the mist, and the bright day appeared: then through the clear light, the hills and dales shewed evidently the havoc that overthrow that was made, and how

E Fabius led his power over the ridge of the Mountain Mafficus, the sedition was like to have broken out again, and certain Captains of the mutiny began to be kindled afresh. For there had been great quietness, and all was still for (some few) days; because seeing the army march faster than their usual manner was, they supposed verily, that they made more speed and hastened, to save Campania from being spoiled and wasted. But when they were come to the foremost edge and point of the Mountain Mafficus, and that the enemies were within sight, burning the dwelling-Houses of the Coloniers and inhabitants of Smunessia, and likewise of the Falern Country, and all this while not one word of battail! And are we come hither indeed quoth Minutius, to behold only and to see, and feed our eyes with looking on our allies, confumed and wasted with fire and sword? and if we bask at nothing else, can we for shame abide to see the Calamity of these Citizens here, whom our fore-fathers planted in Smunessia as coloniers there to inhabit, to the end that all this tract and coast should be safe from the invasion of the Samnites? But behold, it is not a neighbour enemy (the Samnite) that threatneth but a foreign and alien, even the Carthaginian, who from the farthest and most remote parts of the world, (whiles we stand at a bay, trifle off still, and for laziness do nothing) is come forward even hither unto us. And are we so far degenerate (with sorrow of heart I speak it) from our progenitors and fathers, that along with which they thought it dishonorable unto their empire, for the Carthaginian Armadoes, and ships to store, sail, and ride; we should fee the same now pestered full of enemies, the Numidians and Moors? We, who were while taking toll from and gave diddain to see Saguntum besieged, called not only upon men, but also upon the faith of alliances and the Gods to watch; stand still gazing upon Annibal marching against the walls of a Roman Colony, and ready to assault it. The smoke of the villages and the fields now on fire, is ready to put out our eyes, and to choke us up our ears resound and ring again with the piteous cries of our allies that weep and lament, and call often unto us than unto the Gods for help. And we here lead our army as if they were a flock of sheep, over the shadowy forests, and hills out of the way, hid among the clouds and thick woods to keep them from the heat of Sun. If Enrius Camillus had been of mind, by ranging and wandering over hills and forests in this manner, to win again the City out of the hands of the Gauls, as this our new Camillus forthwith (sought out of purpose to be) our only

Minutius.

"Dictator in this our distress and hard estate) goeth about to recover Italy from Annibal, Rome had been French at this day; which I fear me, if we go thus coldly to work, our ancestors have saved and reserved to open, for Annibal and the Carthaginians. But he, a brave man, and a Roman indeed, that very day when word was brought to Veni, that he was chosen Dictator for the suffrages of the people, and approbation of the Senators, although Jabienum was high enough, where he might have let him down and killed the enemy at ease, descended into the plain and even ground, and the same day in the very midst and heart of the City, where now Gaulbury or Byssa Callicula standeth, and the morrow after, between Rome and Gabie, slew the Legions of the Gauls. And what should I say of that, which happened many years after, when at the sieges of Caudium we were put under the yoke by the Samnites our enemies? Whether I pray you, did L. Papyrius Cursor seek out the mountains of Samnium, or rather lie hard upon Luceria and besiege it, provoking and challenging the victorious enemy; and thereby shook off the yoke from the Romans neck, and laid it upon the proud Samnites? And what other thing else of late days but expedition, gave the victory to Consul Laetius? Who the morrow after that he discovered the enemy, let upon his fleet heavily fraught with victuals; and overcharged as it was with her own munition, sent him, by bare prayers and vows, to vanquish and subdue meer folly to believe and think by sitting still, by bare prayers and vows, to vanquish and subdue the enemy. Our forces must be put into arms, and brought down into the plain, that man to man may cope and buckle together. By adventuring boldly, by a sally and execution, hath the Roman Empire grown to this height; and not by these conceits and devices, which fearful cowards term the wary policies of war. As Mimius spake these words in preaching wife, a number of Roman Colonels and Horsemen came flocking about him. Yea, and these lusty and rash speeches of his, came even unto the ears of the footmen: So as, if it had been in the voyces and election of the souldiers, out of all question they seemed willing to prefer Mimius before their General Fabius. But Fabius again regarding always with good eye his own men, no less than his enemies, carrying a resolute mind, invincible ever before of any other, albeit he was well ware, that not only within his own camp, but also now at Rome, he heard ill for his temporizing and slow proceedings; yet drew he out the rest of the summer, and held on listly the same course and purpose, never altered his former manner: until that Annib being clean disappointed of long desired battle, bethought himself anon and looked about for some place of winter abode, considering, that I the country where now he was, rather yielded plenty for the present, than store for long continuance; as standing upon Hortyards and Vineyards, and all things planted, rather for fruits of pleasure and delight, than for necessity and profit. Intelligence hereof being given to Fabius, by his espials, for that he knew well enough, that Annib was to return through the same freights, by which he had entered the Falern country: he holdeth and keepeth the hill Callicula, with sufficient garriisons and likewise Castellum, a City divided by the river Vulturnus, and parteth the Falern and Campanie countries asunder. Himself bringeth back his power through the same hills, having sent out to discover and espie 400 Horsemen of confederats, under the conduct of L. Hostilius Mancinus, who being one of the crew of those lusty youths, that oftentimes heard the General of the Horsemen give out abroad brave words and stout speeches, at first went forward in manner of an espial, to discover and espie the enemy from a place of safety and security: and when as he saw the Numidians ranging all about the villages, and slew some of them also whom he took as a vantage, freights wayes his mind wholly possessed and let upon fight, and to forget the charge and direction of the Dictator, who had commanded him to go forward as warily and as closely as he possibly could, and to retire himself again before he came within sight of the enemies. The Numidians charging and recharging him afront one while, and flying from him another while drew him aloft unto their very camp when as both horse and man were outwearied. From whence Carule, who then had the conduct and command of the Cavalry, set out against him lustily upon the spur, and before they came within short shot put the enemies to flight, and followed them continually in chase almost five miles. Mancinus seeing neither the enemy to give over pursuit, nor any hope to escape away exhorted his men, and turned head upon them, overmatched as he was every way: where he himself and his choicest Horsemen were beset round and slain: the other taking themselves again to sie for life, first came to Calet, and after through by-lanes and difficult wayes, to the Dictator. That day, as hap was, Mimius had joyned himself to Fabius, having been afore sent to keep with a strong guard, the forest or pale, which above Tarracina groweth into a narrow gullet, and reacheth to the sea: for fear lest if the advance of the way Appia, were without defence, Annibal might enter and invade the country of Rome. When the Dictator and the General of Horsemen had joyned their forces together, they encamped upon the very high way, that Annibal was to pass with his army. Now were the enemies two miles off. The morrow after, the Carthaginians took up with their army all the way between the one camp and the other. When as the Romans were quartered even under their very trench and rampier, in a place no doubt of great advantage, yet for all that approached Annibal with his light Horsemen: and to provoke his enemies, fought by starts and fits, charging upon them, and retiring back again with great humbleness. The Romans kept still their standing, embattailed as they were. The fight was cold and lingering to the mind and liking of the Dictator, rather than of Annibal and where there was of the Romans part 200 slain, there died 800 of the enemies. Then seemed Annibal after, to be enclosed and shut up as it were, and besieged within Castellum, seeing that Capua, Samnium, Samnium, and many rich and mighty Nations confederate with the Romans, were on their backs to furnish them with store of victuals. And Annibal contrary-wise was like to take up his wintering place, within the crags and rocks of Formia, amid the Sands of Linternum, and the moist standing pools. Well wist Annibal now that he was laid unto hardly, by the same cunning sleights, that he had used himself. And therefore when as he could not escape away by Castellum, and seeing that he must needs to the Mountains, and passe over the top of Callicula: for fear lest that the Romans should set upon his army enclosed in the valleys between the Mountains, he devised a stratagem, by way of a ridiculous illusion, to beguile the eye-sight of his enemies, and to frustrate and deceive them of their expectation: by means whereof, he purposed in the beginning of the night, closely and by stealth to gain the Mountains. The manner of his crafty device was this. He caused to be gathered out of all the villages thereby many fire-brands then took he certain bawins or small fagots of brush-wood, dry sticks, and such like trash, and tyed them fast to the horns of the Oxen, whereof he had tame and wild, a great number that he drew before him amongst other prizes gotten out of the country: so as he might make well-near two thousand head. To Asdrubal he gave in charge, that so soon as it grew to be dark night, he should drive those Oxen with their horns set a fire toward the Mountains, and especially if he possib could, to the very freights and gullet which the enemy kept. It began no sooner to be dark, but Annibal with great silence dislodged and removed his camp, and the Oxen afore said were driven a good way before the ensigns and the army. When they were come to the foot of the Mountains, and to the straight passages, immediately the signal or watch-word was given to fire the Oxen horns, and to chase them up against the Hill. The beasts, what with fear to see a light fire blazing over their heads, and what with pain to feel the heat now come to the quick flesh and the roots of their horns, fell running up and down, as if they had been mad. By this their gadding thus all at once every way, all the coppies and springs thereabout were set on a light fire, and seemed as if the whole woods and hills had burnt withal: the shaking of their heads also to and fro without stay, made the blaze greater, and gave shew and semblance of men running from one place to another. They who were appointed and set to keep the passages of the freights, so soon as they saw certain fires upon the tops of the Hills, and over their heads, supposing themselves to be encompassed and enclosed with fire on every side, abandoned their hold, and kept their standing no longer: and whereas the flame shone most out, thinking that to be the strait way, they sped them thither, even to the top and ridge of the Mountains. Then and there, they light upon certain of the Oxen wandering astray from their company, and at first seeing them a far off, but not well discerning them, they imagined that they spit fire, and breathed their blazing flames out of their mouths: and wondering at the strange sight, stood full amazed and astonished. But when as afterwards they discovered the device; and found it out to be a subtle and deceitful invention, proceeding from mans brain, they mistrusted withal some secret trains and ambush, and with an exceeding noise fled away as fast as ever they could, and stumbled upon the vancouriers of their enemies, that were lightly armed. But they were afraid as well of the one side as the other, to begin any skirmish in the night season, and layed until day light. In the mean while, Annibal having conducted his whole army through the freights, and killed some of his enemies in the very pale, encamped himself in the territory of Alifia. Fabius derided this tumult well enough, but doubting some privy ambush, and abhorring utterly all night battails, kept his men within the strength of their rampiers. At the break of day there began a skirmish on the side of the hills in which the Romans as being far more in number, had environed on every side the light-armed souldiers of the enemies, and soon defeated them: but that a band of Spaniards, sent back of purpose from Annibal, came to rescue them: who being better acquainted with the Mountains, and more light and nimble in running among the craggs and cliffs, by reason of well of the agility of body, as the fashion of their light harness; easily in that kind of skirmish, avoided and shifted from their enemy, heavily armed at all pieces; and used to fight upon the plain, and to stand firmly and keep their ground. Whereupon in the end they parted asunder one from the other, but nothing near on even hand: for the Spaniards in a manner all went clear away unhurt, the Romans lost some of their men: and so on both parts they returned to their camps. Fabius likewise removed; and having baffled over the freights of the forest, encamped in an high ground, and strongly fortified even over Alifia. Then Annibal making as though he would march through Samnium toward Rome, returned back, waiting and spoiling the country as far as to the Peligni. And Fabius hovered still upon the Hill tops between the army of his enemies and the City of Rome; leading his host so, as neither he departed far, nor yet encountered and affronted his enemy. Then Annibal turned his way, and departed from the Peligni, and retired himself into Apulia, until he was come as far as Gerion, a City abandoned and forsaken of the inhabitants, by reason that a part of their wall was fallen down decayed and ruined. The Dictator fortified his camp in the territory of Laurinum. Now was he sent for home from thence to Rome, by occasion of certain solemn sacrifices: whereupon, he conferred and dealt with the General of the Cavalry, not only by way of absolute commandment, but also with advice and persuasions, yet, and as one would say, by prayer and intreaty, "That he would trust more upon confederate counsel, than doubtful fortune, and be directed and guided rather by him, than follow the steps of Sempronius and Flaminius; and not think there was nothing done and effected, and make no reckoning of this, That the enemy had been service and employment: and the thing which of it self in nature is acceptable, I will in what I H can grace and commend the same, and make it more meritorious. Having thus perswaded the man, being not altogether so wily, as other Carthaginians naturally are, he went by night secretly as far as the Corps de guard of the enemies, and after he had met and talked with some Spaniards that were auxiliary souldiers in the Camp, and by them was brought before Scipio, he declared unto him his whole intent and designment, and the cause of his coming. And after they had given and received faithful promise mutually between them, and agreed of time and place for the delivery of the hostages unto Scipio, he returned again to Saguntum. The day following he spent with Bostar, in receiving Commission from him, for the execution of this matter. And thus being dismissed and having his dispatch, he purposed to go in the night, to the end that he might (for sooth) avoid the watch and wards of the enemies, the Romans: and at the hour appointed he raised those who had the guard and custody of the children, and put himself on his way: and (simple man he) as if he had been altogether ignorant of that which hapned, brought them within the compass of an Ambushment, forelaid beforehand by his own wily and crafty device: and so were they brought into the Roman Camp. All other points besides, concerning the rendering of the hostages, according to the agreement and appointment with Bostar, were performed in the same order, as they should have passed, in case all had been done in the name of the Carthaginians, and to their behoof. But the Romans, won much more thank, and gained greater favour thereby, than the Carthaginians could have attained in the like curtesie. For the Carthaginians (whom in their prosperous success the Spaniards had found by experience to be rigorous unto them and proud) might have been supposed if they had done it now, to have been mollified and made more benign and gracious through adverse fortune and fear: but Scipio the Roman General, at his first coming, and unknown before time, began with a notable example and testimony of clemency and liberality. And Acedus besides, reputed a wife and prudent man seemed not without great reason to have made exchange of his Allies and Friends. Whereupon they all desired with one accord to revolt and presently they had taken arms indeed and rebelled, but for the approach of winter which forced as well Romans as Carthaginians to betake themselves to their winter harbors.

These were the occurrences that fell out also in Spain, in the second summer of the Punic war: whiles in Italy the wile and wary delays the indolent temporeizing of Fabius in the manner of his warfare gave the Romans some respite and intermission of their toils and overthrowes. Which as it wrought in Annibal no small trouble of mind and perplexity, to see that the Romans at the last had holden for their General a man who managed war, by discourse and guidance of sound reason & not by adventure of fickle fortune: so it was despised of his own Citizens, as well those that were armed abroad as gowned at home: & namely when during the absence of the Dictator, there hapned to be a field fought through the rashness of the General of the Cavalry, with more joyfull success (so to speak truly) than happy and fortunate. Two other things there were besides, that assailed the Dictator to be worse thought of, and in great disgrace and obloquy. The one through the deceitful and wily policy of Annibal: who being informed by certain fugitive Traitors (that fled from Rome unto him) which were the lands and possessions of the Dictator: gave express commandment when he had destroyed the country about, and made all even with the ground, to forbear all kind of hostility there only, and to touch nothing of his, either by fire or sword: to the end it might be thought there had been some packing between him and Annibal: and that this was the hire and consideration agreed upon between them two. The other arose from an action of his own: namely, about the exchange and courting of certain prisoners or captives: which peradventure at the first appearance might have seemed doubtful and suspicious (because therein he staid not for to have the Commission and approbation of the Senat) but in the end and up-shot it turned no doubt, to his singular, life and commendation. In that interchange above said, it was capitulate between both Generals, of Romans and Carthaginians, (like as it had been afore in the first Punic war) That whether side received more Captives than they gave again, should yield for every one souldier * two pound and a half of silver. When it fell out therefore that the Roman Dictator Fabius, had received more prisoners by 247 than Annibal, and the payment of the silver for them due: after much debate in the Senat house, (because he staid not in direction therein from the LL, was delayed, and no order taken therefore) he sent his son to Rome of purpose, to make sale of his lands, which had not been eudamaged by Annibal: and so to lay on his own cost, and out of his private purse discharged a publicke debt.

Annibal now lay in leaguer before the walls of Gerion, a City which he had won and set on fire, and reserved a few houses standing, to serve him instead of barns and garner for his grain. From thence he sent out two third parts of his forces to purvey corn: and remained himself in guard with one third part, ready in arms, (but lightly appointed and without any bag and baggage) in a meet and convenient place: both for defence of the Camp, and also for discovery of all the coasts about that no assault were made upon the purveyors. The Roman Army lay then in the Territory of Lavinum, and the Captain General was Minutius, Commander of the horsemen, because the Dictator (as is above said) was gone to the City of Rome. But whereas they had usually encamped before, upon some high hill and strong place of security: now they began to draw down into the vale and the plain ground, and to devise crafty means and stratagems beyond the natural reach of the Commander himself: namely, how they might assail either

A either the purveyors as they straggled about in the country, or let upon the Camp of their enemies, left with a small power and guard to defend it. Annibal was not ignorant, that together with the General, the whole manner and conduct of their warfare was changed: and that the enemy would fight rather more rashly and halittly, than wily and warily. And himself (who would have thought it considering the enemy was approached nearer) sent out a third part on y of his souldiers to provide corn and forrage, and kept the other twain with him in the Camp: he removed also his tents near to the Romans, almost two miles off from Gerion, to a little hill within the sight of the enemies, to the end they might know he was minded and ready to rescue and defend the purveyors, if haply they should be charged upon. Then espied Annibal another hill nearer, and standing even over the very Camp of the Romans. For the gaining whereof, (seeing that if he should have gone by day time openly, he had been no doubt prevented by the enemies, who would have seized it first by reason it was nearer unto them) he sent certain Numidians by night, who surprised it and kept it. But the Romans making little or no account of their small number, drove them the morrow after from thence, and thither removed their own tents: so as then, there was but a little distance between one Camp and the other, and the same, in a manner wholly taken up and replenished with Romans and withall, at the same time, the horsemen of the Romans with certain footmen lightly armed were sent out at a postern gate of the Camp (which opened not upon the Carthaginians) against the foragers, whom they discomfited, put to flight, and slew a great number of them. Neither durst Annibal issue forth to skirmish: for, having too few about him, he was hardly able to defend his Camp, in case it had been assaulted. So he was driven now to use the policy and shifts of Fabius, (for part of his forces were away) and managed his war, sitting still as it were, and keeping the enemy at a bay and at flaves end: and so retired with his souldiers to the former Camp, under the walls of Gerion. Some write, that there was a field pitched, and a set battel fought with banners displayed, wherein Annibal at the first encounter was discomfited and chased to his Camp: but from thence they issued forth who were within and so the fear turned upon the Romans, who on a sudden were put to the worst: but by the coming of Numerius Decimus (a Samnit) with succour, the fight was reinforced and renewed. This man, not only nobly defended, but also of great power and wealth, as well in Bevianum his native Country, where he was born, as throughout all Samnium (by order and commandment from the Dictator) came with a power of 8000 foot, and 200 horse, toward the Camp: and being espied by Annibal on the backside, gave both parties good hope of fresh and new aid. But when the voice went, that Fabius at the same time was coming also from Rome, Annibal for fear of being entrapped within some Ambush, retired back with his own men, and the Romans made pursuit after him: and with the help of Numerius the Samnit, won in one day by force two fortresses. So there were 6000 enemies slain, and 5000 Romans. And yet as equal in a manner as the loss was of both parts, the rumour ran to Rome of a brave victory, with letters also in post from the General of horsemen full of folly and vanity. Much arguing there was and debate about these matters, both in Senat, and before the people sundry times. And when all the City besides was joyous, and the Dictator (alotie) gave no credit either to the bruit that was blazed, or the letters: laying withall, E That if all were true, yet he feared more the fawning than frowning of fortune: then M. Claudius a Tribune of the Commons stepped forth and said, "That this above all was not to be suffered: that the Dictator, not only while he lay in Camp, opposed himself against all goodneis, and stained all valorous service; but also being absent from thence, crossed and disgraced that which was well done and worthily achieved: and that he, of purpose, drew the war in length and prolonged the time, to the end he might continue the longer in government, and be the man alone to command all, both in the City and abroad in the Army: for one of the Consuls was slain in battel, the other under a pretence & colour of purifying the Carthaginian fleet, was sent out of the way far enough off from Italy: as for the two Prators, they were employed both in Sicily and Sardinia: and yet neither of those two Provinces had any need of a L. Deputy there. And M. Minutius General of the horsemen, was kept prisoner as it were, and might neither fee enemy, nor do any martial exploit. And hereupon it is (quoth he) that not only Samnium (whereof the possession was surrendered unto the Carthaginians, as if it were a territory lying beyond Iberus) but the Campanie, Calene, and Falern territories were utterly overrun and wasted, whiles the Dictator abode still at Castellum, and with the legions of the people of Rome defended his own lands & possessions only. And when the Army and General of the Cavalry were desirous of battel, they were kept back enclosed in a manner within the compass of the Camp & their weapons taken from them, as if they had been captive enemies: & at length when the Dictator was once departed from them, they issued forth of the Camp, like men delivered from siege, & so discomfited & put to flight their enemies. In consideration of all these things, (he said) if the Commons G of Rome were of that courage, as sometimes they had been, he would boldly have put up a bill for to deprive C. Fabius of his government. But now for this time, he would propound a more indifferent & reasonable law, by virtue whereof the Commander of horsemen may be made equal with the Dictator in authority and power. Yet so, as that Q. Fabius might not be sent unto the Army, before that he had substituted & ordained another Q. Fabius in the room of C. Flaminius. The Dictator forbore altogether to come into any of these assemblies of the people, as a man in action and pleading nothing popular, and who framed not himself to the humor of the common people: Neither was he in the Senat house heard with patience, at what time as he either magnified and extolled the valour of the enemy: or rehearsed & reckoned up the losses and foils received for two years space, through the rashness and unskillfulness of the Commanders: and said withall, that the General of the horsemen was to answer and give account for fighting against his edict and express commandment. Moreover, (quoth he) if I were in place of sovereign rule and government, I would do all according as I thought good, I would effect and bring to pass with few daies, that men should know, that a good warrior was to make small reckning of fortune but wildom, wisdome, and counsel were to guide and direct all. And for mine own part, I deem it a great honour & glory to have preserved an army in a time of trouble and danger from shame and ignominy, than to have slain many thousands of enemies. After he had made these and such like speeches & reasons in vain, and created for Col. M. Atilius Regulus: for that he would not be present to debate the question concerning the right and authority of his own government, he departed by night season toward the army: even the very day before that the foresaid law should be propounded. The morning came, and the commons were assembled to an audience: wherein men seemed rather secretly in their hearts to malice the Dictator, & to affect and favour the General of the horsemen, than durst come forth and be seen to persuade and set forward that which pleased them all in common. And notwithstanding the bill was exceedingly well liked of, yet there wanted one to give some credit and authority thereunto. At length, one stepped forth to let it be known, namely, C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prator, a man not only of obscure degree by calling, but also of vile & base parentage descended. His father was (as they say) a Butcher, who kept shop and sold meat himself, and trained up his son as his apprentice in the same mechanical and servile occupation. This Varro being a young man and well left by his father (who was grown rich, and gained greatly by his trade) gave his mind and conceived some hope to live more gentlemanlike: and took a great liking to the common place, and pleading at the bar: exercising himself in entertaining causes of base persons, against the estate and name of honest Citizens and of good reputation: by means whereof he grew to be known among the people, and afterwards was advanced to place of worship and honour. And having been Treasurer of the City, and both both Adithips, as well that of the Chair, as the other of the Commons: and at length rose through one Pratorship, he aspired now higher, in hope to be Consul: and still crassly wasted his time, and sought to wind himself within the favor of the people, by means of the ill opinion and hard conceit they had of the Dictator: & thus he alone went away with all the affect, onate love of the Commons. All men that were either at Rome, or in the Army, both good and bad, in general (excepting the Dictator himself) received and admitted that bill, as made to his disgrace and shameful reproach. But he with the very same gravity and constancy of heart, endured these injurious coult & dealing of the people raging against him, wherewith he had born his adversaries slandering & charging him before the multitude: and having received in the way as he journeyed, letters importing the decree of the Senat, for dividing his authority equally with the General of the horsemen, and being assured that notwithstanding his commission were parted and communicated with another, yet his skill and sufficiency of conduct and command, remained still with himself, with a mind invincible as well against Citizens as enemies, he returned to the army. But Minutius, who before that time was hardly to be endured, both for his fortunate success, and also for the favour of the common sort now verily beyond all measure and bounds of modesty, vaunted and gloried in that had conquered & got the mastery over Fabius as well as over Annibal. That Fabius (I say) who in time of distress and calamity, was the only warrior and Captain that could be found out to match Annibal: that the superior Magistracy was by the consent & approbation of the people, (as thing never to be found in any record of Chronicles) made but even equal with the inferior: or to wit, the Dictator with the General of horsemen and in that City, wherein the Commanders of the Cavalry were wont to quake and tremble at the rods and axes of the Dictator. So conspicuous and evident in the eyes of the world, was his felicity and prowess above all others. And therefore minded was he to follow his own fortune, and to take his time in case the Dictator still continued lingering in sloth and idleness, condemned in the judgment both of God and N man. Wherupon, the very first day that he & Fabius were met together, he said that they were above all things to determine & set down in what fort they might order this their equal authority of government. He for his part thought it best, that each other day (or if longer time between were supposed better) they should one after the other alternately have the full and whole command of all for the time in their several turns: that if any occasion of fighting a battell were presented, they might be able to contravert the enemy, not only in counsel, but also in power and strength. Q. Fabius liked not of this: supposing that whatsoever lay in the hands and disposition of his rash colleague must needs be subject unto the arbitrement of Fortune. Saying moreover unto him "That he was indeed to impart unto him government and rule, but not wholly to depart therefrom, and shut himself out. And therefore he would never willingly fall, but (to his power) O manage by counsel and discretion one part or other: neither would he divide with him either time or daies, but the forces and armies: that Minutius might have one moity, and himself another: since he might not preserve all by his own counsel & policy, yet he would endeavour (so far as he could) to have somewhat. And so much he prevailed, that they parted the Legions between them, as the manner of the Consuls was. The first and fourth fell to Minutius, the second and third to Fabius. In like manner they divided the horsemen number for number, and the auxiliary soldiers of Allies and Latines. The Generall of the horsemen would needs likewise that they should be encamped asunder.

Annibal

Annibal conceived hereupon a two-fold joy, (for he was not ignorant of all that was done among the enemies, partly by intelligence given him from thence by fugitives, and partly by means of his own scouts and spies) for he made this reckoning, both that he should deal well enough with the lavish rashness of Minutius, and handle him in his kind; and also that the prudent policy of Fabius was abridged and diminished by the one half. Now there was a little hill between the Camp of Minutius and the Carthaginians: and no doubt there was, but that he who could gain it aforehand should have the vantage of the enemy, in regard of the ground. That hill Annibal was not so desirous to get without skirmish, (& yet it had been a matter of good importance as willing thereby to give him occasion of fighting and cuffing with Minutius, whom he wist very well to be alwaies forward enough to encounter him and make resistance. The plain all between, seemed at the first sight nothing commodious nor good for men that would lay an ambushment, because it was neither over-grown with any woods, nor yet in any part roughly over-spread and covered, so much as with briars and brambles. But in very deed, the ground was naturally made for to cover, and hide an Ambuscado: and the rather, because in so naked and bare a valley, none would have imagined and suspected any deceitful trains, and forelaying of wait. And yet there were in divers nooks and corners thereof certain hollow rocks and caves, and some of them of sufficient capacity to receive 200 armed men. In these lurking holes there were belovved 5000 of horsemen and footmen one with another, some in one place, some in another, according as they might commodiously lie there closely hidden. And yet, lest that the stirring of any one that might chance to go forth unadvisedly, or the glittering of armour, should bewray the trains in so open a valley, Annibal by sending out at the break of day some few (or to seize the foresaid hill, withdrew the eyes of his enemies another way. These at the first view were despised of the Romans for their small number, and every man was desirous to be doing with them, and their fingers itched for to let the enemies back, and drive them from thence. The General himself Minutius, as fool-hardy and forward as he that was most, sounded the alarm, and commanded to go to the winning of the place, braving and threatening of the enemies full vainly. First, he sent forth his light armed men to skirmish, but afterwards, the Cornets of horsemen, set close and jointly together in array: and at the last, seeing the enemies seconded with new succours and supplies, he advanced forward himself with his Legions in order of battell. And Annibal, wheresoever he perceived his men to be distressed, made out continual fresh aids one after another, both of horse and foot, ever as the fight increased and grew hotter: so as now he had his full army in field, and they maintained battell on both sides with all their power and main forces. First, the light armed Romans, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the ground, desirous to get up against the hill, (possessed aforehand of the enemy) were put back, and beaten down again: in such manner as in their retire, they put the horsemen in fear that followed hard upon them, and fled for refuge to the Ensigns of the Infantry. The main battell of the Legionary footmen, among all the rest that were affrighted, only remained without fear, undaunted: and seemed in a plain, set, and downright field without ambush, likely enough to have held their own, and in no respect to have been over-matched: so courageous they were, and had taken sufficient heart upon their late victory, some few daies before. But the enemies starting suddenly out of their Ambuscadoes, so troubled, disordered, and terrified them, flanking them on both sides, and charging withall behind, that neither their heart served any of them to fight, nor their hope remained to fly and escape away. Then Fabius hearing the first cry, and knowing thereby that they were in great fear, and seeing besides a far off their battell disordered and in disarray, "I thought even as much (quoth he) and no sooner than I feared, it is fallen out: Fortune I see well, hath over-raught fool-hardiness and taken it tardy. The man, forsooth, that must needs be made conqueror by odds in prowess and fortune: but we shall find out some other time to chide and to be angry. Come on now, forth with your standards and ensigns, let us wrest from our enemies hands the victory, and bring from our Citizens mouths confession of their error and trepails. Now when some of them were slain, and others looked about which way to make escape and flee: Fabius with his forces shewed himself as lent down from heaven to rescue them. And before he came to lance one javelin, or began to joyn battell and fight one stroke, he not only laid his fellows from running away, but also his enemies from further heat of fight. As many of the Romans as were disbanded and scattered asunder all abroad, repaired again speedily from all parts, and rallied themselves to the entire battell: the rest who by whole troops had turned their backs, made head again upon the enemy: and one while giving ground and retiring by little and little, another while standing in a ring and round together fled: kept this order by turns: so as now, both they that were discomfited, and those that were unforsaken became reduced into one body of a battell, and advanced their ensigns against the enemy. By which time Annibal sounded the retreat, and openly confessed and said, that as he had vanquished Minutius, so he was foiled and overcome of Fabius. Thus when the more part of the day was spent with variable fortune, and all retired again to their Camps, Minutius called together his soldiers, and spake unto them after this manner: "I have oftentimes heard it spoken (in my good soldiers) that he is the best man and most sufficient, who knoweth himself what is best to do: next to him is he esteemed, that will be ruled and directed by sage advice & counsel: but he that neither hath the skill to advise another, nor the grace to be advised by another, is simply of the worst nature, & good for nothing.

"Since that we therefore are not so happy as to attain unto the highest degree of wit, and perfection of nature, let us content our selves with the second place: and keep a mean between: and whilst we learn to rule, let us settle our selves and resolve to obey him that is wiser than our selves. Let us join in Camp with Fabius; and when we have presented our selves and our ensigns before his pavilion and tribunal, let that which I salute him by the name of Father (as it is becoming his excellent majesty and the benefit by us of him received) that he also call those soldiers your Patrons; whose valiant hands and trusty arms elsewhere protected you: that this day may give us yet if nothing else the honour and name of thankful persons. Having thus said, he gave commandment to pack up bag and baggage, and to dislodge; and as they marched in good array toward the Camp of the Dictator: they struck both him and all about him into a wonder and admiration. And having pitched their ensigns before the Tribunal then Meninus, the General of the horse went forth before the rest: and after he had greeted Fabius himself as his Father, and the whole Army likewise saluted those about Fabius, by the name of Patrons: "To my parents (quoth he) O Dictator, unto whom I have made you equal in name only (as much as my tongue will give me leave) I am bound and beholden for my own life only and no more: but to you I am indebted for saving both my life, and all these here. The Act therefore and ordinance of the Commons which hath been a clog and burden to me rather than an honour, here of my self I renounce, revoke, and abolish: and (that which I pray God may prove to the good both of you and me, of mine army and yours, as well as that which is preserved as that which is the pre"server) I do submit and surrender again my self under your command and government, together with these ensigns and legions thereto belonging: beseeching you to pardon me, and to entertain me in the room of the General of the Cavalry; and those here with me, every man in his former place. Then interchangeably they gave their hands one to another: and the soldiers (after the assembly dismissed) were curiously invited, and friendly entertained, as well by them that were unknown unto them as of their acquaintance; and so the day, dolorous, heavy, and almost dismal and accursed, turned to be joyful and festival.

So soon as tidings came to Rome of these occurrences, and the same confirmed as well by the letters of the Generals themselves, as also by the common voice of soldiers from both Armies, every man, the best he could, praised and extolled Maximus up to the sky: whose honour and reputation was as great in the opinion of Annibal and the Carthaginians, for then and never before, they found, that they had to deal with a man in Italy and with Romans. As for the two years space before, they let to light both by Roman Captains and soldiers, that they could be hardly persuaded, that they warred with that Nation, whereof there went so great a fame, and of whom their forefathers had reported such wonders and terrible things. They say also, that Annibal as he returned out of the field, gave out these words, "That the cloud which leaped on the hill tops, hovered so long in the wind, that it proved a tempestuous storm in the end.

Whilst these things were doing in Italy, Cn. Servilius Geminus the Consul, having sailed about the coasts of Sardinia and Corfica with his fleet, and received hostages both of the one Isle and the other, passed over into Affrick: and before that he landed in the continent and firm land, he wasted the Island Meninus; and having received ^{*} ten talents of silver of the inhabitants thereof, for fear lest their Territory also should be consumed with fire, and spoiled as well as the rest: he came to Affrick, and there set his forces ashore. From thence he led his soldiers and mariners likewise, one with another, disbanded and out of order, as if they were to rob and spoil some desert Islands, unpeopled and void of Inhabitants. Whereupon they fell unadvisedly into an ambush, and being unskillful of the country, and therewith but few and scattered, they were soon enclosed among many, and with much slaughter and shameful flight were driven and beaten back to their ships. The fleet thus having lost a thousand men, and one Treasurer of the Army among them, called Sempronius Blefus, looted in great haste from the shore (which now was overpeered by enemies) and held their course for Sicily, and at Lilybæum was let over and delivered to T. Otacilius the Praetor, for to be brought back again to Rome, by P. Sura his Lieutenant. Cn. Servilius himself journeyed through Sicily by land, and crossed the narrow seas into Italy: for both he and his Colleague M. Atilius were sent for by the letters of Fabius, to receive the Army at his hands, now that his six-months-sovereign government was well near expired. All the Annals in a manner do record, that Fabius was the man, who during his Dictatorship, fought and waged war with Annib. L. Calpurnius writeth also, that he was created Dictator by the people. But both Calpurnius and the rest, either knew not, or else forgot, that the Consul Servilius, who then was far from Rome, and in the Province of France, had the lawful right and authority only to nominate a Dictator: and because the City so afflicted, by reason of that notable overthrow could not stay so long, they were driven to this shift, That there should be created by the people a Pro-Dictator or Dictator's Deputy. But the noble acts and glorious renown of that General, together with the title of his Image, which might recommend his house more honourable to posterity, gained easily this point, and caused the Pro-Dictator to be reputed Dictator, and so called.

The Consuls, M. Atilius Regulus, and Cn. Servilius Geminus, having received the Army (as is before said) fortified in good time the places for wintering harbour (for it was then the Autumn season) conducted and managed the wars together in great concord, and followed the same politic course that Fabius had done before them. For as Annibal made rodes at any time to purvey corn, they would meet him just at every turn, in sundry places, and either cut off the tail of his men,

A men, or intercept and catch them as they went scattering, but never hazard all in one set field; the only thing that the enemy shot at, by all the means he could devise. And so near driven was Annibal, and to those terms of want and scarcity, that but for very shame (left by his dislodging and departure he might be thought to fly) he would have retired back into Gallia, as being but of all hope to maintain and sustain his Army with victuals in those parts. In case the new Consuls who next succeeded, should hold out till the same policy and manner of warfare. Winter now approached, and all the war that was continued and talked about Cerion: at what time there arrived at Rome Embassadors from Naples, who brought with them, and presented into the Council, Houely forty malle boles or beaten gold: and withal delivered this speech, and said, "That they knew full well, how the Treasure of the people of Rome was waited and consumed by long wars. And forasmuch as the said wars were maintained, as well for the defence of the Cities and Lands of allies, as for Rome, the very head, mother City, and principal Citadel (as it were) of all Italy, and for the sovereign dominion and Empire thereof: the Neapolitans thought it meet and reason, that what store or gold their ancestors had left unto them, were it for to adorn and deck themselves, or to relieve them in time of need and necessity, with it they were selves of any other means besides, wherein they might feed and bethought they would as willingly and frankly have made presentment thereof: laying, moreover, that the Senators of Rome should do them as high pleasure, if they would make account of all that the men of Naples had, as their own; and judge them worthy, at whose hands they would vouchsafe to accept a present much greater, and more precious in regard of the mind and affection of the givers than the substance and value of the thing. The Embassadors were highly thanked, as well for their liberality and munificence, as for the care they had of them: and that bull was only received which weighed least.

About the same time, a Carthaginian spy, who for two years space had walked unknown and undiscovered, was detected and apprehended now at Rome; and after his hands were cut off, was suffered to depart. Five and twenty slaves were crucified for a conspiracy contrived in Campus Martius. The Informer was made free, and had ^{*} 20000 pound of brass billyon given him for a reward. There were also sent Embassadors to Philip King of the Macedonians, to demand again Demetrius Phariis, who having been vanquished in plain field, was fled unto him. Others likewise were dispatched to the Ligurians, as well to expatulate with them and complain, that they had succoured Annibal with men, money, and other munition: as also to hearken and learn (seeing they were so near) what the Boians and Insubrians did or went about. Besides, a third Embassy was addressed as far as to Athyræum, unto King Pincus, to enquire and call for the Tribute, whereof the term was expired and past: and if he were minded to take a longer day, than to receive hostages and pledges of him for security. See how careful the Romans were, and what a provident eye they had, notwithstanding the great war which lay heavily upon their backs and shoulders, to their other affairs: inasmuch as no one thing in the world, how distant and remote soever, was by them neglected. But as concerning religion, and Church matters; they made some scruple of conscience, that the Temple of Concord (which L. Manlius, L. Deputy in Gallia, had vowed two years before in time of a sedition and mutiny of soldiers) was not as yet set out to workmen for to be built or edified accordingly. And therefore two Dumbwits were for that purpose created by Emylius the Praetor, or L. Governour of the City, namely, Cn. Papius, and Cato Quintus Flaminius: who gave order, that the Temple should be built upon the Capitol hill. The same Praetor, by virtue of a decree of the Senate, sent his letters unto the Consuls, importing thus much, That if they thought good, one of them should repair to Rome for the creation of new Consuls; and that himself would summon the Parliament against that day which it should please them to appoint. The Consuls wrote back again according to the premises, That they might not depart far from the city without damage of State: advising them to hold an assembly for the Election aforesaid, by authority of an interregent. Rather than that one of the Consuls should be called away from the wars, but the LL. of the Senate thought it better to have a Dictator chosen by one of the Consuls, for the holding of that high Court of Parliament. So L. Petrus Philo, was nominated Dictator, and he chose for General of the Horsemen M. Pomponius Maibo. But these men being not duly and lawfully created, were commanded at the fortnights end to give over their places, and then the matter grew to an Interregent. The Consuls had their Commission, for government and conduct of the Army, continued and confirmed for one year longer. The Senators named for Interregents, first Cn. Claudius Cento, the son of Appius; and after him, P. Cornelius Agna. During whole Interregent, the Parliament was holden, with much contention and debate between the Nobles and the Commons. The Vulgar people endeavoured to advance unto the Consulship C. Terentius Varro, a man of their own coat and condition, one crept into good liking and favour with the common sort by opposing himself and contesting against great personages, and by other popular practices and courtes that he used to win grace among the people; as namely, by abasing the greatness of Fabius, and the Majesty of the Dictatorship: for nothing was there else in him, to commend him to the world, but a malicious mind to bring others into disgrace. The Nobles withstood the Commons all they could, to prevent this mischief: That men should not take a custom to be their equals, by means of inveighing and making head against them. Bibius Herennius a Tribune of the Commons, mons, and kinman to C. Terentius, blamed and accused much not only the Senate; but also the H Angurs, in that they forbad the Dictator to finish and go through with the election; and so by drawing them into hatred, sought to purchase favour and credit unto Terentius his Candidate, who stood to be Consul. First, quoth he, whereas the Noblemen for many years together, sought occasions of war, and trained Annibal into Italy, the same persons craftily have made a long war of it, when it might have been brought to a final and before now; Also, when it was well seen that they might have fought a battle with the complete power of four legions all together, seeing that M. Minutius in the absence of Fabius had a lucky day: two legions only and no more, were offered and exposed as it were to the enemy to be hewn in pieces; and then afterwards, they were rescued and saved from massacre, and the very edge of the sword; to the end that Fabius might be called Father and Patron even he, who to say a truth, first impeached the Romans for vanquishing the enemies, before that he saved them from being vanquished. Moreover, the Consuls that succeeded, following the same course and artificiall fetches that Fabius practised before them, drew out the war still on length; when they had good means of victory, and might have fully finished it. A complot (no doubt) contrived and concluded among all the Nobles. And never will they see to, make an end of war, before there be a Consul chosen, a meer Commoner indeed, to wit, a man never seen afore; and of the first head; For those who are of Commoners now made noble, are all alike and of the same profession; they draw all in one line, and have learned one lesson; and therefore that they have left to be contemned of the Nobility, are faine to despise and disdain the Commonalty. For who keeth not, that in seeking to have an Interrein, their only purpose and reach was, that the Election might be full and wholly in the power and ordering of the Nobles? That was the thing which the Consuls aimed at, in staying behind in Camp with the Army; & afterwards when there was a Dictator created a gainst their wills for to hold the great assembly for the Election, their drift was, and they wrought so, and brought it about in the end, that the Angurs should give it out and pronounce, that there was an error committed in creation of the Dictator. And therefore, saith he, the Commons cannot of all things away with these Interreins; and verily, one of the Consulships (at least) ap-pertain of right to the Commons of Rome; and no doubt, the people in their free election would more willingly make choice of one to be Consul, and confer the dignity upon him; that loved rather to win the victory at once, than to continue commander in the Army a long time. When the Commons were once enkindled and set on fire with these speeches and remonstances, albeit three of the Patritii were competitors, namely, Pub. Cornelius Merenda; L. Manlius Volfo, and M.

Emilius Lepidus, and two new Noblemen, who were already familiar and acquainted with the Commons, to wit, C. Autius Serranus, and Q. Elius Paucis; of whom the one had been High Priest, and the other Augur: yet at length was C. Terentius only created Consul, to the end that the election should be in his power, that he might choose unto him a Colleague at his pleasure. Then the Patritians having a sufficient tryall, that their Candidates and Competitors were of small force and not able to prevail, urged and put forward L. Emilius Paulus, who sometimes had been Consul with M. Lelutius, in the condemnation as well of himself as of his companion, escape the peril of being burnt, and was well finged and scorched, as it were in the fire: a man of all M others most michievously bent against the Commons: him they urged, to stand for a Consul-ship, notwithstanding he refused a long while, and alleged many reasons against it. And so the next Comitial or Parliament day, by occasion that all the concurrents and competitors afore said that stood with Varro, gave place and left off their suit, he was chosen to match with the Consul elect, for to thwart and cross him, rather than to be assistant unto him in the government. This done, they proceeded to the election of Pretors, wherein M. Pomponius Mitho, and P. Furius Philus were created. Unto Pomponius fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City of Rome; and unto P. Furius Philus, between the Citizens of Rome and foreigners. Two other Pretors besides were chosen, M. Claudius Marcellus, to be sent L. Deputy into Sicily, and L. Posthumius Albinus into Gallia. All were created in their absence, and excepting Terentius the Consul only, there was no N Magistracy conferred upon any, who had not aforetime born and exercised the same: for divers valorous and hardy men were passed over and left out, because in such a time of trouble, it was not thought good to prefer any man to a government, wherein he was raw and unexperienced.
The Army also were augmented; but to what proportion they arose, either in Cavalry, or Infantry, I dare not set down any thing for certainty: so greatly do authors vary both in the number and quality of the forces. Some say, there was a new supply of 10000 souldiers enrolled. O Others affirm, that to the five legions there were were adjoynted four new besides, to the end they might employ nine legions in the wars. Also, that the legions were increased in number both of foot and horse: to wit, with the addition of one thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen in every Legion: for sometime before, a Legion contained 4000 foot, and 200 horse, called Quadrata legio: whereas at first Romulus ordained it to be 3000 of the one, and 300 of the other: so as a Legion consisted now of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse: and that the affairs should double the number of horsemen, and find even proportion of footmen with the Romans.

Some Historians have written, that at what time as the battell of Cannas was fought, the Romans were in Camp 87200 strong. But in this they all agree, that the Romans warred with greater preparation, and more force and fury than in years past, because the Dictator had put them in

A In good hope, that the enemy might be vanquished and subdued at once. But before that these new Legions advanced under their ensigns and banners out of the City, the Decemvirs were commanded to go and peruse the books of Sibylla; by reason that men were commonly put in fear, and terrified with news of strange sights and prodigious tokens. For the rumour went, that both at Rome in the Aventine, and also at Ardea, iterated fumes, much about one time; and that in the Sabine Country (which no doubt portended a great massacre and slaughter) there issued out of a certain fountain, waters hot, with much blood; and men were more terrified therewith, because it did so many times together. Besides, in the street called Fornicata toward Campus Martius, divers persons were blasted and smitten to death with lightning from heaven. The prodigious signs were expiate and purged with due remedies out of the foretold books. Emball dore also from the City of Pessum, brought unto Rome a present of massie blocks of beaten gold. Thanked they were, like as the Neoplatons before them, but the gold was not received.

At the same time there arrived at Ostia from K. Hiero a fleet of ships, ready rigged, and furnished with store of victuals. The Syracusan Embassadors were brought into the Senate house, where they declared, That K. Hiero so soon as he heard of the death of C. Flaminius the Consul, and the defeat of the Army, took it so heavily, that no proper calamity of his own, or loss incident unto his kingdom, could have troubled him more, and touched him nearer: and therefore albeit he knew full well, that the grandeur and courage of the people of Rome, was ordinarily more admirable in their adversity, than in prosperity and welfare, yet he had sent a thole things, wherewith good friends and faithful Allies are wont to furnish their associates in time of war, praying C the L.L. of the Senat, in any case not to refuse the same, but to take all in good worth. And first & formost, for good lucke and fortunate presage, they have brought with them the Image of Victory in gold, weighing 320 pounds: requesting that it would please them to accept the same.

Modios of wheat, and 200000 of barley to the end they should be at no fault for victuals, and were ready moreover to bring in more, according as they should need, and to what place they would appoint. As for footmen heavily armed, and horsemen he knew well the people of Rome would like none but naturall Romans, or at least wille Latines. But forasmuch as he had seen and observed in the Roman Camp, forrein aids consisting of light armed iou. durs, therefore he had sent 1000 Archers and Slingers, a meet and competent power to match with the Balceres and Mores, and other nations that use shot, and to reach their enemies as far off. Over and besides these gifts and real presents, they counselled and advised them, that the Lord Deputy of Sicily should pais with his fleet into Affrick, both to find the enemy work, and give him his hands full of war at home; and also to afford him less respite, and worse opportunity, to lend aid and succour to Annibal. The Senate returned this answer again unto the King: That King Hiero had done the part of a right good man, and a singular friend and ally, who ever time that he was entred into amity with the people of Rome, hath held on the same course still, in keeping his faithfull allegiance, and never failed, but at all times and in all places succoured and advanced the State and Empire of Rome, with all bounty and princely munificence: which the people of Rome took most thankfully, as in right they ought. As for good meane Cities likewise had brought and offered unto them, but accepting only in good worth their kindness, received it not.

But the Image of Victory, and the happy preiuge and foretoken thereof they gladly accepted, and for that blessed Saint they appointed and dedicated even the Capitol, and Temple of Jup. Op.
Max. to be the seat and shrine thereof: that being consecrated in that Cattle and highest fortress of the City of Rome, it might be propice and gracious, and remain firm and fast to the people of Rome. As for the Slingers and archers, together with the corn they were delivered to the Cof. Five and twenty galleys, with five ranks of oars to a side, were joined to the Navy which was under the conduct of T. Octavius the Pro-prator in Sicily: who had commission, if he thought it good and expedient for the commonweal, to pais over into Affrick. The Consuls having finished the musters and levied souldiers, laid a few daies, until their allies were come with aid from the Latines. Then were the Souldiers particularly (a thing never done before) by their Colonels, put to their corporal oath, and sworn to make their repair at the Consuls commandment, and without their leave not to depart: for until that day there passed nothing but a sacramental parole & simple promise in general. For whensoever the horsemen referred to their Decuries, and footmen to their Centuries; both they of the Cavalry in their Decuries, and also of the Infantry in their Centuries, swate (after a sort) voluntarily among themselves. That they would not abandon their enigns by way of flight, or upon any fear, nor go out of their ranks, unless it were to fetch either some offensive armour, or to finite an enemy, or to save the life of a Citizen. Which having been aforetime a voluntary covenant & accord between themselves, was now by the martial Tribunes or Colonels, reduced to a formal and solemn oath and bound the souldiers to observe them, fume of necessity. Yet before the ensigns set forward and marched out of Rome, the Consul Varro dealt many hot words and brave orations in the assembly of the people, intimating & purporting thus much in effect: That the Nobles had called for war in Italy, where it was like to remain long enough, and to stick close to the ribs of the common-weal, if she were served with many in. h Generals as Fabius was, "As for my self (quoth he) I shall (I trow) vanquish the enemy, the first day that I set eye upon him, yea, and finish the war at once for ever. But his Colleague Paulus made but one only speech, even the day before they were to take their leave of the City, which was not so well taken of the people for the present, as it is proved true in the end. Wherein he gave Varro no hard words, nor girded at him otherwise than thus: "That he marvelled much, how any Captain, before he had experience either of his own army, or of his enemies, and knew the situation of the place and ground, and the nature of the country, sitting as yet within the City in his gown, could perfectly tell what he was to do in the field; and be able also to foretell and set down the very day, wherein he was to encounter and joyn in ranged battell with the enemy. For his own part, he would not cast thus beforehand, nor plot his designs and counsels before due time & season, which present occurrences are wont much more to minister unto men, than men time & season, that shall happen. This would he wish with all his heart, That the enterprises taken in hand warily and with discretion, might prove as lucky and fortunate. As for I, inconsiderate rashness, besides that it is implieth folly, hath ever to that day sped but ill. Thus it was well seen, that this man of himself enclined to prefer safe proceeding & advised counsels, before doubtful waies & fool-hardy courses: & so to the end that he might persevere in that resolution more constantly. Q. Fabius Maximus at his departure (by report) bad him farewell, in this or such like manner. "If either you, Q. L. Emilius, had a Colleague like unto your self, which I could rather wish, or that your self were fittable to your Colleague, these my words to you were altogether needless and superfluous. For you twain, being two good Consuls, would even without my speech do all things faithfully to the good of the Commonweal: and contrariwise, if both of you were bad, ye neither would vouchsafe to give ear to my sayings, nor ponder in mind my counsels. But now, when I consider your companion what he is and your self, to be a man of that quality & worth, as you are he to whom alone I am addrest to direct my whole speech; to you, I say, whom he thinks I foresee already, like to be in vain and without effect: an honest man and a good Citizen. For if the Commonweal be hale and lame but of one side, as great sway and authority will be had projects & leud courses carry, as the good sage, and wholsom counsels. For you are set out of the way and much deceived, Q. L. Emilius, if you think to be less troubled with Annibal than with C. Terentius. And I wot not well, but I greatly fear, that you shall have a more cumbersome adversary of the one, than a dangerous enemy of the other. For with Annibal you are to fight in the field, and in time of battell only; but with Terentius you shall have to do in every place, and at all hours. Against Annibal and his Legions you shall make head, and have the help of your own Cavalry and Infantry; but General Varro will assail you even with your own footsouldiers. For he be from you in any illenise the late remembrance of C. Flaminius, for I love no such unlucky prelagings. Howbeit, he began his mad fits when he was once Consul, and never before: when he was in his Province with command, & in the Camp with his Army, and never else. But this Varro, even before he stood for the Consulship, and all the whiles he was a sutor therefore, and now likewise, that he is Consul, before that he seeth cam or enemy in field, is horn-mad, and talketh like a man besides himself. What foul work then, think you, will he make, when he shall see himself with armed youths about him in the Camp, who now amongst peaceable Citizens in their gowns and long robes within the City, stirreth so great storms and tempests, cracking and vaulting at every second word, of nothing but fight, skirmish, and battell? What a coil, I say, will he keep there, where no sooner a word spoken, but a blow given; and when upon direct, M. on, presently ensueth execution? But in case this man (as he saith flatly he will) I fall immediately to strike a battell, either I know not what belongeth to Art military, and have neither skill how to conduct this kind of warfare, nor any experience of the quality and nature of this enemy, or else there will be another place more noble and memorable by our defeat and overthrow, than was the Lake Thrasymenus. But it is no time now to stand upon these terms, and to glorifie my self in comparison of this one person: who have loved (as it is well known) to exceed and go beyond all measure in despising glory & honour, rather than in desiring and coveting the same. But the truth is this & so it will be found in the end, that the only way to war against Annibal, is that which I took and alwaies used. Neither is it the issue and event alone (for that is matter and teacher of fools) which sheweth & proveth this unto us, but even reason it self which hath, N and will be fill the same and immutable, as long as things in the world hold on as they do. We war, (you see) in Italy, at home, in our own ground and place of residence: all quarters round about us, full of our own Citizens or friendly Allies: who daily help us, and will be ready still to furnish us with armour, men, horse, and victuals. Sufficient proof and testimony of their faithfulness have they given us already in our hard distresses and adversity. Space and process of time maketh us better stronger, wiser every day than other, and more constant and resolute. Contrariwise, Annibal is in a strange and foreign land, in his enemies country, in the midst of all things that are croise and adverse unto him, far from his house and home, far from his native soil, having peace no where, neither by sea nor land. No Cities receive him and give him entertainment, no wals he hath, within which he can retire himself in safety. Nothing seeth he, whereof ever he goeth, that he can say is his own. From day to day, from day to day, he is transported over the river Pyrene and Ipsal. Scarce a third part hath he of those forces, which he transported over the river Pyrene. Hunger and famine hath wasted more of them, than the edge of the sword: and for this small remainder that is left, he is hard and scant provided of food and sustenance. Make you any doubt then, but we shall vanquish him, whilst we sit still and take our ease, who day by day decrease (scarcely, and waxeth old and feeble, who neither hath store of victuals to maintain an army, nor supply of men to make up his broken bands, nor mals of money to entertain them.

A "How long was he faine to fight for Gerion, a poor little Castle in Apulia, as it had been for the wals of Carthage it self? Neither will I boast and magnifie my self at all before you O. Emilius. "Do you but only consider, how Cn. Servilius and Artorius, the last Consuls, paired mock-holiday with him and deluded him. This is the only way of safety, O. L. Paulus, which I ear me our own Citizens will make difficult and dangerous unto themselves, more than to enemies can. For you shall have your own footsouldiers and your enemies both of one and the same mind, Varro the Roman Consul, and Annibal the Carthaginian General will aim and reach at one and the self same thing. And you, being but one man, must make account to resist two Captains: and resist them you shall: well enough, if you will stand firm and hold your own against all bruits and speeches of the people, if neither the vain glory of your fellow that shall be blazed, nor the infamous rumour: that shall be falsely blown abroad to your disgrace, shall once stir you from your constant resolution and maintenance of the truth. Oid sayings, these be, and common prove by: "That right and true-dealing may well be sick, but it shall not die: it may lie a bleeding but shall not miscarry. And he that will despise vain-glory, shall attain in the end to true glory. Let them call you and spare not fearful for careful, cold and flow for wise and considerate an ill foudier and ignorant for a skillful warrior and experient ed. But be not you dismayed: I had rather hear a wife and sober enemy to fear you, than see foolish and brain-tick Citizens to praise you. Adventure all things boldly, Annibal will condemn you: enterprise nothing; shyly, he shall dread you. And yet my purpose is not, neither speak I this that you should enter into no action at all: but my meaning and advice is, that in all your doings you be guided and directed by three reasons, not haled and carried away with blind fortune. Order the matter so, that I things lie within your compals, and at your disposition. Stand ever armed and upon your guard. Have your eye about you still, and keep good watch, that neither you lose any opportunity that shall present itself unto you, nor yield unto the enemy any occasion for his advantage. Take time and leisure your shall find all things clear plain easie, and certain. Contrariwise, shall maketh waste: it is ever to seek it forefeeth nought, but is stark blind.

The Consul answered to these speeches, with no light som cheer and gladome countenance, as confessing, That all he spake was rather true in substance, than easie in execution. "For (said he) if the General of hostiemen were so violent, and not to be endured of you, who were his Dictator and sovereign Commander: what could he take, what shift may I make, what power and authority insufficient, am I like to have to sway against my tedious, quartelme, and heady Colleague? For mine own part, in my former Consulship, I hardly escaped a scourging, and much ado I had to pass through the fire, fire of the flaming peoples doom and heavy sentence, wherein I was well scorched and half-burnt. I with all may be well in the end. Howbeit, if any thing shall fall out otherwise than well, I had rather hazard the pikes and darts of the enemies, and leave my life behind me amongst them, than put my self to be tried again by the voices and suffrages of angry and tatty Citizens. Paulus had no sooner delivered this speech, but (as the report goeth) he went forth on his journey, and the chief LL. of the Senat accompanied him, The other Commoner Consul was likewise attended of his favouris the Commons, more looked on & gazed at for their multitude and number, than regarded for the worth & quality of their persons.

So soon as they were arrived at the Camp, and that the new army was increasing ed with the old, they divided the whole army into two camps & ordered the matter so, that the new which was the lesser should be nearer to Annibal: and in the old, the greater number and the whole strength and flower of the main forces should be quartered. Then they sent away to Senae M. sitting the Consul of the former year, who excused himself by reason of his old age, and desired to be gone. But they gave unto Cn. Servilius the charge and conduct of one Roman Legion, and besides of two thousand horsemen and footmen of their allies in the lesser Camp. Annibal notwithstanding he well perceived that the power of his enemies was re-enforced by one half more than before; yet wondrous joyfull he was at the coming of these new Consuls. For not on y F he had nothing left of victuals, which from day to day he purveyed for, to serve his present need and no more; but also there was no more to be had, and nothing remained for to fill his hands with: by reason that after the territory was not safe to travel in, the corn from all parts was conveyed unto the strong walled Towns, and there laid up: so that (as afterwards it was known for certain) he had scarce corn enough for to serve ten daies: and the Spaniards, by occasion of the death and want, were at the point to revolt unto the Romans, if they might but enjoy a good and commodious time therefore. Over and besides, to the inbred rashness and over-hasty nature of the Consul. Fortune also ministered matter to confirm him therein. For in a certain tumultuary skirmish (to it up and impeach the torragers and Phidreus of Annibal, and which began rather by chance, as the footsouldiers happened to encounter one another, than upon any deliberate counsel beforehand, or by direction and commandment from the Generals) the Carthaginians had the foil, and went by the worst: for of them there were 17 slain: but of Romans and Confederates, not passing 100. And when in theirin of glory they hotly followed the chase in pursuit, the Consul Paulus, who that day had the absolute command (for they governed by turn: each once his day) refrained and staid them, Varro thereat chafed and fretted, crying out aloud. That he had let the enemy escape out of his hands: and if he had not thus given over the pursuit, the war might have been ended at once. Annibal took this loss and damage nothing near the heart, but rather made full reckoning, that he had caught

(as it were) with a bait, & fleshed the audaciousness of the fool-hardy Consul, and of the new soldiers especially. For he knew as well all that was done amongst the enemies, as in his own Camp; namely, that the Generals were not fit to be trusted one unto the other, and that of three parts of the army, two in a manner were but raw, fresh, and untrained soldiers. And therefore supposing he had now got place and time favourable unto him, to contrive and compass some stratagem, the night following he led forth his soldiers, carrying nothing about them but their armour; and abandoned the Camp full of all things, as well private goods and furniture, as public provision; and beyond the next hills he bestowed secretly in ambush his footmen well appointed and in ordinance of battle on the left hand; and the horsemen on the right; and conveyed all his carriages into the midst between two flanks: to the end, that while the enemy was buied in rifling and ransacking the tents, and looting (as it were) and forsaken by the flight of the owners and masters, he might surprize him laden and encumbered with bag and baggage. He left behind him in the Camp many fires burning, to the end that the enemies should not think and believe, that under a pretended shew of an army in Camp, his purpose was to hold and keep the Consuls amazed till where they were, while himself in the mean time might gain more ground and escape further away: like as he had plaid by Fabius the year before. When day-light was come, and the Consul saw, first that the standing guards were gone, and perceived (as they approached nearer) unwonted silence they marvelled much. But after they discovered certainly that the Camp was abandoned, and no person remaining behind: there was running of all hands who could run fastest to the pavilions of the Consul, with news that the enemies were fled, in such fear, as they left their tents standing entire, and had quit the Camp wholly: and to the end their flight should be more secret and not desired they had left light fires burning in every place. Then began they all to cry and call upon the Consul, or to commend the standards and ensigns to be brought abroad and to lead forth in pursuit of the enemies; and without any stay to make spoil and have to their Camp. And in truth, one of the Consul, was no wiser than the common soldiers. But Paulus replied, and told them ever and anon, that they were to be circumspect and wary, and to look about them what they did for fear of an ambush. Yet seeing in the end no remedy, and that otherwise he could neither stay the mutiny, nor tell the Captain thereof: he sent out M. Stacidus (the Praefect marshall) with a troop of Lucan horsemen in cassail to discover the coats and seals were clear: who having ridden hard to the gates, and given order to all the rest for to stay without the fortifications, himself with two horsemen besides, entered within the rampire, and having looked and searched every corner advisedly, he returned and made relation. That past all peradventure there were knaves abroad and a piece of treachery was in hand: for why there are fires made (quoth he) on that side only of the Camp that looked toward the enemy: the pavilions stand open and all things of price and value which they set more store by are left at random even to fit our hands: and we have been beset in divers places, silver plate and coin scattered along the way here and there, as it were a bait laid to train us to a booby. These circumstances reported, of purpose to withdraw their minds from covetous and greedy desire of pillage; set them on and kindled them the more. And the soldiers had no sooner cried aloud, that unless the Consuls were given, they would set forward without Commanders; but they had a Captain straight at hand to lead them. M. Paulus who of himself made slow hast, and perceived besides that the birds in taking the Consul approved not this enterprize nor gave good tokens of happy speed, gave order straightwaies that his Colleague should be advertised of the unlucky Auspice, who was ready now to set out of the gate with his late misfortune of Flaminius, should stay. Wherewith albeit Varro was not well content, yet the late misfortune of Flaminius, and the memorable overthrow at sea of Claudius Pulcher Consul, in the Punic war, wrought some scruple of conscience and fear in his heart. But it was even the fair grace of the gods (if a man may so say) and nothing else, which put by and deferred rather than impeached and inhibited the danger and destruction that hung over the Romans heads. For as good hap was it chanced at the very instant, when the Consul commanded the ensigns to be brought into the Camp, & the soldiers would not obey him that two lasses (who served sometime two horsemen, the one a Formian, and the other a Sidicin, and who in the year when Servilius & Antius were Consuls among other foragers were taken prisoners by the Numidians) made an escape and fled that day to their old masters again. Who being brought before the Consul, advertised them constantly, that the whole army of Annibal lay close in ambush, ado on the farther side of the mountains. The coming of these bondslaves to right and jump as they did, caused the soldiers to obey their Consul. Whereas the one of them by his ambitious courting and seeking unto them at the first for a Consulship, and afterwards by his unbecomingly indulgent and pleasing of them, had lost all his majesty and reputation among them.

Annibal, when he saw that the Romans rather began to stir without advice, than still to run rashly on head to the full, and that his ravy device was disclosed and took no effect, returned again into his Camp. Where he could not for want of corn make abode many daies: and besides, not only soldiers (who were not all one mans children, but also their Captain himself was of many minds) to plot and enter into new designments, but also their Captain himself was of many minds. For whereas they began with muttering and grumbling: and afterwards with open mouth, to demand and call for their due wages, complaining first of the dearth of victuals, and in the end, of meer hunger and famine: and withall a rumour ran, that the mercenary soldiers,

And the Spaniards especially, were minded and intended to give him the slip, and to turn to the enemy; Annibal likewise bethought himself otherwhiles as it was said, how he might flee into Gallia; but so, as he would leave his Infantry behind him at six and seven, and to be gone with his Cavalry alone. As men, I say, were thus plotting and devising in the camp, he received at length to dislodge from thence, and to remove into the hotter countries of Spain, where the harvest was more timely: considering withal, that the farther he went from the enemies his soldiers who were by nature light-headed and inconstant, would not so easily revolt and flee from him. So he took his way by night, and made fires likewise, and left a few tents standing in light, that the Romans tearing the ake trains and ambush, as before, might keep in and not stir abroad. But when as the same Statilius the Lucan, having scoured all the consuls both beyond the camp, and the other side of the hills, and brought word, that he had discovered the enemies afar off dimarching, then began they the morrow after to think and consult of making after him with hot pursuit. But both Consuls continued, as ever before, the same men still, that is to say, diversely minded, and persisting in their several resolutions: but so, as all in a manner accorded with Varro, and none agreed unto Paulus, but only Servilius the Consul of the former year: yet according to the opinion and counsel of the major parts, they went both together (for what might hold that which fatal necessity driveth to make Camma much renowned and famous for the notable overthrow and defeat of the Romans. Near this village Annibal had encamped under the wind Vulturnus, and had it on his back: which wind, when the fields are scorched and burnt with drought, is wont to bring with it clouds (as it were) of dust. Which as it was good and commodious for the very camp it self, so it was like to serve in special stead, when they should range their battell in order, and fight with the wind blowing on their back, against the enemy, whose eyes the dust was ready to put out, flying with the wind full in their faces so abundantly.

The Consuls having diligently searched the ways and tried the passages ever before them, followed Annibal hard, and so soon as they were come to Camma, had him in sight: where they fortified two camps, of like distance almost alunder, as at Gerion; and divided their forces like as before. The river Ausidus ran close by both these camps, and yielded waiting places according as either of them had occasion and need, but not without some trifling and skirmish. But from the lesser camp, which lay on the farther side of Ausidus, the Romans had more liberty to water, because upon the farther bank there was planted no fence nor guard of the enemy. Annibal having possessed himself of a good plot of ground to his mind, commodious and meet for the service of horsemen (in which kind of forces he was invincible) ordered his battalions in array. & by putting out certain Numidian light horse, made a bravado, and bade the Consul's battell. And when they fell out, that both the Roman camps were disquieted and troubled anew, what with the mutiny of the footsolders, and what with the disagreement and jarring of the Consuls: while Paulus laid hard unto Varro, and let before his eyes the rashness of Servilius and Flaminius: and Varro again hit him home, and twit him with the example of Fabius, which made to goodly a shew in the eyes of fearful, idle, and cowardly Captains: both of them fell to protesting and calling God and man to witness, the one giving out, that the fault was not in him that Annibal was now Lord well-near of all Italy already, and why? because himself was kept short and tied fast enough by his Colleague, and the soldiers whose hot blood was up, and who were eager of fight, had their weapons even plucked out of their hands: Annibal on the other side complaining, that it ought should hap amis unto the Legions thus betrayed, and offered willfully and unconsiderately to the danger of doubtful battell, notwithstanding he were not blame-worthy but innocent altogether; yet should he be the first that imputed, and be partaker of the mischief and misfortune: and yet he would gladly see, whether they who were to be ready and laffy of their tongue to speak, would be as nimble & active of their hands to fight, when the time came. Thus while they spent time in chopping of Logick & quarrelling one with another, rather then in good & sober consultations, Annibal who had stood arranged a good part of the day ready to fight, minding to retire his other forces into his camp, sent forth certain Numidians out of the battell to charge upon the Romans on the other side of the river, who from the lesser camp went for water. These being disordered & confused multitude, were not fully landed on the bank, but with the fiercest & tumult of the Numidians, they were discomfited and put to flight: whereupon the enemy rode forth, even to the standing Corps de guard, quartered before the rampart, and had at the very gates of the Roman camp. This was such an indignity offered to the Romans, to themselves thus thus braved and bearded even in the very camp by the auxiliary footsolders, and the fatal sort of the enemies, that there was no other thing stayed the Romans from passing the river presently, and embattelling themselves, but only this, that it was Paulus his anniversary day to have the foretold command of all. And therefore the morrow after, when it came to Paulus his anniversary day, he, without any advice of his companion, he put forth the signal of battell, and with a little force put in order of battell, went over the river, Paulus also followed after him as one who might well enough mislike and disallow the purpose of his Colleague, but otherwise could neither will, nor chuse, but second him, and take part in the execution. Being once over the river, they joined all the forces which they had in the smaller camp, unto the other: and in this manner they ordered the battell. In the right point which was nearer to the river, was arranged the Roman Cavalry, and after them the footmen. The left point on the outside, was flanked with the horsemen of the allies: within stood their Infantry: but in the middle part were bestowed the Archers and loose shot, close to the main battel of the Roman Legions; and of all the rest of light armed H auxiliary souldiers, consisted the van-guard. The Consul led both the points, Tarentius the left, Emilius the right, Cn. Servilius had the conduct of the main battel. Now Anibal by the break of day, having sent before the Balearic slingers, and his other light armor, passed over the river, and marshalled them in battel array, ever as they came to land. The horse as well Gauls as Spaniards, he opposed in the left point, neer to the bank; even against the horsemen of the Romans: the right consisted of the Numidian light horse: and the main battel was strengthened and fortified with his Infantry: but in such manner as the Africans flanked both, in manner of wings: and between them were bestowed the Gauls and the Spaniards in the midst. A man that had seen the Africans, would have taken most of them for Romans, so armed were they with Roman armor, I gotten much of it at Trebia, but most of all at Thrasymenus. The Frenchmen and Spaniards had targets neer of one fashion, but their swords were unlike and far differing. Those of the Gauls were very long and not pointed. But the Spaniard, whose manner is rather to fight with the thrust and to toy, then to slash and strike edglong, had handsome short cutlasses, and sharp at the point. And after this sort stood these two nations armed before the rest (terrible to behold, both for the bigness of their persons, and also for their habit and attire.) The Gauls all from the navel upward naked: the Spaniards with linnen waistcoats or jackets, glittering wondrous bright, bordered and embroidered with purple and scarlet. The compleat number of all, as well horse as footmen, that stood embattelled, amounted (as they report) unto forty thousand foot, and ten thousand men of arms. These Captains had the leading of the two points, to wit, Alarbal commanded the left, Maharbal the right, Anibal himself in person with his brother Mago, conducted the middle battel. The Sun shone sideways upon the flanks both of the one and also of the other army, very indifferent and commodious to both parts, were it that they were so placed and marshalled of purpose, or chanced at adventure so to stand: the Romans with their faces full forth, the Carthaginians into the north. But the wind which the inhabitants of that country call Fulturnus, arose and blew full upon the faces of the Romans, and raised such store of dust, and drove it so upon their eyes, that it took away their sight and prospect. The cry and shout began on both sides, and the Auxiliary souldiers put themselves forth first to skirmish, and charged one another with their light shot. Then the left point of the Gauls and Spanish men of arms encountered and ran full upon the right hand of the Romans Cavalry, nothing at all after the order of horse-service. For they were of necessity to affront one another straight forward, as having no room left about them to fling out and ride at large, being flanked on the one hand with the river, and enclosed on the other with the battailon of footmen. Whereupon I say, they were forced to charge full butt from both parts, directly before them, so long as their horses stood close and thrust together: but at length when they began to stir and wince, the riders, man to man, fell to take hold and claipe one another, and every man to pluck his enemy besides his horse, so as now they were driven much what to fight on foot. This conflict was rather sharp then long: and to be short, the Roman Cavalry was discomfited and put to flight. And anon, as the horse made an end of their fight, began the skirmish of the foot also. At the first the Gauls and Spaniards equal to their enemies both in force and courage maintained the conflict right hardily, and kept their order and arrayes. At length the Romans cast about and deviled on what side, and with what form of a close battailon, to force back that pointed Squadron of the enemies, ranged very thin, and by so much the weaker, and bearing out withal, from the rest of the battel. Now when they had once driven them to retreat, and give ground, the Romans pressed on still at one instant, and with the same violence pierced through them as they fled for fear headlong, until they were entered as far as to the very midst of the vanguard and main battel: and finding none able to stand in their way and make resistance, they gained in the end the very rearward of the Africans: who having drawn in from both sides their skirts and wings, stood together strong, and firmly kept their ground. The Gauls and Spaniards continued still in the midst, somewhat advanced without the rest of the battel. Now when this pointed Squadron was driven by the Romans, and made even and equal fight with the front of the battel, and afterwards upon farther enforcement, gave way for them to pass in a lane through the midst thereof: by that time the Africans charged upon their flanks: and whiles the Romans unwarily were engaged over far within them, they came about them on the skirts, and within a while having stretched out and spread their wings, enclosed the enemies round on their backs also. Hereupon the Romans who had performed one battel and conflict in vain, were forced to give over the Gauls and Spaniards, whom they had discomfited and put to flight, and were to begin a fresh fight with the Africans: and that to their own great disadvantage; not only because they being enclosed and pent up in a straight room, were to deal with them that had compassed them all about and were at liberty, but also because they being wearied, were to maintain a new skirmish with those that were fresh in heart, and lusty. And now by this time, in the left point of the Romans battel, where the horsemen of their associates were marshalled to affront the Numidians they were fain to close fight: which at the first these Numidians began but coldly and faintly. After the deceitful manner of Carthaginians, unto whom they were fain and neer neighbours. For so, of them or thereabout, having besides their usual javelins and darts which they commonly carry, short daggers or skeins hidden under their cuirasses and harness, made semblance of riding away from their own companies, and siding to the Romans, with their bucklers at their backs, all of a sudden dismounted from their horses, and throwing their bucklers, targets, and

A and spears at their enemies feet, were received within the main battel, and from thence conducted to the hindmost in the rearward, were commanded thence to abide behind at their back. And until such time as the skirmish joined on all sides, they continued quiet. But when they saw every mans eye and mind busied and occupied in the conflict, then they caught up those bucklers that lay streyed and scattered among the dead bodies all abroad, and played upon the battel of the Romans from behind: and what with wounding their backs, & cutting their hamstrings, they made foul work and slaughter among them, and more then that, raised a greater fear and tumult by far. Now when the Romans in one place were lighted and ran away, and in another fought for life, armed only with despair of a means to escape; Alarbal who had the charge of that side, withdrew from the midst of the battel, and sent them to pursue the enemies in the chafe. And to the Africans over weary now with execution and killing, rather then with any other fight, he joined the Gauls and Spanish footmen to assist them. On the other side of the battel, Paulus, albeit at the very first shock and encounter, he was sore wounded with a bullet from out of a sling, yet oftentimes he made head against Anibal, and kept his battailons close and thick together, yet, and in divers places renewed the conflict, and evermore the Roman horsemen guarded and protected him. But at the last they left their horses, because the Consul his strength failed him to rule his own, and to fit him. Whereupon there was one brought word unto Anibal, that the Consul had commanded his men of arms to light aloot. Then (quoth Anibal, as the report goeth) Yea, marry: But how much gladder would I be, if he delivered them into my hands bound hand and foot? And surely the horsemen fought so after they were lighted, as if there had been no doubt, but that the enemy had the victory. Howbeit, although they had the worse, yet they chose rather to die in the place, then to flee: and the victors angry at the heart with them for thus flaying the accomplishment of the victory, went down with them, and killed outright all those whom they could not make to give ground and yeeld. And yet a few such as were wearied with much toil and overcharged with many wounds they enforced to retreat. Anon they were all discomfited and scattered asunder: and as many as could, recovered their horses, and fled away. Cn. Lentulus quoth (he) whom the gods ought of right to regard and save, as being the only guiltless man, and innocent of this days work and unhappy overthrow, take here this horie of mine, while some vigor and strength remaineth in you. Able I am to mount you upon him: to accompany and protect you also. Come I say, and make not this battel more cursed and sorrowful by the death of a Consul. Without it, I wot, we have cause enough already, and too much, of dolorous tears and wofull lamentation. Whereunto the Consul made this answer: Give thee thanks, O. Lentulus, gra-mercy for thy kindness, and God bless thee in this thy vertue and prowess. But take thou heed to thy self, lest by thy foolish pity of me, thou lose that little time which thou hast to escape out of the hands of the enemies. Save thy self, and go thy ways to the L. of the Senat, and will them all from me in general, to fortifie the City of Rome, and man it well with strong guards, before the enemy follow the train of victory, and come against it. But more particularly, let Q. Fabius understand, that L. Emilius yet, was mindful of his wholom precepts, all the while he lived, and now also forgot them not at the hour of his death. And suster thoume to yeeld unto nature, and let go my last breath, even here among the heaps of mine own slain souldiers, that I may end my days and die neither an accused and guilty person, nor in my Consulship stand up to accuse my Collegues, and to defend mine own innocency, and justice my selfe, by the blaming of another. As the Consul uttered these words, first the multitude of his own citizens in the rout, and then the enemies in pursuit, ran over him: and not knowing who he was, overwhelmed him with javelins and darts good store. As for Lentulus, his horse carried him away to a little hill. Then they fled all main as fast as they could, 7000, recovered the lesser camp, and ten thousand the greater: and upon two thousand put themselves into the village it self of F. Canne. But because it was an unvalled and fenceless town, they were immediately environed by Cartago and the horsemen, and so perished every one. The other Consul made no semblance, that he was offended or displeased with the companies that thus fled, were it of purpose, or as it chanced: and accompanied with fifty men of arms or thereabout escaped to Pompeia. In this battel were slain of Romans (by report) 40000, footmen, and 2700, horsemen: and in a manner, as many besides of Allies, as of natural Citizens. Amongst whom there was one Consul, two Treasurers, L. Atilius and Furius Bibaculus, 21, Colonels: some also who had been Consuls, Pretors, and Ediles. Of which number was Cn. Servilius, and C. Minutius Numatius, who the year before had been Commander of the Cavalry for some certain days. Besides 80, Senators, or such as were Senators fellows, and had born those dignities, in regard whereof, they were to be chosen Senators. These served as volunteers and were enrolled among the Legions. There were taken prisoners at this field, as the general speech went, 3000, footmen, and 300, men of Arms.

This is that noble battel, so famous for the overthrow at Canne, and comparable to that defeat at the river Alia. For like as this was of less importance then the other, in respect of that which ensued after the conflict, because the enemy stayed his hand, and pursued not his victory: so if we consider the loss of men and defeat of the army, it was the greater, and for the shameful flight more dishonorable. For the running away that was at Alia, as it betrayed the City, so it saved the Army: but at Canne, when the one Consul fled, there were scarce 50, of his army that accompanied him, and as for the other Consul, while he lay a bleeding and dying, all his forces to speak of, H took their heels.

Now there being a number in both camps, half disarmed, and wholly without their chief Commanders: the Captains of the greater Camp sent a messenger unto the other, willing them to come over thither, that they might march in one entire company together, and depart to Cannisum in the night season, whilst their enemies were fast asleep; as partly wearied with long fight and partly charged with wine & good cheer after their joyful victory. This advice, some there were that mistook altogether and rejected. For, why [say they] might not they come hither themselves to us, as well as send for us, since we may as soon go join together? Because, I wot, all the ways between are full of enemies, and they chose rather to hazard the bodies of others, then adventure their own persons in so great danger. Others were not so much displeased for any dislike of the motion, as their hearts failed them to take in hand the enterprise thereof. Then spake Py. Sempronius of us Tullianus a Colonel, & And will ye rather chose (quoth he) to be taken captive by a most covetous and cruelty enemy? And to have your heads valued at a price? And that Chapmen coming to buy you in open market, should ask every one of you this question, Whether art thou a Roman Citizen, or a Latin Confederate? And to thy disgrace, reproach, and misery, another man shall get honor, and thy self none. Ye are not [I see well] like to Lucius Emilius, who made choice to die valiantly, then to live in shame and obloquy; nor to many other he brave and hardy men, who lie about him dead on the ground by heaps. But before day light surprize us, and greater troops of enemies beset the passages, let us break through these, that in disorder and out of array, make to foul noise at our gates. The point of sword and edge of courage, is able to pass through enemies, and they never so thick and close together. We will make a pointed battailon in wedge-form, and pierce through their loofe and thin squadrons, as easily as if nothing stood in our way. Go with me therefore as many of you, as are willing to save your selves and the Common-weal. The word was no sooner out of his way through the midst of the enemies: and when the Numidians flanked them, and forth hard at their right side that lay open to them, they shifted their targets to their right arm, and so escaped to the number of 600. unto the bigger camp, and forthwith from thence, joining to the other greater company, they retired themselves safe to Cannisum. These exploits were performed by men vanquished, more upon a present fit of courage, as each mans natural instinct guided, or chance led him, then either any sage advice of their own, or command of other.

Now when all the rest came about Anniball, immediately upon this noble victory, to congratulate and rejoice with him, yea, and to advise him, that after to great a battel performed, he should the rest of that day, and the whole night following, both reitell himself, and also give reit and repose to his wearied souldiers: Mahabarb, General of the Cavalry, was of mind that it was no giving over thus: Nay (quoth he) that you may know of what consequence this battell is, you shall break yourfast and eat your dinner five days hence in the Capitol. Follow hardly with your horsemen, that they may fee you are come, before they hear that you are coming. No, saith Anniball again, let couriers on Gods name go alore, and spare not to carry news thereof: Your words are good, M and it is a gay matter and plausible you speak of: but the way thereto is longer, and more then I I can presently conceive and comprehend: give you thanks Mahabarb, and I commend your good mind and forwardness: but we had need to deliberate and pause further upon this point. Ah (quoth Mahabarb) true it is, I see well, that God hath not endued one man with all gifts. Thou halt the way O Anniball, to win a victory, but not the grace to use a victory. And surely, in this one dayes play as it was certainly believed, flood the sack and preservation of the City & Empire of Rome. The morrow after, so soon as ever the day began to appear, they minded only and intended the gathering of spoils, and to view that great butchery and slaughter: a pitifull and lamentable sight even to the very enemies to behold. So many thousand Romans lay there along in every place, horsemen and footmen pell mell, one with another, according as their hap was to meet together, N and either to join in fight, or die in flight. Some were seen to arise up all bloody from out of the midst of the slaughtered bodies, such as the bitter morning cold had nipped their wounds, and made them to start up by reason of their smart, and were by the enemy knocked down again and killed. Other some they found lying along still alive, cut shorter by the thighs & hams, who offered their bare necks & throats to be cut & ca'd upon them to let forth the rest of their blood. Divers were found with their heads covered within the earth, who as it appeared, had made themselves holes & gutters in the ground for this purpose, to inter themselves: whereinto they thrust their mouths & faces, & being buried with mould cast over them, were so stifled & choked. But above all the rest, there was one that drew every mans eye upon him & made them all to wonder: a Nu-midian with his nose and ears piteously mangled & cropt, but yet alive, lying under a Roman dead. O For when his hands so wounded as they were, would not serve him to handle a weapon for very anger he fel mad & lay (so long as he had any breath within him) biting his enemy with his teeth, and gnawing at his privities.

Aguiball marched forward to

After they had spent a good part of the day in gathering spoils, Amibul marched forward to aid the lesser camp and first and foremost he turned aside the arm of the river that flanked them, and so excluded them from the water. But they all within being over-wearied with toil, with watching and bleeding of their wounds, yielded sooner than he looked for: and, covenanted, Imprimis, to deliver up their armor and horses: Item, to pay 300. Quadrante pieces

A pieces of silver, for every Roman: 200. for every one of the Allies: and every bondman 100 a piece. Item, that after this ransom paid, they should depart in their single apparel. Thus they received their enemies into the camp, and were themselves put all in ward: but, Allies and Citizens by themselves, apart one from the other. While they trifled time there, there were about 4000. footmen, and 200 horsemen, even as many as either their strength or hearts would serve, who out of the greater camp fled to Casertum, some marching in order, others scattering abroad over the fields, which was not the work way of the twain, and leis'le safe. And then the camp was surrendered to the enemy, by those that were hurt and heartless, upon the same conditions that the other was. A rich booty was there gotten: and letting aside horses and men, and silver, which they used much in trappings and caparisons of their horses, (for soldiers, by ye sure, occupied very little silver, either in their own apparel, or at their board) all the pillage was given to be rifled and ransacked amongst them. Then he gave commandment that the dead bodies of his own men should be gathered together to be buried. And as men lay, they were to the number of eight thousand, all right valiant and hardy men. Some Authors report, that the Roman Consul also was fought up and interred. As for those, which elapsed to Casertum, were by the Cannins entertained only within the walls, and lodged in their houses: but a noble Lady and a wealthy, named Bysa, relieved them with some victual, apparel, &ye, and money all in their purses for their journey. In regard of which bountiful liberality of hers, after the war was finished, she was highly honored by the Senat. of Rome.

C Now, there were amongst them four Colonels, namely, Fabius Max, of the first Legion, whose father had been Dictator the year before; and L. Publicus Bibulus, of the second Legion, together with P. Corneli Scipio, and Appius Claudius Pulcher of the third Legion who had been Edictor before; and by general consent of them all, P. Scipio, a very young man, and App. Lucidus were choicest to bear the sovereign rule, and to have the absolute command and conduct of the army. But as they act with some few others, in council together about the managing of their main affairs, behold P. Furio Philus, whose father had been a Consul, gave them to understand, that all their consultations were in vain, and that they did but foster and cherish a foolish hope of an overthrow late: for the Common-weal was in a desperate case, pall all cure, and remedies. Also that certain noble young Gentlemen, of whom L. Cestius Metellus was the principal, minded nothing else but to take sea, and were ready to embark, to abandon Italy, and to fly for succor to some King or other. This evil tidings as it was most grievous and heavy in it self: to falling out as it did, presently upon other misfortunes so suddenly and unlooked for, put them into their dumps, and wonderfully amazed and astounded them all. And when they that were present in place laid their heads together, and thought good to call others to council upon this point, Scipio a young man, even then predestined to be the fatal Captain of this war, answered: What do we here? (quoth he) it is no time now to sit consulting in to great extremity, but leaving all did, offices, presently proceed to action, and to do some exploit. As many therefore as are willing to save the Common-weal, take arms and go with me forthwith: for no where are our enemies (to say a truth) encamped against us more, then where such designments are plotting and contriving.

E Forth he went with a few following after him, unto the lodging of Metellus: and finding there the young Gentlemen aforeaid, close together in council therelabout: he drew his sword, and brandish it naked over their heads, as they sat in consultation. "I swear before you all (quoth he) "and I swear from my very heart; and no man urgeth me thereto, that I for my part will neither forsake the Common-weal, nor suffer any Citizen else of Rome to abandon her. And if I fail writing and willing, then confound me O Jup. Opr. Max. And bring a most shameful end upon my honour, my family, and all that I have, Swear thou O L. Cestius after me, as I have done. I add: "vile thee: and ye all that here are present take the same oath: for whoever shall refuse, know he assuredly, that upon him I have drawn this sword. Hereat they being no less terrified, then if they had seen the Conqueror himself Anibal in person, took the oath every one, and yielded themselves unto Scipio, forth to be kept in ward to serve against Anibal.

At the same time, whilst the things were working at Cannifum, there arrived at Venusia upon four thousand foot and horsemen together, such as in their flight had been separated under all over the fields. and repaired unto the Conful there. The Venusins took order for the all, that they should be gently entertained, and carefully tended, and divided into several hostes; and they bestowed upon the horsemen, a hide caskock, a coat, and 25. Quadrantes a peece: and gave ten Quadrantes to every footman: and armor besides, to as many as wanted. And in all other courtesies of hospitality, both publick and private, they strove and endeavoured that the people of Venusia should not in any kind of friendly offices, come behind one woman of Cannifum. Howbeit in regard of the great multitude, the burden and charge lay more heavy upon dame Bustaforn than their number was fitten to be ten thousand. Then Appius and Scipio having intelligence that the other Conful was alive and well, dispatched a messenger presently to advertise him how many footmen and horsemen there were in all with them: and to know his pleasure wthal whether he would command the army to be brought unto Pennisia, or abide still at Cannifum. But Varro (the Conful) of his own accord brought his forces to Cannifum. So as by this time, they made a pretty good shew of a Confular army, and seemed sufficient to defend themselves, if not by force of arms in the field, yet at leastwile, with the strength of walls within the towne. But the newes came to Rome; that there was not so much as this small remnant left of Citizens and Supported with less courage, and valour of mind, M. Pomponius the Pretors, assembled the Senat in the Court, to proceed, P. Furius Philus, and M. Pomponius the Pretors, assembled the Senat in the Court Hofia, to for consult about the defence and guard of the City; for they made no doubt, but now that the armies were both defeated the enemy would speedily come to assault Rome, but only piece of work, and warlike service that remained behind undone. But being to seek what counsel to take, and what remedy to devise for the relief of these calamities, to exceeding great and grievous, and yet not known to the full, and interrupted and shrewly troubled besides with the clamorous noises and plaints of women: whilst that in every house almost, they cried not to mourn, weep, and wail loudly, as well for the quick as the dead (because as yet it was not compely and for certain known who were alive, and who were slain.) Then Fabius Max gave his opinion, that certain light horsemen should be made out and sent forth by the highways: Asi-nius and Latina, and to ride along and enquire of them whom they had met to combat with, first L mean as fled, and were scattered here and there abroad; if happily from them they could report upon his knowledge, what was become of the Consuls, and the armies: and in case the immortal gods had of their mercy and compassion: some poor remnant still of this miserable and woful Empire, for the Roman name: where that residue of small forces was: what way As-inus took; and whether he was gone after the battle was fought: what preparation he maketh, what presently he is doing, or intendeth for to do. His advice was, I say, that to efly, hearken and learn certainly, these premises, certain lusty young men, active and industrious, should be employed. But for the L.L. of the Senat thus much, that considering there were few Magistrates at home, and those not able to rid the City of this tumultuous and fearful hubbub, therefore M they should take upon themselves, to debar the dames and women for coming abroad, and force them every one to keep home, and tarry within doors: to take order that all Possessors of households and families: to cause silence throughout the City; and that every man should attend at home the tidings, good or bad, that concerned himself, or his own state. Over and besides, that they should let wardens at the gates, to see that no person went out of the Cityard to compel every man to hope for no other safety for themselves, but in the preservation of the City, and walls thereof. And when the tumult and hurry is once hushed, then (quoth he) may the senators well be called again to the Council-House, and consult for the defence and safeguard of the City. When all the assembly liked well, and approved of this opinion, and went N every man on Fabius his side without contradiction, so as the market place, by authority of the Magistrates, was cleared and voided of the multitude, and the Senators returned to the Councill-house, to appease the uproars: then at last, came letters from Tarentum the Consul, importing, that L. Aemilius the Consul was slain together with the army: that himself was a shipwreck upon the sea; and there were ten thousand soldiers of them, or very near, and the whole count of frame and good order. As for Annibal, he lay still now at Cauca, busily occupied about the ransoming of prisoners, and intensive to the rest of the spoil and pilage: not measuring the victory with the mind and courage of a conqueror, nor yet after the guile and manner of a subtle warrior and great commander. Then were the private and particular losses also divulged: the spread abroad through every man his household, and family, and the whole City was so filled with sorrow and lamentation, that the Anniversary solemnity of sacrifices to Ceres was forelet, because it was not lawful for those that mourned to celebrate the same: and there was not a matron throughout the City, but was in heaviness and sorrow for the loss. Left therefore other sacrifices likewise, as well public as private, upon the same occasion, should be neglected and discontinued, there passed an Act of the Senat, by virtue whereof a term was prefixed, to make an end of mourning within thirty days. Now was the trouble of the City no sooner allayed, and the Senators called again into the Council-house.

A into the Council-House: but to mend the matter, there were other letters brought out of Sicily from T. Othacilius the Vice-pretor, notifying thus much: That the realm of Hiero was much wa-
 A sted by the Cathaginian navy: and when he would have succoured him at his earnest suit and pe-tion, there was another Armado ready rigged, decked and furnished, riding by the Islands Aegaeres, waiting the opportunity of the time, that when the Cathaginians perceived one that he had turned and bent his forces to the defence of the coast and river Syracus, they might immediately set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman province. And therefore in case they were minded to aid and maintain a confederate King, and defend the Realm of Sicily, they must of necessity rig and man another fleet out of hand. When the letters both of the Consul and also of the Vice-Pre-B tor were read, agreed it was, and thought meet, that M. C. Claudius, Admiral of the fleet which rid in the harbour of Ofis, should be sent unto the army at Cannifum, and letters be dispatched withal unto the Consul, willing him upon the delivery of the army unto the Pretor, to repair unto Rome with all speed possible, and not fail, for far forth as he might, without any detriment and hindrance of the Common-weal. Besides these to great losses and adversities, men were put in fear with sundry prodigious tokens: and among others, in that one year, two Veital Virgins, Opimius, and Florinus, were detected and attained of manifest whoredom: the one of them was buried quick, as the manner was, under the ground at the gate Colina, the other killed herself, L. Cantitius (a Secretary or Scribe unto the Bishops, whom now they call * Minoris Pontificis) thepatry who had committed fornication with Florinus, was by the chief or high Priest to beaten with rods C in the Comitium, that he died under his hand. This heinous fact, and enormous offence falling out among so many misfortunes and calamities, was reckoned, I say, (as usually it is) for a portentous sign: and therefore the Decemvirs were commanded to search and peruse the Books of Si-bylla, And Q. Fabius Pittor was sent to Delphos, to consult with the Oracle there of Apollo, and to learn, by what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods, and what would be the end of so great and fearful miseries. In the mean while, out of the learning contained in those books of definitions, there were performed certain extraordinary Sacrifices among which, a Frenchman together with a French woman; likewise a Grecian man and woman, were let down alive D in the beast market into a vault under the ground (stoned all about: a place aforesaid embred and polluted with the blood of mankind sacrificed, but not according to the ceremonies and religion of the Romans. When they had sufficiently (as they thought) pacified the gods, M. Claudius Marcellus (sent from the haven of Ofis for the defence and guard of the City, 1500. soldiers; whom he had levied and enrolled for the service at sea, himself having lent afore the legion belonging to the Armado (which was the third) with Theon a Sidicinus a Colonel, and delivered the fleet unto P. Varinus companion with him in commission: within few days after made haste, and with great joyousness arrived at Cannifum, At Rome, by virtue of the Authority of the Senators *M.
 Junius* was created Dictator, and T. Sempronius General of the horie, who proclaimed a muster, and enrolled all the younger foot above 17. years old, young, and some also under that age that were in their * Prætexta, and were not come to * Toga virilis. Of these were made up four legions full, and a thousand horsemen. Likewise they sent unto their Allies, and namely to the Latine na-E tion, to receive souldiers from thence according to the form of the league: giving commandment, that harness, weapons, and all other habiliments of war, should be in readines, Also to furnish out the army, they plucked from the Temples, and public k Galleries and walking Places, the ancient spoils and armor of their enemies. And for very need and want of free men, they were compelled to devise a new kind of mustering never used before: for they bought up in open market with the City moneys, 8000. luty strong young men, meer bond-slaves: but they demanded first of every one by himself, whether they were willing to serve in the wars, and so they put them in armor, And they thought it better to take up and levy souldiers thus, then to redeem and buy again their own who were captives, albeit they might have been ransomed for smaller sums of money: For Annibal, after this so fortunate field fought at Cannæ, letting his mind wholly upon the affairs belonging to an absolute conquest, rather then any more wars: caused his captives to be brought forth, and fevored the Roman confederates apart from the rest: and unto them (as he had done aforesaid at Trebis, and the Lake Thrinymenus) he spake graciously, and sent them home untaken. The Romans also he called unto him, and gave them kind and loving words, more then ever he had done before, "What? we and the Romans (quoth he) war not mortally and deadly one with the other to the utmost: nay, our quarrel is rather for honour and sovereignty. And as my father and progenitors afore me, were subdued of the Romans, and "yeed did at length to their valor and prowess: so the only thing that I seek for, and indeed, or unto
 "is this, That they likewise in their alternative turn, may give place unto my felicity and vertue "together. And therefore I grant the Romans this favor and liberty, to redeem their prisoners:
 "and this shall be the ransom, for every man of arms I demand 500 Quadrants, 300 for a foot"man, and 100, for a bondman. And albeit the horsemen ransom was somewhat inhand: ad-above that sum which they capitulated for, when they yielded, yet glad they were to accept of any condition and covenant whatsoever. So it was agreed, that ten out of them should be chosen by voices, to go to Rome unto the Senat: and he took no other pledge for assurance of them but their oath, that they would return again. With them was sent Carthalo, a Noble man of Carthage with commission (if he could perceive haply the Romans encline to peace) to offer unto them conditions, and to capitulate with them. They were not so soon gone out of the camp, but one of them (a man of no Roman nature and disposition) made semblance, as if he had forgotten it somewhat behind him, and so to discharge himself (forth) of his oath, returned into the camp, and before night overtook his company again. When word was brought, that they were coming to Rome, there was a Lictor sent out to meet Carthalo upon the way, and to warn him in the name of the Dictator, before night to depart out of the confines of the territory of Rome. But the Committees of the Captives had audience granted them in the Senat-house by the Dictator. And the principal man among them, Marcus Junius, spake in this manner.

The Oration
of M. Junius to the Senat.

"Right honourable, and my very good LL. of the Senat, There is not one of you all ignorant, that never any City whatsoever, hath been at less charge for redeeming of prisoners taken in wars, and made so small regard of them, then ours. But if we be not blinded in our own conceits, and think better of our cause, then there is reason: never were there any soldiers that fell into the hands of our enemies, more to be accounted of by you then we are. And why? We yielded not our weapons in battell for cowardize and fear, but after that we had stood well near unto the night fighting over the dead bodies of our fellows slain, and so maintained the fight to the very last, then we retired our selves into the camp. The rest of the day and night following, notwithstanding we were weary with travel, and faint of our hurts, yet we manfully defended our rampart. The morrow after, when we were beset and invested round about by the conquerors army, yea, and excluded from water: and saw no other hope at all to break through our enemies, ranged so strong and close together, and thinking it not a matter of reproof, and against the law of arms, that when 50000. of our Citizens were slain in field, some Roman soldiers should remain alive after the battell of Cannæ: then and not afore, we agreed upon a sum of money, that being ransomed, we might be set at large, and so we yielded unto the enemies our weapons, wherein now we saw no help at all. We have heard likewise, that our ancestors deemed themselves from the Gauls with a sum of gold: and our fathers also, notwithstanding they were most straight laced, and hardly brought to capitulate and compound for peace, yet sent Embassadors to Tarentum, for to redeem their captives: and both those battells, first in Italy with the Gauls, and then before Heraclea with Pyrrhus, were not so ignominious and shameful for the losse it felt, as for the fright and heathly running away. But the plains of Cannæ are covered all over with heaps of Roman bodies: and we that be here, had not remained alive to kill them, but that the enemies strength held out no longer, nor their sword would serve to kill any more. And yet there be some of our men also who fled not back in battell: but being left behind to guard the camp, were taken prisoners by the enemy as well as we, at what time as it was surrendered into their hands. Certainly, I envy not the fortune, nor repine at the welfare and good estate of any Citizen or fellow soldier, neither would I be thought the man, who by deceiving another, would seem to advance my self. But even they verily (unless peradventure good footmanhip and swift running deserve reward) who for the most part fled out of the field unarmed, and never (tinted before, they gat Venusia or Casuntum over their heads, cannot justly praise themselves before us, nor boast and glory, that they stand the Common-weal in better stead, then we. Find them you shall (I doubt not) good men and valorous soldiers: so shall you us, too, yea, and more ready to do true service to our country, in that by your bounty and good means we have been ransomed and restored again into our country. Ye have levied soldiers of all ages and degrees, and I hear say, there be 8000. bondmen in arms. We are no fewer in number our selves, and redeemed we may be with as small moneys as they are bought. I say no more but so, for if I should make farther comparisons between us and them, I must do wrong to the Roman name and nation. This is a special thing moreover (my LL.) which in mine advice ye are due to consider in this deliberation, in case ye be so hard-hearted, as to have no regard of us, or of our defense, namely, in what enemies hand ye leave us. It is with Pyrrhus peradventure, who used us being his prisoners, like friends and guests. Nay, is he not a Barbarian and Carthaginian? who whether he be more covetous or cruel, can hardly be imagined. O that yeflaw the irons and chains, the nasty filthines and foul usage of your Citizens. I am assured, you would be no less moved and affected to compassion at the sight thereof, then if ye beheld on the other side your Legions lying slain all over the plains and fields of Cannæ. Ye may observe and behold the sorrowful cheer, and salt tears of our kinsfolk standing here in the porch and entry of this Court, and waiting for your answer. And if they so fare, and are so pensive for us, and for them that are absent, what heavy hearts have they themselves (think ye) whose liberty and whole life lieth now a bleeding? And in good faith, if so be Annibal himself would, contrary to his nature, be respective and merciful to us, yet should we think our lives did us small good, so long as we are reputed of you unworthy to be ransomed and redeemed. There returned in times past to Rome certain captives, sent home by Pyrrhus without any ransom paid, but the returned accompanied with Embassadors, right honorable personages of this City, who had been sent for their redemption. And shall I return unto my country again not esteemed a Citizen worth 300. Deniers. Every man hath a mind by himself, and a fanie of his own my LL. And I woe well, that my body and life is in jeopardy. But I fear more the hazard of honor and good name, lest we should be thought condemned and rejected by you. For the world will never believe, that you did it to spare your purse, and to save money.

When he had made an end of his speech, immediately the multitude who were gathered together in the common place, set up a lamentable and piteous cry, and held out their hands unto the Council.

A Council-house, beseeching the LL. of the Senat to let them have and enjoy their children, their brethren, and kinsfolk again. The very women also, for fear and necessity, thrust themselves among this prels of men in the market place. But when all others besides the Senators were voided, they began to debate and consult about the matter in hand. Great variance there was in opinion. Some thought it reason, that their ransom were disbursed out of the common chest: others were of mind, that the City should be at no charge at all for their redemption: many they would not be against it, but that they might be enlarged and delivered at their own cost and expenses. And in case there were any that had not ready coin enough for present payment, the chamber of the City should lend them money, so as the people might have good security, as well by surties bound, as by their good and lands, mortgaged for the satisfaction of that debt. And when T. Manlius Torquatus, a man of the old world for precise severity, and as most folk thought too too hard and austere in this point, was demanded his opinion, he spake, by report, to the cause in this wise.

The Oration
of T. Manlius Torquatus in
the Senat.

"If the Committees (quoth he) had treated and made suit, for the redemption of them only that are captive in the hands of the enemies, and there (saide) it they had not reckoned the person of any other besides, I would in few words have knit up my verdict and judgement of them. For what need I to have done else, but put you in mind, and exhort you, to observe the custom delivered unto you from your ancestors, and to maintain the same, so good and necessary for the service of war. But now, seeing they have not only justified, but also (as it were) glorified themselves, in that they yielded unto the enemies, and thought it good reason to be preferred. Not only before them that were taken prisoners by the enemies in the field, but also those that saved themselves, and escaped to Venusia and Casuntum; yea, and before C. Terentius himself the Consul; I will not hide any thing from you my LL, but a quaintom with every thing that was done there. And would to God, that the words which I will utter here in your presence, I might deliver at Casuntum, even before the body of the army, the best witnesses of every mans cowardise or valour: or at leastwise, that P. Sempronius were present here alone whom, if the fellows would have followed as their leader, they had been soldiers at this day in the Roman camp, and not captives at the devotion of the enemies. For whilst the enemies were wearied with fight, joyous and jocund of their fresh victory, and most of them retired into their own camp, they might have had the whole night to save themselves at their pleasure: and if that were not, yet being even thousand strong, they had been able to have made a lane through them, were they never so thick, and to have broken away in despite of their hearts. But nevertheless tempted they so much of themselves, nor yet would follow the leading of another, P. Sempronius Tuditanus ceased not all night long almost, to exhort, to admonish, and encourage them, for to follow his conduct, to take the time when but a few of their enemies were about their camp, whiles they were at repose and rest, and whiles the night lasted favourable unto them, for to hide and cover their enterprise: perfwading with them, that before day light they might easily reach unto places of security, and arrive safely at the Cities of their Allies. Like as in the days of our Grandfathers, P. Decius a Tribun Colonel in Saguntum; like as of late time when I was a young man my self, in the first punick war, Calpurnius Flamma laid unto three hundred his voluntary soldiers, at what time as he minded to lead them to the gaining of a little Hill, flanking in the midst of his enemies: Let us die hardly my soldiers, and by our death save and deliver our Legions, beset and besieged round about. If P. Sempronius had said so much to you, he would never have esteemed you men of valour nor yet Romans, if no man among you would have born him company, or seconded him in that singular virtue. But he shewed you a plain and easy way, leading as well to life and safety, as to honour and glory. He offered himself to be your guide, to bring you to your native country: to your parents, your wives and children: yet would not your hearts serve you to escape and save your selves. Where had your hearts been then, if he would have had you to die for your country? 50000. of our Citizens and Confederates, lay that very day slain at your feet. If so many examples of manhood and virtue could not move you, nothing in the world will ever move you: it is to great a foil and overthrow was not able to make you despise and set little by this life: none will ever do it, Desire home a Gods name, and long after your native country, whiles ye are free and in safety: nay, desire to be in your country, whiles it is your country, and whiles ye are Citizens thereof. Now your desire and longing cometh too late, being disfranchised, having lost your former estate and right of Citizens, and made your selves bondslaves to the Carthaginians. Think ye for a peece of money to recover your liberty again, and to return to your former degree, from which I through faint heartedness and cowardize ye are fallen? You would not hearken nor give ear to P. Sempronius your Citizen, willing you to take weapon in hand and to follow after him: but anon after ye could listen after Annibal, commanding you to betray and render the camp, and deliver up your armor. But why blame I their littleness and dastardly fears: when I may reprove and accule them for willful and lewd wickedness: For they not only refused to be ruled by his good counsel and exhortations, but also attempted to hinder and lay him in his intended enterprise, had not right hardy and valiant men with their swords drawn, set these dastardly beasts farther off. P. Sempronius, I tell you, had somewhat ado, to pass the ranks and squadrons of his own countrymen before he could break through the battalion of his enemies. Lengthen our country to have these far her Citizens? who if the rest had been like them, should by this day, have had never.

a one of them that fought at Canna, for her Citizens. Of seven thousand armed souldiers, there were found 600 that had the heart to break away, maugre the enemies, to escape and return with liberty, and with their armor, home into their country, notwithstanding there were forty thousand enemies to resist them: how easily then and safely, deem you, might a power almost of two Legions, have passed through them and gone their ways? Ye had had this day my Lords twenty thousand at Canninum, of right brave hardy, and loyal souldiers. But now which way can they covards possibly be reputed true and faithful Citizens? (for valiant souldiers,) am I sure, they will not think themselves, nor take up on them to be, unless a man could be persuaded and beleaved they were such) who would have impeached and withheld the rest for getting away, even when they were at the point to open a passage; or that they rather do not envy now, both the safety and also the honor of others which they have won by prowess: knowing in their own confidence, that their timoroutness and cowardlinesse was the cause of most ignominious and shameful servitude. They loved better to cloie within their pavilions, and to look for the day light and the enemy together: whereas in the still dead time of the night, they had the opportunity to escape. But how then? Although their hearts failed them to break away out of the camp, yet to defend the same manfully, they had courage and valor enough. Besieged they were, straitly beleaguered: invested they were day and night for a good timecend in their armor forced to stand upon their guard, and manfully they quit themselves within their ramparts, at length (God wot) when they had assayed and endured all extremities, when all succors failed them for sustenance of this life: so pinched with hunger and so enfeebled, that they were not able to bear their own armor and lift up their weapons; overcome at the last, rather with the necessity of mans frail nature, then by the violence of the enemies, they, good men, gave over and yielded themselves. Nay forsooth, it is neither so nor so. The morrow morning when the sun aroode, the enemies advanced and approached toward the rampart: and within two hours after, without any trial and hazard of skirmish, they delivered up their weapons and themselves. Thus ye see what their good service was, for two days together. When they should have stood to it in field, and fought, then they fled back to their tents: when they were to guard and defend their trench and rampart, they surrendered them to the enemy: good no where, neither in battell nor in battell. I agree to ransom you, you (I say) when you ought to have sallied forth of the camp, to linger behind and stay still: and when need was, to abide by it and to defend it like valiant men, surrender camp, give up your weapons, and yield your own bodies to the enemy? Nay, but to speak what I think, my sentence is (my LL.) that these fellows deserve no more to be ransomed, then those to be delivered unto Annibal, who lifted out of the camp, pierced through the midst of the enemies, and most valiantly saved themselves, for to do service another day in their country. When Manlius had said, albeit the precedent of the City it self, which never from the first beginning favoured the redemption of such souldiers, as suffered themselves to be taken prisoners: the ransom it self, which amounted to a good round sum made them to pause: because they were unwilling both to empty the publick treasury: (having already disbursed great sums, in buying up bond-slaves, and arming them for the wars) and also that Annibal (who as the voice went, was at a very great stand for money) should be enriched thereby. When this their answer was returned, M to wit, No redemption of captives: there was a new fit of weeping and wailing afresh added to the former sorrow of the people, namely for the loss of so many Citizens; and so with many a tear that they shed, with sundry plaints and moans which they made, they accompanied the Committees above said, as far as the gate. One of the ten went home to his house the same time, who upon a fraudulent and cautelous return made into the enemies camp, as is aforesaid, supposed he had acquit himself and disburdened his conscience of his oath. Which being known and recounted to the Senat, they were all of mind that he should be apprehended, and attended with a good and sufficient guard at the charge of the City, and so carried back to Annibal. There goeth another report of these Captives, that first there came ten of them as Committees: and when it was debated in the Senat, and doubt made, whether they should be admitted into the City or no; N they were at length received, but so, as that they had no audience in the Senat: and upon longer stay made then they looked for, three others followed after them, to wit, L. Scribonius, C. Calpurnius, and L. Manlius. Then by mediation of one Tribum of the Com, a kinsman of Scribonius, the matter was propounded in the Senat concerning the ransom of the captives: but granted it would not be: whereupon the three latter Committees returned to Annibal, and the other ten that first came, remained still behind: who upon a colourable occasion, had made an errand back to Annibal, when they were well onward on their way, to take a note, forsooth, of the names of the prisoners, and thereby seemed to have discharged their conscience of the oath. Also, that in the Senat there was hard hold, much question and variance, about the delivering of them again into the hands of Annibal: and how at last, they who were of opinion to have them rendered and sent back, failed of their purpose, by reason they came short by few voices and opinions, and that the other side carried it clean away. But by the next Censors that came in place, they were so marked and branded with all notes of disgrace and shame, that some of them immediately made themselves away with their own hands: and the rest forbore, not only the common place and market all their life time after, but also came not abroad, in manner, to be seen in the very street, and never looked out of their doors. Thus a man may rather marvel, that authors should so differ among themselves,

A selves, than from any of them pick out and discern the truth. But how much greater this overthrow and loss at Canna was, than any other before time, appeareth by this evident argument, in that those Allies, which ever to that day stood fast and iure unto them, now fell to shrink and fail: and surely for no earthly thing else, but because they began to despair of the main chance of the whole State and Empire. For hereupon there revolted unto the Carthaginians, the Attelians, the Calatins, the Hirpines, a part of the Apulians, all the Samnites, except the Petellians all the Brutii in general, and the Lucans. And more then these, the Surrentins, and the whole tract well-neer, of the Greeks along the sea coast, The Tarentins, Metapontins, the Crotonians, the Locrians, and all the Gauls within the Alps. And yet for all these defeats, and rebellions of their Allies B and Subjects, were not the Romans one whit inclined to make any mention of peace, neither before the coming of the Consul, nor yet after that he was returned, and renewed again the dolorous remembrance of that wofull overthrow received. And even at that very instant, so high minded was the City, and so far from drooping and being cast down, that as the Consul returned homeward from so great a defeat, whereof himself only was a principal cause, he was not only met upon the way by all the States and companies of the City in great numbers, but also highly thanked, in that he despaired not of the State of the Common-weal: who, if he had been the General and Leader of the Carthaginians, should have been sure to have inoaked for it, and endured all extremity for torment and punishment.

T H E Campsienterred unto Annibal. Mago was sent to Carthage, with news of the victory at Canna: and in the entry of the Council-House, he poured out (on the floor) the golden rings which had been plucked from the fingers of the Romans there slain, which by report exceeded the measure of a Modius. Upon these tidings, Hanno, the noblest personage among all the Carthaginians, persuaded with the Senat of Carthage, to sue unto the people of Rome for peace, but he prevailed not, by reason of the Barchin side a fiction, that gain-said him. C. Marcellus the Pretor fought fortunately before Nola, in a battell which he made out of the town against Annibal. The Army of Annibal fell to riot at Capua, E and gave themselves to such sensuality, while they wintered there, that both in bodily strength, and also in courage of mind they became much enfeebled. Caesilius was besieged by the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants within were driven by extreme famine, to eat thongs and leatherings, plucked from off their shields and targets, yea, and to feed upon Mice and Rats. They lived with Nuts which the Romans sent unto them down the river Vulturnus. The body of the Senat was replenished by receiving unto them a new supply from out of the order of Knights or Gentlemen, the number of 197. L. Posthumus the Pretor, was together with his army defeated by the Gauls, and put to the sword. Cneus and Publius Scipiones, vanquished Adrubal in Spain, and had the conquest thereof. The remnant of the army defeated at Canna was sent away and confined into Sicily, and commanded not to depart from thence, before the war was fully finished. A league and society was concluded between Philip the King of the Macedonians and F Annibal, Sempronius Gracchus the Consul, discomfited and slew the Campsienter. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate exploits achieved by T. Manlius the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, against the Carthaginians and the Sardi: who took the General himself Adrubal, together with Mago and Hanno, prisoners. Claudius Marcellus the Pretor vanquished and defeated in a battell before Nola, the army of Annibal: and was the first that put the Romans in some good hope of better success, after they had been toiled out with so many foils and losses.

The three and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

A N Nibal after the battell fought at Canna, and the winning and ransacking of both the Roman camps, dislodged anon, and was removed out of Apulia into Samnium, being sent unto, for to come unto the Hirpines country, by Statius, who promised to betray and deliver the City of Consia into his hands. Now there was a Citizen of Consia named Trebbius, a noble personage and of great name in his country. But the bend and faction of the Cossines (a family of great power, by favour of the Romans) kept him down and over-weighed him: but after the fame of the battell of Canne and the coming of Annibal, divulged and blown abroad by H the speeches of Trebinus, those Coffens abandoned the City: and so was it without any conflict rendered unto the Carthaginians, and received a garrison. Annibal leaving behind him there, all the pillage and baggage that he had, divided his army into two parts: giving Mago in charge, to possess himself of the towns of that country, which would revolt of themselves from the Romans: or else to force them thereunto, in case they denied and refused to do. Himself took his journey through the land of Campanie, toward the nether sea, intending to assault Naples, that he might be Lord of a Port Town also, and have it at his devotion. When he was entered the confines of the Neapolitans, he placed some of the Numidians in Ambush, as cunningly as he could, (and there for the most part, the wayes are hollow, and full of close and secret nooks and holes) others he commanded to make a show of driving away a booty out of the fields, and to ride out braving before the gates of the City. Against whom (seeming to be not many, and those disordered) a troop of horsemen issued forth, but the enemies of purpose giving back and retiring from them, led and trained them on, to the place of ambush: and so they were environed on every side, and there had not one of them escaped alive, but that the sea was near, where they espied many fisher boats along the shore on the bank side; and as many of them as were skilful in swimming, gat unto them, and saved themselves: but in that shirinish nevertheless certain young gentlemen were slain. Among whom, Hegesias also, the Captain of that Corner of horsemen died in the place, who followed too hotly upon them that retreated & seemed to flee. But Annibal after he had viewed the walls, and saw they were not easie to be won, was discouraged and feared from giving assault to that City. From thence he turned his journey, and took his way to Capua, a City flowing in wealth and superfluity of all pleasures, by reason of long felicity, and the favourable aspect of gracious fortune. But among all corruptions that there reigned, it was infected most with the licentious looseness of the Commons, who exceeded beyond all measure, and abused their liberty. Pacuvius Calvius, a man of noble race there, and popular withal, but one that by lewd and indirect courtes became rich and mighty, by means thereof, had both Senat & Com. under his girdle, and might do what he would. This man changed to be head Magistrate the same year that the Romans were defeated and overthrown at the Lake Thrasymenus: and supposing that the Commonalty (who had been a long time maliciously affected to the Senat and Nobility) would by occasion of alteration in the State, enterprise some notable act to wit, (in case Annibal should come with his victorious army into those parts) the murdering of the Senat, and delivering of Capua into the Carthaginians hands. This man I say, lewd and bad enough otherwise, but yet not stark naught and wicked in the highest degree: desirous to lord it, and domineer with the safety of the Common-wealth, rather then with the utter destruction of the same: as knowing full well, that no State could remain safe, spoiled and bereft once of a publick counsel: cast about and plotted, how he might both save the Senat, and also oblige the same to be at his and the Commons devotion. He assembled therefore the Senat one day together, and after he had protested with a solemn preamble, "That in no case he would kill & allow of the defigment and intent of revolting from the Romans, unless it were upon necessity and constraint: for as much as himself had married the daughter of Appius Claudius, and had fair issue by her: and besides, affianced a daughter of his own in marriage unto Livius in Rome: but yet (quoth he) there is a matter of greater consequence toward, and a danger like to burst out more to be feared then that. For the Commons intend not by way of revolt and rebellion to rid the City of the Senators authority, but are purposed to massacre all the Senators, and so to deliver unto Annibal and the Carthaginians, the Common wealth, clearly void of a Senat. Of which imminent peril (quoth he) know how to free you, in case you will wholly trust and rely upon me, and forget all former jars, and old debates, which have fallen out in governance and managing of the Senat. Now when all of them in place, for fear were forced to put themselves into his hands: I will, quoth he (thrust you up within the Council-Chamber, and pretend unto them, as though I were one of their complices, both privy and party to this intended practise of theirs: and so by soothing them up, under a colourable approbation and allowance of their designments, which I should in vain cross and gain-say, I shall find out a ready way to save all your lives. And for assurance hereof, ask and have of me what bond and security ye will your selves. Thus having made his faithful promise to be fast and true unto them, he went forth, and commanded the Council-House doores to be shut sure, and left warders to keep the gate and entry thereof, that no man without his license and commandment, should either enter in, or come forth. Then after he had called all the people together to an audience, in a solemn and frequent assembly, thus he spake unto them. "That which ye have often wished for (O ye Campanians, my good neighbors and friends) namely, to have the power and mean to revenge your selves thoroughly of this wicked and cursed Senat, now lieth in your hands to perform with safety at your pleasure. And ye need not by way of an uproar to assault their houses one after another, to the great danger and hazard of your persons, considering how they are defended with strong guards of their vassals, favorites, and bond-slaves: ye have them all fast and close mued up within the Council-Chamber: themselves alone, without company, without armor and weapon: there you may take them. But see that ye do nothing hastily upon head without pause, nor rashly without advisement. I will lo compais and bring about, that ye shall give your doom of life and death upon every one of them, to the end that each one may have his desert, and suffer due punishment accordingly. But

of Pacuvius Calvius to the Commons of Capua.

A "But above all things ye must have an eye and look to this, that ye proceed not too much in heat and choler: but that ye have more regard of your own safety and profit, than of ire and revenge. For (I take it) they be these Senators only whose persons ye hate and detest: and your meaning is not wholly to put down and overthrow the Senat quite: for either ye must accept of a Kings (O government abominable) or else admit a Senat, the only Council indeed of a free City and State: and therefore with one blush (as they say) ye are to go flop two gassands to do both at once, namely, to abolish and depose the old Senat, and to elect a new, I will command, that the Senators shall be sited by name one after another: and concerning their life and death, I will demand your opinion and resolute sentence: and look what judgement ye give, shall surely stand and be put in execution. But before the condemned guilty person be done to death, ye shall substitute in his room a new Senator, some good man of valour and courage, and worthy to succeed in his place. With that, he late him down. And after all their names were thrown in to a lottery pitcher and shuffled together, he called him to be cited and called aloud by name, and the man himself to be brought forth of the council-House whole name changed to be drawn out first. He was no sooner named, but every man cried out, that he was a lewd and wicked person, and worthy to be hanged. Then Pacuvius said, I see (quoth he) what destiny ye prefigure this man. Rejected he is, and cast out for naught and unjust: choole now a good Senator, and a righteous in his room. At the first, all was silent, and as still as midnight, for default of finding a better to place in his stead. Afterwards, when some odde groom pat all shame and reverence, seemed to nominate one: by and by they grew to much longer words, and greater clamor: while some that they knew not the man others laid to his charge sundry lewd and naughty sties, and objected against him either abject baseness, poverty and beggary, or else some dishonest kind of trade and occupation, whereby he lived. Thus sared they, and much wore a great deal, when a old or third Senator was named: so as it was well seen, that the men be thought themselves and repented of that they had done already, considering how they sated still and were to weck, when they should substitute another in his place: forasmuch as it booteth not, but was as hard to nominate the same again, since that their nomination gained them nothing but either to hear their vices decipered, or to bear reproachful terms: and as for all the rest, they were far more vile and obscure persons, than those that came first into their remembrance, and were loathly thought upon. D So, the people fell at length, and gently came down to this point, and confessed, that Much better was bad they knew, than bad they knew not: and Seldom came the better: while the old Senators to be let out of ward and enlarged. By this policy Pacuvius having bound the Senat to himself, more than to the Commons, and even as much as their life was worth: without force of arms ruled the rest, and was at his devotion and command. Hereupon the Senators laid aside the remembrance of their own dignity, port, and liberty, became affected to the Commons, and would salute them kindly: inviting them courteously, and entertaining them liberally at their boards, with exquisite and delicate fare: undertaking and maintaining all their futes and causes: ready at all times to assist them and stand by them: and in one word, compelling Juries (to go upon all causes and matters in law) of those whom they knew to be gracious and popular, and fitter to win and procure the favour and affection of the common sort. Thus at the Council-Table all matters were decided, as if the Commons had there sat, and not otherwise. E This Capua was a City ever given to dissolute life and excess in pleasure, as well by reason of the natural corruption and infer disposition of the Inhabitants, as also for the pteuous & flowing abundance of all delights, and the alluring inticements of all dainties, that either sea or land might afford. But at that time (such was the obsequious fawning and flattery of the Nobles which was the licentious living of the Commons) they were lo lavish, that they exceeded in lull and superfluity beyond measure, and laid it on in expence without stay. Besides their contempt of Laws, Magistrates, and Senat, they grew to this pals after the overthrow at Canne, that whereas before, they had some awe and reverend regard of the Romans now they detested and set naught by the government and Empire of Rome. And nothing else stood in the way, but that presently they would have rejected their rule, and shaken off the yoke of obedience and allegiance, saving only this, That by reason of ancient entercourse of loves and mutual marriages, many noble houses and mighty families were linked and allied to the Romans: and again, which was the greatest bond of all, whereas there had served in the Roman wars, certain of them: there were three hundred men of arms, and those of noblest birth of all the Campanians, chosen out of them and sent by the Romans to be reliant in sundry garisons of the Cities of Sicily: whose fathers and kinsfolk (with much ado) obtained, that Embassadors should be sent unto the Cathars of Rome. They found the Consul Penuia with a few souldiers and those armed by the halves (for as yet he was not gone to Capua) being in that poor taking and hard plight, as he could not be in worse: either to move pity in the hearts of true and well affected allies, or to breed contempt in proud and hollow-hearted friends, such as these Campanians were. Contemtable was their case. But the Consul, made himself and his condition more deplored, by bewraying too much his present distresses, and laying open to the world the nakedness of his calamity. For when the Embassadors delivered unto him, That the Senat and people of Capua took it to the heart, and greatly grieved at the adverse overthrow of the Romans, and promised therewith, to furnish him with all things fit and meet for war: "Ye have (quoth he) O Campanians observed an order and custom, and for form and fashion visited us your confederats, in willing us to require at your hands all supplies of war: rather

"rather than said any thing directly befitting the present estate of our fortune. For what have we "leaves at all, after this discomiture of Carthage, that we should be willing to have that supplied "by our allies which is wanting? As who would say, we had somewhat already. Should we de"mand of you footmen, as though we were furnished with horse? Should we say that we lack"ed money, as if money only were wanting, and nothing else? No, no, Fortune hath dealt "hardly with us, that she hath left us just nothing, nor so much as that, which might be made "up and supplied by others. Our Legions of footmen, our Cornets of horse, our armor and munition, "our Standards and Ensigns, horse and man, money and victuals, all is gone, lost, and perished;
 "either in the battell, or the morrow after in the ruin of our Camp, when we were turned "out of our tents and pavilions. And therefore ye are not, O Campans, to aid and help up in this "war: but in our behalf, and for us, ye ought to take the whole charge of the war upon your "own selves, against the Carthaginians. Call to remembrance how in time past, when your an"cestors and forefathers were fearfully driven to keep within your walls, standing in dread and "bodily fear, nor of the Samnites only your enemies, but also of the Sidicins: we took them into "our protection, and defended them before Satricula: and how for your sakes we began war "with the Samnites, and maintained the same for the space of an hundred years, and in great "variety of fortune, giving and taking sundry foils all the whiles. Over and besides, call to mind, "how we concluded an indifferent and equall league with you, to the disadvantage of neither
 "parts: how we granted unto you the liberty of living under our own laws: and how at the "last (a matter, I wot, of right great importance and consequence, before this our late over"throw at Canne) we granted unto a great part of you, the freedom and privilege of Burgei-"se, and parced with you the franchises of our own City. And therefore ye ought of right (my "Masters of Capua) to repute this loss and misfortune now received, to be as well yours as ours:
 "and to make re-soning to defend the common state and country of both. It is neither Samnite
 "nor Tuscans that we have to deal with, to whom, if we lost and parted with our Empire, yet it "remained still within the compass of Italy: but the enemy that pursueth us, is a Carthaginian,
 "drawing after him a train of souldiers, who are not so much as born in Affrick, but coming
 "from the farthest and most remote parts and bounds of the world, from as far as the streights
 "of the Ocean sea, even from Hercules his pillars: void of the knowledge of all law, right, and dif"ference of conditions, without reason and discretion, and (in manner) without commerce of "mans language. These souldiers so fierce and fell by nature, so cruell and merciless by use and cus-
 "tome, their captain hath withall made more wild and savage, by making bridges, cauleys, and "high-waies, over heaps of dead mens bodies: and (which I abhor to speak, by teaching them "to eat men flesh. To see and endure these men to be their LL, whom feeding as they do upon "such execrable meats and viands, which even to touch and handle without great horror we "may not: to relore for justice as far as into Affrick and Carthage, and to suffer Italy to be re"duced into a Province under the Numidians and Moors, what is he that would not detest and "abhor, were he but born only within Italy? A worthy honour and immortal glory it will be "for you, O ye Campans, if the Roman Empire and dominion, thus growing to ruin and falling "down prostrate under the weight of this late overthrow, might by your fidelity and forcible "power be staied and upheld. And set upright again, I suppose ye have levied and enrolled alrea"dy thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, out of Campans: for coin, for corn, ye have "store and plenty: Now if your faith and truth be answerable to your wealth and fortune, nei"ther shall Annibal find that he hath won the victory, nor the Romans feel that they have lost "a journey. With this Oration thus ended, the Consul gave the Embassadors their discharge, "and dismissed them. As they returned homeward, one of them, Sibius Virius by name, said
 "thus unto his fellows. "Now is the day come (quoth he) wherein the Campans may be able,
 "not only to recover again the lands which in times past the Romans have wrongfully taken "from them, but also obtain & enjoy the sovereign rule & Empire of Italy. As for Annibal, we "may conclude, covenant, and capitulate with him what articles and conditions we list our selves:
 "to our best behoof and benefit: And it is all to nothing, that Annibal, having now dispatched
 "and finished the war, will of his own accord depart like a Conquerour into Affrick, and with"draw his forces out of these parts: so as the dominion of Italy shall be left wholly to the peo"ple of Capua. Virius had no sooner delivered these speeches, but they all applauded him and "accorded thereto. And in such terms they related their Embassage, as all men thought no less "but the Roman Empire and name was utterly perished and extinct for ever. Incontinently the "Commons and the greatest part of the Nobility of Capua inclined to revolt and rebell: Yet
 "by the countenance and authority of the Ancients and Elders the matter was staied and deferred "for some few daies. At length, the greater part prevailed, whose opinion was, That the same "Embassadors which were sent to the Roman Consul, should be addressed in embassage unto Annibal.
 "But I find in some Annals, that there was an Embassage sent from the Capuans to the City of Rome, demanding "that they might have any help and aid from them, one of their Consuls might "be a Capuan. Whereat the Senat of Rome took such snuff and indignation, that the said Embassa-"dors were commanded to void the Council-House, and a Sergeant sent after them at their heels,
 "to set them out of the City: charging them at their perill, to take up their lodging that night "without the territories of Rome. But because this demand jumpeth too nearto the like that the

A Latines made long before: and both Calpis and other Historians have (not without good reason) passed it over and said nothing thereof, I dare not avow it for a truth. Well, Embassadors there came unto Annibal, and concluded peace with him under these conditions, and covenants: In- primis, That no General, Captain, or Magistrate of the Carthaginians should have any jurisdiction or power over a Citizen of Capua: Item, That no Citizen of Capua should be compelled against his will to serve in any wars, or execute the charge and office of a souldier. Item, That the Campans still enjoy their old Laws and Magistrates of their own: Item, That Annibal deliver unto the Campans three hundred Roman Captives (such as they themselves shall chooe): whom they might coule and exchange for these three hundred horsemen of the Campans that were in B garrison, and served for pay in Sicily. These were the Articles of the accord. But the Campans stuck not to do more than so, and to go farther than their capitulations: committing divers and sundry outrages. For the Commons suddenly at once apprehended all the Roman Captives over the confederate souldiers, yea, and attached other Citizens of Rome, that were either employed in any military charge, or otherwise occupied in their private affairs: and caused them to be clapt up within the stores and hot-houses, as in ward and late custody, where their breath being stifled and stopped up with exceeding heat, and flaming vapours, they were stifled, and died miserably.
 But there was one Decius Magnus, a man who wanted no means of sovereign authority, but only the sobriety, discretion, and wisdom of the Citizens: with whom he lived: who withstood all that ever he could (such enormous and audacious courtesies, and endeavoured to hinder the Em-C bassage sent to Annibal. And so soon as he heard that Annibal was sending a garrison, he recommended unto his fellow Citizens the proud and lordly rule of Pyrrhus, the miserable and wretched thraldom in the Tarentines as precedents sufficient to give them warning. He ceased not to cry aloud in open place and audience, first, that they should not receive the garrison into the City:
 then, that being admitted they should either be thrust out again: or rather if they would expire and make amends by some valiant and memorable act for that shamefull lend part of theirs, in revenging for from their most ancient Allies, yea, and kinsmen by blood, they should fill upon the Carthaginian garrison, and kill them every one and so reconcile themselves again to the Romans.
 D Annibal having intelligence of these plots (for they were not so forging, and contriving in a corner) sent first certain messengers to summon Magnus to repair unto his presence within his Camp.
 After that, seeing he stoutly denied to go, (for he pleaded that Annibal had no authority nor right to command a Citizen of Capua) he waxed wroth, and commanded the man to be apprehended, and to be haled perforce bound unto him. But fearing, upon better advice, lest by offering such violence some tumult might arise, and in the heat of blood break forth into an unconsiderate fury, he dispatched beforehand a messenger of purpose unto Marius Blunus, the Prae-tor of L, Governor of Capua: signifying, that the morrow next following he would be perio-nally in Capua: and so with a small guard about him, he set forth of his Camp, and put himself on his journey. Marius assembled the people together, making proclamation, and warning them to be ready in all frequent solemnity, with their wives and children, to meet Annibal upon the way. They of the adverse side unto Magnus and the Romans performed this not only E obediently, but also most effectually, and with great diligence and endeavour. Yea, the common sort likewise were very forward in this action, as desirous especially to see the great General and brave warrior, so noble and renowned for his many victories, Decius Magnus neither went forth to meet him, nor yet kept his house, because he would not seem to fear and carry a guilty conscience: but walked up and down idly for his pleasure in the Market place with one of his sons, and a few of his vassals and followers, whilst the whole City besides was busily occupied, and much troubled in the entertaining and beholding of this great Captain and Commander of the Carthaginians. Annibal, being entred the City, incontinently required to have audience in their Council-House. Whereupon, the Nobles and principal Citizens of Capua regarded him that he would not that day intend any weighty matters of importance, but himke it in perion sole-F nize it with joy and mirth, and ready to fall into fits of anger, yet because he would not seem at his first coming to deny them any thing, he employed a good part of that day in seeing and viewing the City. Entertained and lodged he was and his whole train with the Atians, Celians, Stewians, and Pacuvians, the most noble and honourable perimages, and the wealthiest of all others. Thibend and faction, which reduced the City to the obedience and devotion of Annibal, brought his ownson a young Gentleman, and said withall, that the youth kept continually with Deci- us, and that he was faine to pluck him away from his company and train, whose part he took, and luck most fitly to him, in maintaining the old society and unity of the Romans, against G the new League with the Carthaginians: and neither the bending and inclination of the whole City to the contrary side, nor yet the reverent majesty of a father, had yet driven him from his obstinate resolution. And for that time the father laboured with Annibal rather by way of prayer and intreaty, than by excoing and clearing his son, that he would not be discontented nor displeased with the young man. So he was over-come with the importunate request and plentiful reares of the father, and gave commandment, that he together with his father should be bidden to supper, at which feast he purposed to have the company of no other guests of all Capua, but only of his hostels that have him entertainment, and one Jubellius Tanceus.

a famous and brave warrior. To supper they went long before day-light went down, and fared at the table, not after the guise of Carthaginians nor according to the discipline of soldiers, but after the order of a City and house, which had been used a long time to have the board furnished with sundry sorts of dainty dishes, and with all delicate juckets to please the palate and taste. Perella only the son of Calpurnius, could not be brought to change his mind, and shew himself cheerful and merry at meat, notwithstanding the Matters of the feast, and Annibal himself otherwise in- vited him to bear them company, and sit with them; but he ever made his excuse to his father, that he was ill at ease and sickly whensoever he seemed to examine him, and to know the cause of such a wonderful trouble of mind, and vexation of spirit. So a little afore sun-setting, when his father arose, and was gone out from supper, he followed hard after him: and when they were come into a secret place apart, a garden it was on the back side of the house, how he shall not only obtain pardon at the Ro- mans hands for our treasurs committed, in falling away from them, and turning to Annibal: but also how we Campanians may be in far greater estimation and favour among them than ever we were. The father marvelling hereat, was desirous to know what device that might be: and with that the youth call his gown from off his shoulders, and shewed him a good blade girded to his side. I will, quoth he, out of hand, establish and seal sure the Roman League with the blood of Annibal. I was desirous (father) to let you know of it aforehand, if peradventure you would be willing to be out of the way when the deed is a doing. The old man seeing and hearing this, in a great surprisall, as if he had been present to see the execution of that which he heard K him to speak of. Now I beseech thee, my son (quoth he) pray thee of all loves and bonds him to speak of. Now I beseech thee, that thou wilt not before thy fathers face either com- that bind children and parents together, that thou wilt not before thy fathers face either com- mit or suffer this so horrible a part, full of all abominable wickedness whatsoever, and not to be named. There are not many hours since, that we swore by all the gods and holy hallows in hea- ven, and by joining hand in hand, made faithful promise, and obliged our selves to commu- cate together with him, and to eat at the holy table of sacred viands. And are we no sooner departed alunder from our familiar conference and parley, but we arm our selves against him? Aristel thou indeed from thy friends guest-board, to which thou wert thyself a third man bid- den of all the Campanians, and even by Annibal, and wilt thou stain and pollute that board with the blood of the principal guest? I, thy father, erewhile was able to reconcile Annibal to my I son: and can I not pacifie my son likewise, and appeale his fierce stomach against Annibal? But if their be nothing sacred and inviolable, nothing to be trusted in the world, neither faithful promise, nor religious oath, nor any pieties at all and good nature, things to honest and just: then adventure hardly, and spare not to put in execution all actions detestable and not to be spo- ken, for that besides the note and infamous mark of wickedness, they bring not upon our own heads present mischief, and utter confusion. Darest thou alone assail the person of Annibal? What wilt that multitude about him do the while, so many freemen and bondmen both? All their regard and all their eyes upon him alone, what serve they for? What will become of their guard and regard all their eyes upon him alone, what serve they for? What will become of so many hands of theirs? Thinkest thou that they will be benumbed and dead at the time of that frantic enterprise of thine? The grim visage of Annibal himself, whom whole armies of soldiers tremble to behold: who the people of Rome dread, and for fear of whom they quake again, wilt thou alone abide to see? And if all other means of help should fail him, wilt thou endure to strike and wound me thy father, putting my body between for the safeguard and defence of Annibal? And stab me thou mult through the very heart, before thou canst hurt him fence of Annibal? And run him through, suffer therefore thyself there to be sacrificed from this thy intended mischief, before thou have the foil there, and mis of thy purpose. Let my prayers take place with thee, as once this day they prevailed for thee. With that, he marked his son to weep and shed tears, and embracing him about the middle, and kissing him ever and anon, he left him not, nor gave over to pray & entreat him instantly until he got at his hands to lay off his sword, and pro- mise him faithfully, that he would not attempt any such enterprise. Then the youth, seeing how the case stood, I will (quoth he) pay unto my natural father that kindness and love, in which I am bound as a debtor to my native Country. But alas for you, good father, I am right sorry for your hard hap: who are to answer before God and the world, for the betraying of your country no fewer times than thrice already. Once, when you gave council and persuaded to forsake the Romans, and to revolt from them: again, when you were the principal agent, and advised to make peace with Annibal: and now this day the third time, when you are the only obstacle and hinderance that Capua is not resolved again into the hands of the Romans. O sweet country and native soil of mine, take here at my hands this sword, wherewith erewhile I was girt and armed for dear love of thee, and was fully minded to defend this thy chief Castle and Fortres, and not to spare, but embrace it in the blood of thy mortal enemy: take it I say, and Fortres, and not to spare, but embrace it in the blood of thy mortal enemy: take it I say, since my own father is ready to wreath it from me. This said, he flung his sword over the garden wall into the high way and open street: and therewith, because he would not grow into any suspicion, he shewed himself again to the guests within the house, and took part of the banquet. The morrow after, the Senate in favour of Annibal solemnly met together in great number: in which frequent assembly, the beginning of his speech was very pleasant and gracious: wherein he gave the Captains thanks, for preferring his amity before the alliance of the people of Rome: and among other fair and magnificall becheits to them made, he promised that within a while,

A Capua should be the head City and chief State of all Italy, whereunto the people of Rome, together with other nations, should resort for law and justice. Mary, quoth he there is one that hath no part or fellowship in the society and league made between the Carthaginians and you. name- ly, Magius Decius, who neither was a Campan nor ought of right to be so called and reputed: him I demand to be delivered into my hands, and as in my presence the Senate should be af- fected their opinion concerning his treasurs, and an Act presently entered thereof. All of them there assembled allowed of the motion, and gave their assent in the end: albeit a great sort of them thought both the man unworthy of that hard fortune and calamity, and that this was but an ill beginning and a very overture to the infringing of the right of their freedom. The chief Ma- gistrate then went forth of the Council-Chamber, and late in the Judicial Hall or Temple, and commanded Decius to be attached, and to stand before him at his feet, and there to answer for himself and make his defence. Who persisted still in the same stoutness and boldness of spirit, al- ledging that by virtue of the covenants in the League comprised, he might not lawfully be pressed and forced thus far. Whereupon he had irons clapt upon him, and commandment was given that he should have a Lictor attend upon him, and to be conveyed into the Camp of Annibal. All the way as he was led, so long as he was bare-headed and open-faced, he went preaching to the multitude that flocked about him, and with a loud voice spake and laid: "Now Campanians, ye have the liberty that ye fought and longed for. In the open market place, at noon-day, and in your fight, how I, a man inferior to none in all Capua, am led away bound in chains to die. What greater violence could be offered if Capua were won by assault of the enemy? Go forth, go and meet Annibal, adorn and hang the City with rich cloath of capillary Regiter in your Kalender, among other holidays, this day of his Entry into the end ye may behold this goodly triumph over one of your own Citizens. Upon the utterance of these words, the multitude seemed discontented at the indignity of this sight. Whereupon he was hoodwinked and his head covered, and the Serjeant was charged to have him away quickly, and make haste out of the gates. So, he was brought into the Camp, and immediately shipped and sent to Carthage, for fear lest some commotion might arise in Capua, upon so unworthy and shameful a deed: and left the Senat al- so to should repent themselves, that they had delivered and yielded out of their hands a principal personage among them: also to prevent that no Embassage might be sent unto him for his redeli- very, whereby he should either offend his new Allies, in case he denied them their first request, or suffer Capua to have always a baffle and seditious Citizen ready ever to stir up new troubles, if he granted their suit. The ship wherein he was embarked, was by a tempest calt upon Cyrene, a port town in the dominion at that time of the KK. There, Magius fled for refuge as to a Sanctuary unto the Image of King Ptolomaeus, and was brought by his guard and keepers unto Alexander to the Kings presence, and enforced the King, how contrary to the tenor and privilege of the covenant he was in bonds by Annibal. Whereupon he was loosed from his chains, and put to the choice, whether he would return to Capua, or go to Rome. Magius answered, that he could not in Capua remain in safety, and if he went to Rome, at that time especially when there was war between the Romans and the Captains, he should be sooner lodged therein a prisoner like a fugitive runnagate, than entertained in house for a friend and loving guest: and concluded in the end, that he would make abode and live the rest of his daies more willingly in no place of the world, than in his high- ness Realm, whom he found already to be the favourer of his life, and the redeemer of his liberty and enlargement.

While these occurrences fell out abroad, Q. Fabius Pictor, sent (as is above said) Embassador to Delfos, returned to Rome, and out of a writing he read openly, the answer of the Oracle in their words (now ye mult understand, that in this Script were certain gods and saints named, unto whom they should make solemne supplication, and the manner also with all ceremonies and com- plements thereto belonging). Then (O Romans) if ye shall so do, your state shall prosper and be more happy: your Common-weal shall go forward better to your mind, ye and victory in the wars shall happen unto the people of Rome. But remember, that when all things shall go well on your side, and your State shall be saved and prevailed, ye send unto Pythius Apollo a present ac- cording to the merit of a due recompence; and of the silver failed of the pillage, prizes, and spoils taken from the enemies, do him honour accordingly. After he had rehearsed these words, truly translated out of the Greek Original then he said moreover, That so soon as he was depar- ted from the Oracle, he presently sacrificed unto all those gods with frankincense and wine. Also, that he was commanded by the Priest of Apollo, that like as he be home came to the Oracle, and also celebrated sacrifices, crowned with a garland and chaplet of Laurel, so he should in the same man- ner adorned take ship and be embarked, and not lay off the said garland before he was arrived to Rome. Finally, that all ceremonies performed most precisely and diligently, which he was com- manded to observe, he had laid and bestowed the said chaplet upon the altar, before the Shrine of Apollo at Rome. Then the Senate made a decree, That those sacrifices and supplications should with all speed and careful regard be celebrated.

While these things passed at Rome and in Italy, Mago the son of Amilcar, arrived at Car- thage, and brought the first tidings of the victory at Canus. This Mago was no immediately and directly sent from his brother, out of the field where the battle was fought, but staid certain daies about receiving the homage and subjection of certain Cities of the Bruttii, which revolted from the Romans. Who having audience given him in the Senat of Carthage, related what ailes known of any hope they had of aid from the Romans. Himself went from Cannus to Calatia, and from thence passed over the river Volturnus, and by the way of Saricula and Trebia, journeyed over Suessula through the mountains, and arrived at Nola. A little before the coming of the Roman Prætor, Annibal was departed and gone out of the Territory of Nola, and drew downwards to the sea-side near unto Neapolis; his teeth watered at the Port-town, and that out of Africk his ships might arrive thither, as to a safe and sure harbour. But after that he heard that Nepes was held by a Roman Provost, M. Junius Syllanus (sent for thither by the Neapolitans themselves) and had received a garrison: seeing he could not be admitted into Neapolis, no more than into Nola he went to Nuceria. Having beleaguered it round a long time, and often assaulted it forcibly, and assailed to solicit as well the Commons as the Nobility, but without effect: at length by famine he forced them to yield, and he became master of the Town upon composition. That they should depart every man disarmed in their single garments. Then, as one that would seem ever from the beginning, to use clemency to all Italians, but only the Romans: he made fair promises of great rewards and advancement to honour, unto all those that would carry behind and serve under him. But no man upon those hopes would remain with him. For they all gave him the slip, and went sundry waies, some to their friends and acquaintance, others at a venture to their mind flood to divers Cities of Campania, by most to Nola and Nepes. Amongst the rest, there were almost thirty Senators, and those (as it fell out) of the best sort, that came to Cepus; but being kept out there because they had shut their gates against Annibal, they went to Cumes. The pillage of Nuceria was bestowed upon the soldiers, the City sacked and burnt. K Now kept Marcellus Nola, not presuming more upon the strength of his own garrison, than upon the confidence he had in the great men and chief of the City. But he had the Commons in jealousy, and above all, one L. Banius, who for that he had comploted to rebel, and therefore flood in fear of the Roman Deputy: one while was pricked and incited to attempt treason, and to betray his Country: another while, in case he should fall of that opportunity, and mis his purpose, to make an escape and run away to the enemy. A courageous and lusty young man he was, and the bravest Cavalier in those daies of all the Roman Confederates. His hap was to be found lying half dead among the heaps of slain bodies before Canna: Annibal took order for the curing of his hurts, and when he was thoroughly healed, right courteously sent him home well and bountifully rewarded. In remembrance of which favour and good turn, and in token of L thankfulness, he was willing to deliver and yield Nola into the hands of Annibal, to be at his devotion. But the Prætor had an eye unto him, and observed how his head wrought, and was busy occupied to bring an alteration. And seeing there were but two waies to deal with him, either by punishment to keep him short, and cut him off: or by some benefit to win his heart: he thinking it a better course, to gain unto himself so hardy and valiant a friend, than only to bereave his enemy of him: he sent for him, and in this manner spake friendly unto him: "You have (quoth he) amongst your countrymen and fellow-Citizens, I see well, many that envy you, as it appears well by this, that there is never a neighbour you have at Nola that hath told me of you, and how many noble exploits and good services in war you have performed. But yet your valour cannot be unknown and hidden, ever since you served in the Roman army. For many there M "be which were soldiers then with you, which have made report unto me of your prowess, and what perils you have entered into, and how often you have put your life in hazard, for the safety and honour of the people of Rome: and namely, how in the battel before Canna you gave not over fight, untill at length having bled well near to death, you were born to the ground and lay under foot, overwhelmed with men, horse and armour, falling upon you, and to keep down that you could not rise up again. But be of good cheer man, and go on still in this thy virtue and well-doing: you shall have at my hands all honour and reward that may be possible: and the oftner you come to me and keep me company, you shall find it will be more for your reputation and commodity both. The young man was glad at heart for these gracious words and large promises: and so Marcellus gave unto him freely, a good brave courier, and commanded the Treasurers to tell him out in money 5000 Bigats of silver, charging his officers and Lictors to let him have access unto him at his pleasure, whensoever he came. By this courteous usage and humanity of Marcellus, the young mans stout heart was so dulced, mollified and eased to be wrought, that of all Confederates and Allies there was not one, who bare himself more valiantly, nor maintained more faithfully the State of Rome. When Annibal was approached to the gates of Nola (for he was returned from Nuceria, and came thither again) and the Commons within the town practised a-fresh to rebel, Marcellus had a little before the coming of the enemies, retired and put himself within the walls: not for fear that he should not be able to keep the field and his hold: but lest he should give advantage and opportunity to betray the City, seeing too many of them within disposed and forward thereunto. After this, they began on both sides to arrange their battels in array the Romans under the walls of Nola, the Carthaginians before their own fort. Small skirmishes there were between the City and the Camp of Annibal (with variable event of fortune) because the Generals were not willing, either to deny and debar some few that were so eager and forward to call for fight, or yet to give forth the signal of a general battel. Whilst these two armies temporized thus, and held their Corps de guard, continually, and in manner of a solemn set Assembly, the chief Nobles of the Nolans advertised Marcellus, that there used to be night-meetings and conferences between their own Commons and the Carthaginians: and

* re lix, sh.

* Bigatus was a piece of Roman silver coin, so called of Bigla, a character drawn with two horns, struck on the one side, and it was the same that Dracm.

A and that it was plotted and set down, That when the Roman Host was issued in battel-array out of their gates, the Commons in the mean while should fall to rifling their carriages, packs, and trusses within, and then shut the gates upon them, and keep the walls: and so having the City and all their goods and baggage under their hands, should from thenceforth receive Annibal into the City instead of Marcellus. Upon these advertisements, Marcellus after he had thanked and commended the Senators of Nola, determined before any commotion and mutiny arose within the walls, to try the fortune of a battel. At those three gates that flood toward the enemy, he ranged his forces, divided into three battalions, &c. gave order, that all the carriages should follow after him, and that the lackies, launders, and other Camp followers, together with the feeble and sickly persons, should carry stakes and pales for the rampier. At the middle gate he placed the flower and strength of the legions, together with the Roman Cavalry: at the two gates at either hand he bestowed the new soldiers the light armed, and the auxiliary horse men of allies. The Nolans were by straight commandment forbidden to approach the gates or the walls. As for the baggage and carriages the ordinary guard was appointed to attend thereupon, for fear, lest while the Legions were busy in fight, there should be some assault made upon them. In this order and array marshalled they were within the gates, Annibal al, who likewise ready arranged flood with banner displayed (as he had done for certain daies together) untill it was well toward noon first wounded at it, that neither the Roman army issued out of the gates nor any soldier appeared upon the walls: and supposing afterwards, that their usual exploits and conventions were discovered and revealed, and that for very fear they kept within and sat still, sent back part of their soldiers into the Camp, with commandment, in all speed to bring abroad into the open field before the vanguard, all the Ordnance and Artillery for to batter the City walls: with assured confidence, that if he came hourly upon them, and gave an assault, whilst they thus lingered and issued not forth, the Commons would make some tumult and stir within the City. But anon as every man was busily occupied, running to and fro in haste about his own charge, before the vanguard and forefront of his battel, even at the point when he advanced forward to the walls: all upon a sudden a gate was set open, and Marcellus caused the trumpets to sound the alarm, and the soldiers to set up a shout, commanding the footmen first, and then the horse to fly out, and with all the might and force they could, to charge upon the enemy. Soon had they terminated their main battel, thickly and made disorder there, when at the two gates of each side, P. Valerius Flaccus and Canna, Arrelus, two Lieutenants generally issued forth upon their flanks and wings. The horse-boies swiftly and the other multitude above laid, which was set to guard the carriages, arose up, and made a new outcry, and shouted, so as to the Carthaginians (who amongst them before for their small number especially) they represented all at once a show of a mighty army. I dare not at such that which some Authors stick not to write, that of enemies were slain in this conflict 2500 and that the Romans lost but one only man. But what victory soever it was, either so great, or smaller, surely a doughty piece of service was that day achieved: and I wot not whether I may truly say, of the greatest consequence that any ever was, during the time of that war. For as the time was then, it was a greater matter for the Romans (albeit they were the Conquerors) not to be E vanquished of Annibal, than it was afterwards to vanquish him. Annibal did appointed of his hope to win Nola retired to Acerra. And Marcellus immediately having shut the gates, and placed the guards and warders to keep the same, that no man might go forth, sat judiciously in the marketplace to examine those that had used secret conference and plying with the enemies: and finding above seventy guilty of this action pronounced sentence of death upon them, as in case of treason. Thoe he cut shorter by the head, and commanded their goods to be confiscated. And thus leaving the government of the City to the Senat thereof, he departed with all his forces, and above Suessula encamped himself, and there abode.

Annibal being come before Acerra, first summoned the City, to surrender voluntarily & without constraint: but seeing them obstinate, and willing to relent, he made preparation to lay siege unto the town, and to assault it. But the Acerrans had better heart and courage than might and strength to resist him. Therefore, when they saw themselves like to be intrenched all about, and were past hope to defend and keep the town: before the enemies had brought all ends of their trenches and scones together they got between the trenches and rampiers (where they were not finished and flood not close together) in the dead time of the night, and escaped through the sentinels and watches that were stendly looked unto, and as well as they could making their flight through by-waies and blind lanes over hedge and ditch (as either their wise guided them, or their carried them) recovered those Cities of Campania, which they knew for certain were not revolted, but perfidiously true and fast unto the Romans. Annibal after he had put Acerra to the sack, and let it on fire, having intelligence, that the Roman Dictator and the Legions were received at Capitulum: and fearing, lest while the enemy lay so near encamped, some should have recourse also into Capua, led his army to Castellum.

At the same time Prenefte was held by 500 Preneftins, with a few Romans and Latines, who upon the news of the overthrow at Canna, were retired thither. These Preneftins, by occasion that they were not levied and mustered at Prenefte by the day appointed, set out from thence somewhat too late; and were come as far as Castellum, before the rumour was bruited of the defeat before Canna: where they joyned themselves with other Romans and Confederates, set forward from Castellum, and marched together with a good great company: but meeting by the way with with the tidings of that unfortunate field, turned back again to Castellum. And after they had spent certain daies there, as well fearing the Campans as suspected of them again, (for they received on both sides how to entrap one another, and how to avoid each others trains) and having devided also certain intelligence, That in Capua there was treating about a revolt, and that Annibal was there received: they in one night left upon the Townsmen of Castellum, and killed them, and got that part of the City which is on this side Vulturinus (a river that runneth through it, and divideth it into two parts) and kept it still. Their number was well encreased by the coming of a cohort of four hundred and sixty Perusins, who likewise were driven to Castellum, by the lame report and news, which a few daies before had turned the Prencelins thither. And surely there was insufficient almost of armed souldiers to man and defend the walls of that part, being off so small a circuit as they were, considering the town was flanked on the one side with the river. And again, for the proportion of corn (whereof they had small store) they were men but too many. Annibal being now not far from thence, sent before him the Getulians, under the conduct of a Captain named Isalea: with direction, that first, if he could come to a parley, he should persuade with the Inhabitants within, and by fair words induce them to open their gates, and receive a garrison: but in case they continued still in their obduracy, then to assail them by force, and give the attempt to enter into the City one way or other. When they were come under the walls, the barbarous Captain Isalea, (supposing because he heard no noise, and saw no stirring) that they had quit and abandoned the town and were fled, began to assail the gates, break open the locks, & burst the bars. But all at once on a sudden the gates were set open, and two cohorts well appointed and provided for that purpose within, sallied forth, with an exceeding great noise and tumult, overthrew a number of the enemies, and beat them down. Thus when the first had the repulse and were set back, Maharbal was sent with a greater power to second them, but was not able to make his party good with these squadrons that sallied forth and charged upon him. At last Annibal himself encamped even before the wall, and with all his power and forces put together, made preparation to give assaile to this little town & small garrison. And whilst he pressed hard upon them with fresh and hot assaults, investing it round about, the enemies from off their walls, curtains, and turrets, let flie their shot so lustily upon the assailants, that he lost some of his best & most forward men. Then once they issued forth of themselves upon a bravery, and minded to bid them battel, but by a course of Elephants, set between them and home, they had like to have been shur forth and kept out, and so they made haste in great fear to recover the gates and put themselves within the town again: having lost, considering so small a number, a great sort: and more had died for it, but that the night parted the fray, and made an end of the skirmish. The morrow after, the assailants were all of them sharp set to give a fresh and hot charge, but not before there was a mural Coronet of gold shewed, and promised unto him that first could scale the walls. And the General himself came in their teeth and reproved them for being so long about the assailing of a small and weak conceit, to speak of, feared also upon a plain: whereas before they had won the strong town of Saguntum. He put them in mind both all and some, of Canna, Thrafymenus, and Trabia. Then began they to set mantlets and pavories to, and to undermine. Many and sundry enterprizes were attempted, and nothing left undone, that either by meer force could be performed, or by art and cunning devised. The Roman associates against these their engines and fabricks raised mounts, and platforms: yea, and with countermines and cross trenches, met with the mines of the enemies: so as both above ground, and underneath, they impeached all their attempts: so long, until Annibal for very shame was faine to give over his design for the present. And when he had fortified his standing Camp and placed there a mean guard for the defence of it, because he would not seem to have relinquished altogether the enterprize, he withdrew himself into Capua, thither to winter. There he lodged his souldiers within house for the better part of winter: those souldiers, I say, who many a time and often had endured long, and held out against all travels and hardships that can possibly happen to the body of man: and never had been used to any good keeping, nor acquainted with delights and pleasures of the world. But even these men, whom no calamity, no misery could name and overcome, were spoiled and undone with too much wealth and excessive dainties: and so much the rather, as they more greedily fell thereto: and having not tasted thereof before, gave themselves wholly that way, and were deeply plunged and drowned therein. For sleeping on soft beds, wine and delicate fare, wenching and bathing, flews and hot-boules, idleness and taking ease, which by use and custom grew pleasant and delightome unto them every day more than other: had in such sort weakened their bodies, and made their hearts so effeminate, that from that time forward the reputation and name only of their victories past defended them more than any present strength and vigor they had: inasmuch, as expert and skillfull warriors judged their Captain Annibal in more fault, and farther overseen in this action, than in not leading his Army straight forward to Rome, after the battell before Canna. For, that they might have been thought to have deferred only the entire and final victory for a time, but this error and oversight seemed to disable him for achieving the victory for ever. So little retained he of his former old discipline that I assure you, he went out of Capua again as if he had led some other Army and none of his own. For, not only they returned from thence most of them intangled and snared in the love of harlots, but so soon as they came again to lie abroad on the bare earth under tents and pavilions covered with beasts hides, to march long journeys, and to taste of other military toil and labour: their bodies so tired, their hearts so faint, as if they had been

A raw souldiers, new come into the field: in such wise, as all the time of their summer abode in Camp many of them without license and palpost, would slip out of the wall, and depart from their colours: and these flart-backs had no other place of haunt to lurk in, but Capua. Now when the winter season began to be more mild, and draw towards the spring, Annibal brought forth his souldiers out of his wintering harbours, and returned to Castellum: where, albeit the assaile ceased, yet the siege had continued so freight, that the townsmen and they that were within the Fort, were driven to extreme necessity and want of victuals. Now the Captain over the Roman Camp was T. Sempronius Gracchus: by reason that the Dictator was gone to Rome to take new auspices. And as for Marcellus, who was detours for his part to receive and succour the besieged, was impeached for coming to them partly by the rumour and swelling of the river Vulturinus, and partly by the intreaty of the Citizens of Nola and Acerre, who greatly feared the Campans. In case the garrison were once departed from them. And Gaius, lying and keeping near unto Castellum, flirred not one foot, by reason of the express commandment of the Dictator. That he should attempt nothing in his absence: albeit there came daily from Castellum into the Camp such news, as would have moved and provoked the most patient man that was. For it was constantly reported, and for certain known that some of them within the town, no longer able to endure the famine, threw themselves down headlong, and brake their necks: others stood unarmed upon the walls, offering their bare and naked bodies as a butt and mark to the shot of arrows, and others dare Gracchus grieved much to hear these pitious tidings, yet durst he not for his life, skirmish and fight without the warrant of the Dictator: & he saw full well that if he would convey corn and victuals unto them openly (till he milt there was no remedy. Having therefore no hope at all to send any, but that he should be spoiled, he devised to fill many tuns and pipes with corn, that he had gotten together out of the country all about and withal, to dispatch a messenger to the chief Magistrate of Castellum, advising him that he should in the night season take up all those vessels that came down the river. The night next following, every man was held at the river side according to the hope they conceived by the foresaid Roman messenger, and to receive those tuns, bringing down the midst of the stream: and the corn was equally divided among the milt. Thus did they the morrow after, and the third day also. For, either by night these vessels were let down to the water and the same night they might easily come unto them: by reason whereof the females and guards of the enemies were nothing ware of that which was done. But afterwards, the current growing more swift and rough, by occasion of continual rain that fell, the said tuns were some of them driven cross the channel to the bank side, even where the enemies were: and were eapily waving and sticking among the willows and others that grew along side unto the banks: whereof Annibal was advertised. And so from thence forward they tended the watch more faithfully: that nothing sent down the river Vulturinus could escape them, and pass to the City. Afterwards, there was poured into the water great store of nuts from the Camp of the Romans: which floated down the channel unto Castellum, and with grated skimmers of wicker were taken up. But at the last, they within the town were driven to this poor shift and extremity, for to take their thorns and bridle reins, to pick of the leather from their shields & buckers, and make them fort in leading water, and prove how they could eat them. Nay, they spared not to much as mice, and rats, nor any other like vermin. Nor there was not a weed nor a root that they could come by upon their banks and terraces under the wall, but they gathered and digged up. And when the enemies had turned up with a plough all the green-herb of the counter-scarp without the walls, they within cast their nip-feces upon the mould. Whereupon Annibal made a shout at it and cried aloud: What? shall we sit here about Castellum so long, until these rapes be come up and grown, and whereas before that time, he would never you able to hear of any composition and agreement now at last he was contented to take reason, and be conferred withal about the ransom of as many as were taken within the Town. And it was covenanted between him and them that they should pay, or their redemption seven ounces of gold a peece. So upon this full promise made, and as it was given, they yielded themselves: and were kept bound in prison until they had made full payment of the fine gold aforesaid. After which they were sent back under safe conduct to Rome. For this is more like to be true, than the report which goeth, That there were sent out after them, certain other enemies, who fell upon them and slew them in the way. Most of them were Prencelins, and whereas there were of them in all five hundred and seventy in garrison the one half well near, were either by sword or hunger consumed: All the rest, together with their Prator Manlius, one who aforesaid had been a Scribe or Notary, returned safe unto Prencle. In memoria, and testimony of this his Statue was erected in the market place of Prencle, armed in his cuirass, clad in a long robe, with his head covered: and three other images, with a title or inscription engraven in a plate of Brass, with this tenor: That Manlius had made a vow for the souldiers who lay in garrison with him at Castellum. And the same title also was engraven under three other images, set up in the Temple of Fortuna. The Town of Castellum was restored again to the Campans, with a strong garrison of 700 souldiers deducted out of the army of Annibal: for fear lest when he was departed once from thence, the Romans should assail them.

The Senat of Rome by virtue of a decree, granted unto those souldiers of Prencle double wages, with five years vacation & rest from warfare, And when to gratifie them farther for their valiant service, they made offer unto them of the Burgessie and freedom of Rome, they chose rather to remain still at home, and would not change their own Country, But what befell unto the Perusins, rolins, is not recorded so plainly: for neither appeareth evidence by any public monument and memoriall of their own, nor yet decre extant of the Romans. At the same time the Petellins (who alone of all the Brutii remained in friendship and amity with the Romans) were assailed not only by the Carthaginians, (that were possessed of a great part of the Country about them) but also by the other Brutii with whom they would not joyn in the complot of their rebellion. The Petellins not able of themselves to hold out and endure these dangers, sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave their aid and assistance: whose humble prayers and piteous tears (for after an answer received, That they should provide and shift for themselves) they fell into lamentable moans and complaints, and lay prostrate upon the earth, before the porch of the Council-House, wrought exceeding compassion and pity in the hearts of the Senators, and also of the people: whereupon the LL. were moved again the second time, by M. Æmilius the Prætor, to deliver their opinion. And when they had cast all about, and well weighed and considered their present state, and what they were able to do: being forced to confesse, that it lay not in their power to help their Allies, so far distant and remote from them: they willed them to repair home again; and since they had performed their fidelity to the full, according to covenant, they gave them leave in this calamity of theirs to take that course that they thought best for themselves. When they were returned with this answer unto the Petellins, their Senat all on a sudden was stricken into such sorrows, dumps, and fearful mazes; that some of them were of mind, and gave advice, to abandon the City, and fly every man wheresoever he could: others were of opinion and persuaded, that seeing they were forsaken of their old friends, they should joyn with the other Brutii, and by their means, turn to Annibal, and come under his protection. Howbeit, a third side prevailed, who would in no wise that anything should be done over hastily and rashly: but that they might meet again, and sit in council about the matter. And so it was put off, and respite given until the next day. Then, after more mature deliberation, and their former fear somewhat allayed, the principall perionages there assembled grew to this resolution, namely, To convey all things out of the Territory about them into the City, and to fortifie both it and the walls.

Perusins,

Near about one and the same time, there came Posts with Packets of Letters to Rome, from out of Sicily and Sardinia. Those out of Sicily from Offacilius the Vice-Prætor, were read first in the Senat-House importing these news: That L. Furius the Prætor was come out of Africk, and with his fleet arrived at Lilybæum: himselfe fore hurt, and lying at point of death: that neither the soldiers, nor sailors, and mariners, had their money or corn duly paid at the day; neither indeed was there any to be had, for to keep roach and make payment: moving and advising them earnestly, to feed supply thereof with all convenient speed: and if they thought fit good, one also of the new chosen Prætors to succeed after him. To the same effect in manner wrote Cornelius, Mammula the Pro-Prætor, out of Sardinia, as touching that point of money and corn. Answer was returned to the one and the other That they had it not; and therefore they were to look themselves both to their Armados and Armies, and to provide for them. Offacilius, who addressed Embassadors unto K. Hiero (the only refuge and stay of succour that the people of Rome had) received for soldiers pay, as much silver as was needfull, and corn to serve six months. The confederat Cities likewise in Sardinia contributed liberally unto Cornelius, and served his turn. As Rome also for want of silver, there were (by a law published by Minutius, Tribune of the Commons) created three Bankers, called Tyrrhæni, Menæti, to wit, L. Æmilius, who had been Consul and Censor: M. Atilius Regulus, twice Consul afore time; and L. Scribonius Libo, a Tribune of the Commons for the time being. Two Duumvirs also were chosen, M. and C. Atilii, who dedicated the Temple of Concordia which L. Manlius Prætor had vowed before, Three High Priests also were consecrated, Q. Cecilius Metellus, Q. Fabius Max., and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, all to supply the rooms of P. Scævinius late deceased: of L. Æmilius Paulus the Consul, and Q. Ælius Paullus, slain both in the journey of Cannæ.

Now when as the LL. of the Senat had fulfilled other wants, and made up all decays and breaches, which fortune by continual calamities and losses had wrought and brought upon them, so far forth, as by any wisdom and policy of man, they could provide for: at length they had respect and regard unto themselves also, even to the decaying estate of the Council-House, and the unrequent number of Senators, assembling to the publicke Council of the City. For since that L. Æmilius, and C. Flaminius were Censors, there had been chosen no new Senators, notwithstanding that in five years space, what with unfortunat battles, and what with other particular chances, so many of them had miscarried. And when M. Æmilius the Prætor, in the absence of the Dictator (who after the loss of Castellum was now gone again to the host) had at the request of them all, propounded this matter: then Sp. Carvilius, after he had in long oration complained, not only of the penury, but also of the small choice of those Citizens, who were capable of Senators dignity, fell upon the point, and said, "That he held it a matter of good importance both for the publicke repairing and restoring of the decayed body of the Senat, as also for to bind the Latine Nation in a more fast bond of amity, that two Senators out of every State of the Latines (if the LL. of the Senat or Rome would agree unto it) should be enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and taken into the Senat in place of those that were deceased. This opinion of his the LL. of the Senat could abide to hear with no better ear than in times past they accepted the motion and demand of the Latines themselves in that behalf. And there being throughout the whole House a great muttering,

A muttering, for very indignation and disdain of those his words, Manlius above the rest heale out into this speech, and said: "That they were not all dead, but one man yet was alive of all that "house and line, out of which a Consul (when time was) threatened in the Capitol, that he would "kill with his own hand, that Latine whomsoever he was finding in the Council-House of Rome. With that, Q. Fabius: "Never was there a thing, quoth he, propounded and mentioned in the "Senat-house, in a worse and more unreasonable time, than at this present, when as the heats and "affections of our Allies being to wavering, their faith and allegiance to subvert, as very treat- "ing and breaching of such a matter as this, were enough to let them further out. And therefore "this inconsiderat speech of one foolish man perforce, is to be accepted and heard not privately with "the silence of all men, and never once to be spoken of again. And therefore were intended at "Council Table, any secret and mystery, which were to be examined, and of which might most "to be kept close, hidden and smothered in oblivion, and referred to never, as never said. So this "matter was dashed, and dyed there in the very fire. Then they rose up, and came to the great Dictator for the choosing of Senators, one that had been Censor before, and another who had been Censor, and were then living, the most ancient and therefore they gave entry, that C. Terentius Varro the Consul should be sent for, to the no mislike of that Dictator. Who being returned out of Apulia, leaving the camp there with a good guard, and taking long journeys, until he was come to Rome: the night next following (as the manner was) exercised authority of an act of Senat, M. Fabius Buteo, Dictator for six months, without a General of Horse. And he was mounted up with his Sergeants to the Regia, [which is the place of publicke audience] for to make a speech unto the people, he said: "That he never should see two Dictators at the same time, (a precedent never seen and known afore) nor yet could it be handled for a Dictator, to long as "he was without his General of Cavalry. I will like also (quoth he) to see the entire authority and "power of Censors, should be put into the hands of one and the same man, twice; and that a Dictator should have the rule and government for six months, and he were exercised for the "managing of wars. And therefore (said he) I will my LL limit and give no more things, which "fortune, occasion of the times, and necessity have made excessive, and beyond all measure power to convey. Neither am I minded to depose or displace any of those from his Censors dignity, whom "C. Flaminius, and L. Æmilius late Censors, have admitted into the Senat: but only, that a "transcript and rehearsal be made of their names, for that I would not have the like in the power of "one man alone, to censure and give judgement of the same as a Governor of a Senate: but this "course will I take in substituting new Senators in the room of the dead, that it may appear, and be said: That this Order and degree is preferred before that, no one person should be another. So after that the names of the old Senators were copied out and read, then he chose first to the place of them that were deceased, those who after the time of L. Æmilius and C. Flaminius Censors, had born any Magistracy of State, and of the chair, and yet were not elected Senators. And according as they had exercised their office one before another in order of time, to were they chosen first Senators in their course. This done, he made a second election of those who had been Ædiles, Tribuns, Prætors, or Quæstors: and last of all, such as could shew the spoils taken from the Enemies of Rome hanging in their houses: or had been honoured and rewarded with a Civic garland. Thus after he had with right great approbation and contentment of all men, taken into the Senat 177, forthwith he resigned up his office, descended from the pulpit, a private man again, discharged and put from him the Sergeants, and came and stood himself among the other multitude that attended their own private business: trying out the time for to goe and of purpose, because he would not have the people to leave the common place for to wait upon him. Howbeit, for all that lingering and stay which he made, the peoples affections cooled never the more, and so with a goodly train of men he was accompanied, and conducted home to his house.

The next night following, the Consul returned toward the army, without making the Senate privy and acquainted with his departure, for fear he should have been detained still in the City for the solemn election of new Magistrats. The morrow after the Senat decreed, upon a motion propounded by M. Pomponius the Prætor, to write unto the Dictator, that if the time were for the good of the common-weal, he would together with his General of the Cavalry, and M. Marcellus the Prætor, repair to Rome, to subrogate and choose new Consuls, to the end that when they were all together in place, the LL. of the Senat might by them take knowledge of all state the Common-wealth stood and consult how to provide for every thing. They all came that were sent for accordingly, leaving behind them their Lieutenants for the government and conduct of the Legions. The Dictator spake of himself but little, and with much modesty, ascribing the greatest part of the honor unto T. Sempronius Gracchus, and then himselfe in general assembly for the Election: in which were chosen Coss. L. Pœstumius the third time (who then was absent, and as L. Deputy ruled the Province of Gallia); and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who at that time commanded the Cavalry, and repaired to Rome with speed. Then were elected Prætors M. Valerius Maximus, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. M. Min. Scævola. The Dictator after the choosing of these Magistrats, returned to Thebanum, where the army wintered: leaving the General of the Horse behind at Rome, to the end that he being to enter into his government, within few days after, might consult with the LL. of the Senat as touching the levy and enrolling new armies against the year ensuing.

day to meet at Cales. Item, that six legions should be conducted to the camp of Claudius above Suessula. Item, that the legions which were (and those confisted for the most part of the residue of the Cannian army) Ap. Claudius Pulcher the Pretor, should put over Sea into Sicily; and as for those that were in Sicily, they should be transported to Rome. Item, unto that army which was appointed to meet by a day, at Cales, M. Claudius Marcellus was sent: and he was commanded to conduct the legions of the Citizens to the camp of Claudius. Last of all, to receive the charge of the old army, and to lead it into Sicily, T. Metellus Crotus Lieutenant, was sent by Ap. Claudius. Men looked at first, and yet they said nothing, that the Consul should call an assembly for the creating of a Colleague unto him. But after that they saw that M. Marcellus was sent out of the way (as it were of purpose) whom above all others they were desirous to be the Consul for that year, in regard of his notable good service while he was Pretor, there arose much mattering in the Senat house. Which the Consul perceiving: "My L.L. quoth he, it was for the good of the Common-wealth, that both M. Claudius should go into Campaign to exchange the armies: and also that the Election of Consuls, should not be proclaimed, until that he were returned again "from thence, with dispatch of that business which he had in charge: that ye might have a Consul, such a one as the present condition of the State required, and your selves most desired. So there was no more speech of the election, until Marcellus was come back again. In this mean time were two Duumvirs created, Q. Fabius Maximus for the dedication of one Chappel to Venus Erycina, and T. Otacilius Crassus, of another to the Goddess Mens. Both stand upon the Capitol hill, divided alunder no more than with one only conduct of water passing between. And as concerning the three hundred Campain Horsemen, who had served out their full time of warfare faithfully, and were come to Rome, a motion was propounded to the people, that they should be enfranchised Citizens of Rome: and in like manner, that they should be reputed as free Denizens of Cumes, from the day afore that the Capuans revolted from the people of Rome and rebelled. The chiefest cause of proposing this act, was this, because themselves denied flatly that they knew, to whom they did appertain, seeing they had abandoned their old native country: and as yet were not enrolled and incorporated into that state, unto which they had retired. After that Marcellus was come again from the army, the solemn day of election of a Consul in place of L. Postumius, was published. And with exceeding great content of all men, Marcellus was chosen: and forthwith he was to begin his Magistracy. At whose first entrance, it hapned to thunder: and the Augurs being called to give their opinion of it, pronounced, that they thought he was not rightfully created. And the Senators gave it out commonly and brined abroad, that the Gods were not well pleased therewith, because (forsooth) two Consuls were elected of the commonalty (a thing never seen before.) Whereupon Marcellus resigned up his place, and in his room was substituted Fabius Max. the third time.

That year the Sea burned. At Sinnessa a cow brought forth a horse foal. And at Lanuvium in the Temple of Iuno Hospita, certain statues or images dropped with blood: and about that Temple it rained stones. For which shew, there was solemnised, according to the custumable manner, a Novendial sacrifice. The other prodigious signs likewise were expiat with great care and heedfull regard. The Consuls then, parted their armies between them. Fabius took charge of those forces which had been commanded by M. Junius the Dictator. Sempronius had the conduct of all the voluntary souldiers, and besides of 25000 of Auxiliaries sent from the confederats. M. Valerius the Pretor had the legions appointed for him, that were returned out of Sicily. M. Claudius the Vice-consul, was sent unto that army, which lay in garison at Nola, above Suessula. And the Pretors took their journey into Sicily and Sardinia. The Consuls, whensoever they would assemble the Senat, proclaimed that the Senators, and all others that had lawful authority to speak their mind and deliver their opinion in the Council-house, should meet at the gate Capena. The Pretors, those that were Judges in the Court, and to whom the civil jurisdiction appertained, erected their Tribunal (seats and places of Assizes at the publick Fish-pool, and thither they commanded all writs to be returned, and appearance there to be made. And for that year all pleas and judgements of causes passed there.

In this mean time news came to Carthage (from whence Mago the brother of Annibal was minded to transport and set over into Italy 12000 footmen, and 1500 horsemen, 20 Elephants, and 1000 talents of silver, together with a guard and supply of 60 galleies.) That in Spain things went untowardly: and that all the Cities of Spain (in a manner) were revolted unto the Romans. Some there were of opinion, to withdraw Mago with that fleet and power of his, from the emperie of Italy into Spain. Considering there was good hope shewed of a suddain, recover again Sardinia, for that there was but a small power of Romans there: and Cornelius the old Lord Deputy, well acquainted with the State of the Province, was now upon his departure from thence, and a new expected in his turn. Over and besides, that the Sardinians were weary already of the Romans government, which they had long endured, as who the year that past was, had transcribed over them cruelly, and exercised their authority with oppression, covetously imposing upon them hard exactions and tributs, and levying of them a most unjust taxation and contribution of corn: and finally they wanted nothing but an head, upon whom they might relie themselves. To this effect there was an Embassage sent secretly from the Lords and Princes of the Island. And the principal actor and procurer hereof, was Hierfiorus, a man in those dayes of great authority and power among them. Upon these tidings aforesaid, hapning in just at one time, they were both dis-

A disquieted and also refreshed. So they sent Mago with his fleet, and other forces into Spain: and they chose for the expedition into Sardinia, Afranius (named Calvus for the L. General), furnished and appointed with as great a power almost, as Mago had.

At Rome likewise, the Consuls having dispatched the affairs of the City, addressed the selves to the war. T. Sempronius appointed Sinnessa to be the Rendez-vous, where the souldiers should meet at a certain day. And Q. Fabius, by an order and direction from the Senat, made an Edict, That all men should before the first day of July next ensuing, gather all their corn out of the countries, and convey the same into the principal walled strong Towns: proclaiming that: whosoever did not accordingly, their fields he would lay waste: tell their servants in port tale at the spar, and let their farms and villages a fire. Not to much as the Pretors themselves (created for civil jurisdiction and to decide law matters) were freed and exempted from the conduct of war. As for Valerius the Pretor, he was appointed to go into Apulia, for to receive the army of Terentius: and when the legions were returned out of Sicily, to employ them especially for the guard and defence of that country; and that the army of Terentius should be sent with some one of the Lieutenants. And M. Valerius had 25 sail allowed him, to keep and defend all the Sea coasts between Brundisium and Tarentum. The like number of ships was assigned to Q. Fabius the City Pretor, for to guard the River side, neer adjoining to the City of Rome. C. Terentius the Proconsul had in charge to take up by commission souldiers in the Picene country, and to guard those quarters. And T. Otacilius Crassus, after that he had dedicated the Temple of Mens in the Capitol, was sent into Sicily, as Lord Admiral of the Armado there.

Upon this war between two of the mightiest Cities, and most puissant states of the World, there was not a King and Prince, nor a Nation under Heaven, but was amused. Among whom Philip King of the Macedonians, had an eye thereto, and was more intensive, in that he was seerer unto Italy, and only divided from thence by the Jonian Sea. He at the first, when the bruit came to his ears, That Annibal was passed beyond the Alps: as he joyed much, that there was war kindled between the Romans and the Carthaginians, so, as long as it was uncertain, whether not on was the stronger, he wavered in mind and was in suspense, whether of the twain he should wish to have the victory. But after that he heard once, that in three several battails one after another, Annibal and the Carthaginians had gotten the better hand, he inclined to the fortunate side, and sent Embassadors unto Annibal: who falling off, and desirous to avoid the Havens of Brundisium and Tarentum, which were guarded and kept by the Romans fleet, arrived and landed at the Temple of Iuno Lucina: and so through Apulia, travelling toward Capua, chanced to light upon the midst of the Romans corps de guard, and were brought before M. Valerius the Lord Deputy, being then encamped before Nuceria. Where Xenophanes, the principal of the Embassadors, basted not to say, That he was sent from King Philip, to treat and conclude a league and amity with the people of Rome, and had commission and direction to the Consuls, to the Senat likewise and people of Rome, to that effect, Valerius taking great contentment to hear of this new society and friendship with so noble a King, especially upon the rebellion of so many old allies, courteously intreated and friendly entertained this false hearted enemy, in stead of a truly friend: and E appeouly diverse to accompany him forward, to guide him carefully in the wayes, and to shew him what places, what passages and freights were held and kept, either by the Romans, or the enemies. Xenophanes with these instructions passed through the midst of the Roman guards into Campaign, and to the next way arrived at the camp of Annibal, and made a league and amity with him, under these conditions and capitulations. Imprimis, That King Philip should with a right puissant Armada (for that he was supposed able to set out 200 sail) pass over into Italy, wait and spoil all the Sea coasts, and to his power maintain war by Sea and Land. Item, That when the war was finished, all Italy, together with the very City of Rome should be possessed by the Carthaginians and Annibal, and unto him all the pillage and booty likewise should belong. Item, When Italy was thus subdued, that they should fall into Greece, and wage war with what Princes there they pleased, and that all the Cities of the main, and the Islands which lay to Macedon, should fall unto Philip, and be annexed to his Kingdom. In these terms, and upon these Articles, in manner, was the league concluded and confirmed between the General Annibal, and the Embassadors of the Macedonians: and with them were sent back unto the King for the better ratifying of the said covenants, certain Legats, to wit, Gilgo, Bosar, and Mago, who arrived together at the same Temple aforesaid, of Iuno Lucina, where there did closely a ship at anchor, expecting their return. From whence being departed, they were not so soon launched out into the deep, and had taken the open Sea, but they were descried by the Roman fleet that guarded the coasts of Calabria. Q. Fulvius Flaccus made out certain Corycians, to pursue and fetch in that ship. Whereupon, the Macedonians began to flie, but seeing themselves overmatched in swiftness of sail, and G not able to make way with them, they yielded themselves unto the Romans, and were presented unto the Admiral: Who demanded what they were, from whence they came, and whither they were bound. Xenophanes who had already spied so well by making of a lye, began to cog again, and say, That he was sent from Philip unto the Romans: that he came unto M. Valerius, because to him only he was able to pals in safety, but could not pefibly get beyond Campaign, being so strongly kept with garisons of the enemies. But afterwards, upon the sight of the Carthaginian habit and apparel, they began to suspect the Embassadors of Annibal: and they being questioned withal, their speech and language betrayed them. Then was their retinue taken apart, and threatened to confels. Letters also were found upon them, sent from Anibal unto Philip, concerning the peace between the King of the Macedonians and Anibal. Upon these matters thus detected and certainly known, it was thought good to convey the Embassadors and their Company with all speed prisoners to Rome, unto the Senat there, or unto the Consuls wherelover they were. To this purpose were chosen five Pinnales that were most swift, under the conduct of L. Valerius Antia, who had his direction and charge to part the Embassadors in several ships, and keep them sure slunder: and to take good heed, that they neither talked nor conferred together.

About the same time it happened at Rome, that Corneius Mammula, upon his departure out of the Province Sardinia, made report in what like the Island stood; namely, that they all inclined to rebellion and war: that Marius who succeeded after him, presently upon his first coming, by reason of the ill air and unwholesome water, was fallen into a sickness, not so quick and dangerous, as chronick and tedious, and would not be able long to endure the service of war: that the army there, as it was sufficient to guard and keep the good order a quiet and peaceable Province, so it could not hold out with the war that was like to ensue. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat gave order, that Q. Fulvius Placcus, should levy and enrol good foot, and good horse, and provide that this legion should pass over with all speed into Sardinia, and fend there with whom it pleased him to conduct and manage the war until Anibal were recovered of his life. For this intent was T. Manlius Torquatus sent Governour; one, who had been twice Consul and Cenfor, and in his Consulship and subdued the Sardinians.

Near about the same time, there was an Armado sent out from Carthage unto Sardinia, under the leading of Aidrubal named Culvum, and being sore tossed and beaten with tempests, was cast upon the Balear Islands: where (so far out of order was not only the ship-tackling, but also the very keels and bodies of the ships broken) they drew up the ships to shore, and whilst they layed there about calking and trimming them again, they spent much time.

In Italy whilst the war began to flake and wax cold, by reason that after the battail of Canna, the strength of the one part was much abated, and their force decayed, and the courage of the others well allayed and made effeminate: the Campains upon their own heads began to contrive, how to reduce the State of Cumes under their obedience, first soliciting them to revolt from the Romans: and seeing that course would not speed and take effect, they devised by a fraudulent practise to compass and entrap them. The Campains use yearly to solemnize a let feast and sacrifice in a certain place called Hama; and they gave notice unto the Cumans, that the whole Senat of Capua would confert together: requesting the Senat of Cumes likewise to meet them there, for to confer and consult together in common, how both Cities, the one and the other, might have the same friends and the same enemies, and no other: giving them withal to understand, that they minded there to have a good guard about them of armed men, for fear of some sodain and dangerous attempt from the Romans. The Cumans, albeit they suspected some treachery, denied nothing, supposing thereby to colour and cover their own crafty intended designment. Now all at while, T. Sempronius the Roman Consul, having forces and purged his army at Sinnesa, at which place he had made proclamation, that his forces should meet together: passed over the river Vulturum, and encamped near unto Linternum: where because the Souldiers in the standing camp had nothing else to do, he exercised them to run often the race and skirmish in array, to the end that the raw Souldiers (for such were the voluntaries for the most part) might by use and practise learn how to follow their colours in good order, and in the time of battail know their own ranks and ensignes. In these kinds of training, the special care that the General had, and the chief thing that he aimed at, was their concord and good agreement. And for this purpose, he charged the Lieutenants, and the Colonels and Captains, that they should not cast in any mans teeth one or other, their fortune and condition aforesaid, thereby to breed any discord and heartburning among the companies: and that the old experienced souldiers should suffer themselves to be but equal in estate to the new learners: and those that were born free unto the voluntaries, who had been slaves: reuping them all of birth good enough, and of gentle blood descended, unto whom the people of Rome had vouchsafed to commit their armor and ensignes: saying, that the same fortune which had driven them to do, forced them likewise to maintain the same, and make the best of it, now it was done. The Captains were not more careful in giving these good lessons and instructions, but the souldiers were as diligent to observe the same: and within a while their hearts and affections grew to be so linked and united together, that they forgot generally, in what degree and of what condition each souldier entred into service. Whiles Gracchus was busied hereabout, the Embassadors of Cumes certified him, what kind of Embassage came unto them from the Campains, a few days before, and what answer they had returned: advertising him that their festival day was to be holden three days after: that not only the whole Senat would be present, but also the camp and army of the Campains. Gracchus having commanded the Cumans to convey all that they had out of the fields and territories about, into their City, and themselves to keep within their walls: himself the day before the tolemnity aforesaid of the Campains, removed his power to Cumes, and there incamped. Now Hama is three miles off from thence. The Campains by this time were assembled there in great number, according to appointment: and not far from the place, Marius Alfius the chief head Magistrat of Capua, was incamped closely with fourteen thousand souldiers. He, what with preparation of the sacrifice, and

A and contriving withal, the deceitful train of treachery, was more busy and careful thereabout, than either in fortifying his camp, or in any other military action. Thus for three days continued this festival sacrifice at Hama. And ever in the night season it was performed: so, as before midnight all was done and finished, Gracchus supposing that a good time for his ambush to be employed, having set certain wardens before the gates, that no man might go forth to give intelligence, caused the souldiers betwixt the sixth and tenth hour of the day, [from noon until four of the clock] to refresh themselves and take their sleep: that in the beginning of the dark night, they might assemble together at the watch-word or signal given them. And about the first watch he commanded to display their Ensigns and advance forward: and thus with a still march, he arrived at Hama by midnight, surprised the hold of the Campains, and entred all the gates at once, being negligently guarded, by reason of their overwatching. Some he killed lying along fast asleep: others, as they returned unarmed from the sacrifice. In this night-tumult there were slain more than two thousand, with Marius Alfius himself their leader: and 43 Ensigns taken and carried away. Gracchus with the losse of fewer than one hundred of his souldiers, having won the camp, retired speedily to Cumes, for fear of Anibal, who lay in fort encamped upon Tifata over Capua. And (as he was a provident man and of great foresight) nothing was he deceived in his opinion. For so soon as this defeat was reported at Capua, Anibal supposing that he should at Hama find the army of the Romans (consisting for the most part of raw souldiers, and those, bondslaves) joind and lusty above measure, and insolent upon their fresh victory, busied in rifling their dead enemies thus conquered, driving away booties, and charged with pillage: removed his forces in halt, and marched apace beneath Capua: and encountered with some of the Campains that were fled, whom he caused between two guards to be conducted late to Capua, and such as were hurt and wounded, to be let in waggons and carried thither. Himself toad at Hama the camp empty and void of enemies, and nothing there but the tokens of a fresh massacre, and the dead bodies of his friends and allies lying here and there scattered. Some there were that advised him presently to advance forward to Cumes; and to assault the Town. And albeit Anibal was willing enough thereto, and passing desirous (seeing he could not come by Naples) to have Cumes at least, a maritime port-Town, as well as the other: yet because his souldiers had brought nothing with them but their weapons, as being led forth to march in such haste, he retired D back again to his fort and camp upon Tifata. From whence, at the importun prayers of the Campains, the day following he furnished himself with all the Ordinance and Ensigns meet for the assault of a City, and returned toward Cumes: and having waited the territory thither, he encamped himself a mile from the Town. Then Gracchus, more for shame, that he might not seem to leave his associates in such necessity, (who craved protection and recommended themselves to him, and to the people of Rome) than for any confidence and trust that he repoted in the strength of his army, stayed in Cumes. Neither Fabius the other Consul, who was encamped at Caler, durst let his army over the River Vulturum: as having been bidden first at Rome in renewing the Auspices and bird-flights: and after that, troubled also about the fearful prodigious signs which were reported one after another. And when he sought expiation thereof by sacrifices, the Sooth-layers made answer and said, That they could not perceive that the Gods were appeased and pacified for all that he did. Thus whilst Fabius upon these occasions was kept back, Sempronius was besieged, yes, and by this time assaulted, with fabrics and engines of battery. One mighty great Towre of wood there was erected against the Town. Against which, the Roman Consul raised another from the very wall somewhat higher than it: for that he used the wall (which of it self was of good height) in stead of a ground-work, and planted thereon strong polls and piles of timber to bear up the forehead frame. From thence, at first the souldiers without, defended the Town and Walls with stones, with long poles and perches and other instruments to lance against the assailants. But at length seeing the other turret coming forward even close to the Town wall, they flung thereon at once much firework, and burning matter: at which fires the multitude of armed men for fear leapt headlong down the turret: and withal, they of the Town issued out at two gates at once, discomfited the guards of the enemies, and drove them into their camp: so as that day Anibal was more like one besieged himself, than laying siege unto others. There were of Carthaginians slain about fourteen hundred: many more were taken prisoners alive, such as about the walls and their Corps dead food careles and negligent, fearing nothing less than a fallly out of the Town, and were suddenly as unwares taken and surprised. Gracchus founded the turret, and caused his men to retire within the Walls, before the enemies after their suddain fight could be rallied together. The morrow after, Anibal (supposing that the Consul in his suit for this happy hand, would come into the field to fight a let battail) arranged himself in array between his Camp G and Cumes. But after that, he saw no stirring at all from the usual guard and defence of the City, and nothing put to the rash hazard of doubtful hope, he retired to Tifata, without any good at all done.

At the very same time that the siege was raised before Cumes, Titus Sempronius surnamed Longus, fought fortuhatly in Lucania before Grumentum, with Hanno the Carthaginian: slew more than two thousand of his enemies, lost himself two hundred and eighty men, and went away with 41 ensignes. Hanno thus driven out of the confines of Lucania, retired himself back into the country of the Brutii: And M. Fulvius the Pretor, recovered by force from the Hilpines.

"it be lawful so to say) were they never so angry against us. Howbeit assuredly, for this summer I "season, we have been divers and sundry times so spoiled and walked, not only whiles you are a"live and safe, but also (which is more) present in place, where you might both hear, in manner,
 "the wailing and weeping of our wives and children, and also see our houses on a light fire: So it
 "seemeth it was M. Marcellus and not Annibal that had the victory at Cannæ. And the Romans "boast and say, That you are good at the first pull only, and when you have once let lie and lan"guish the Javelin (as it were) out of your hands, you are clean done, and can abide no longer. We
 "warred almost an hundred years with the people of Rome, without help either of foreign Cap"tain, or army of strangers: save that for two years only, Pyrrhus with the aid of our soldiers, "rather increased his own strength, than by any power of his defended us. But we list not to make
 "vaunt and boast of fortunate success and brave victories, namely, how we subdued and put under "the yoke two Consuls, and two consular armies: nor of other noble exploits which hapned to "our joy and honor. And as for the crosses and adversities that befell us during that time, we may "report them with less grief and indignation, than those that this day light upon us. Then in "those days, mighty great Dictators with their Generals of Horsemen, two Consuls at once,
 "with their two royal hosts, entered our territories, having sent out before hand their espials and "scouts, and led forth their soldiers to make spoil, under their colours and ensigns, arranged in "good order of battail, and seconded throng behind. Now are we exposed as it were to be "prey of one only garrison, and that but a small one, left for the guard and defence of Nola. For,
 "now they overrun all our confines and borders, not by bands and companies in warlike wise, but "like Thieves and Robbers, more craftily and negligently, than if they ranged about for their "pleasure in the Roman territory. The only cause is this, because your self make no reckoning to "protect us, and all our own youth (which if they were at home were able to defend us) serveth "under your banner and standard. But I know neither you, nor your army at all: if I should not be "persuaded and believe that he whom I wot well to have discomfited and put to flight so many "Roman armies, were soon able to defeat and oppress these robbers that wander about our coun"try, stragling without leaders, and without their colours disorderly whither they list, according "to the vain hope of pillage that healeth them here and there, and, as every one gapeeth for prizes, "which they shall never get. No doubt but if you put forth a few of your Numidians, they will "soon fall into their hands: Send but unto us a garrison to succour us, you shall quickly discom"fit that other at Nola; in case you judge not us (whom you have thought worthy to be your coun-"federates) now unworthy to be defended after you have received us into your protection. Here-
 "unto Annibal made this answer again, and said: That the Hircinis and Samnites bided up all at "once together: they declared their calamities and losses, they craved aid and succour, and they "made complaint that they were neither guarded by him, nor regarded of him. Whereas they "should have first made declaration of their harms: after, sued for help, and last of all, if they "might not obtain, then and not afore they should have complained, that they had deluged his "helping hand in vain. Howbeit he promised, that he would not bring his army into the territory, "either of the Hircinis or the Samnites, lest himself also should be chargeable and troublesome unto "them; but into the next quarters belonging to the allies of the Romans: by spoiling and wasting "whereof, both he would fill his soldiers hands, and also with the terror thereof, let their ene"mies far enough off from them. And as for the managing of the Roman war, like as the battel
 "of Thrasymenus, was more noble than that of Trebia; and the field of Cannæ more memorable,
 "than that of Thrasymenus: even so would he make the memorial of Cannæ dim and obscure, and "regard of one greater victory yet, and more renowned than the other. With this answer, and "with honourable rewards besides, he dismissed the Embassadors, and gave them their dispart.
 "And leaving a small guard to keep the Hill Tifata, he marched in person with the rest of his ar"my against Nola. Thither also was Hannibal come, out of the country of the Brutii, with the sup"plies that he brought from Carthage, and the Elephants. Where, after Annibal had pitched his "Tents not far from the Town, and made diligent enquiry, he found, that the case was far other"wise, than it was reported by the Embassadors of his associates. For Marcellus bare not him"self in any of his actions, so as it might be truly said, that he blindly committed ought to the ha"zard of fortune, or rashly adventured upon the enemy. For he never went a plundering without "his scouts and espials, without setting strong guards in due places, whereunto he might retire
 "himself in safety: but had a good eye afore him, and a wary regard and heedful foresight, as if he "were to encounter with Annibal in person. And even then at that time, when he perceived,
 "that the enemy approached and was coming, he kept his forces within the City: commanding
 "the Senators of Nola, to walk up and down upon the walls, and to survey all over, and espie
 "what the enemies did, or were about. Amongst whom, it hapned, that Hannibal being come under "the very wall, espied Herennius Bassus, and Herius Petrus, whom he called out to a parle. And "when they were gone forth unto him by the permission & leave of Marcellus, he debasing and "treating under soft and the dignity and Majesty of the people of Rome, growing now old in time, and "decaying in force and strength. "Which if they were (quoth he) on both sides equal, as some"times they were, yet seeing they had good experience, how heavy and grievous the government "of the Romans was to all their Allies, and again, how indulgent & gracious Annibal is, even to all "the captives of the Italian nation and name, they should wish rather to be in league & amity with

A "the Carthaginians, than with the Romans. If both Coss, were with their armies at Nola, they "were no more able to match with Annibal, than they were at Cannæ: much less might one tra"itor with a few raw and new soldiers hold out and keep Nola against him. And as for the No-
 "lans themselves, it concerned them much more than it did Annibal, to consider, whether he "should win Nola by force, or enter upon it by surrender and composition. For to be Lord there:
 "he made no doubt, like as he was Master already of Capua and Nucerina: about what odds and diffe"rence there is between the state of Capua and of Nucerina, the Nolans know best themselves, who "are seated (as it were) in the mid way between both. Loath he was to prognosticate so much un"to Nola, what calamities might befall the City, if it were conquered by Annibal: rather yet would
 "B "he give his word and promise, That if they would deliver Marcellus with his garrison, and yield "up Nola unto Annibal his hand, they should themselves, and none but they, sit down and capti"vate under what conditions they would entertain alliance & friendship with Annibal. To the "motion Herennius Bassus framed his answer in this sort: "For many years already there hath been "continual amity between the people of Rome and Nola, and neither of both to this day hath "repented thereof. As for the Nolans themselves, if they had been disposed to turn with the wind, "and to change their faith and allegiance, together with their fortunes, they would have done it
 "long before this: for now it was too late to start & alter. If they had minded to yield themselves
 "unto Annibal, they would never have lent for a garrison of Romans: but since they were now "come to protect and defend them, they had imparted & communicated all their fate with them
 "C "already, and would take such part as they, so long as they had an hour to live. This embarras "Annibal clean besides all hope of gaining Nola by treason. Therefore he beleaguered the town on "every side, and invested it round about like a garland, to the end, that in one instant he might give
 "the assault on every part of the walls. When Marcellus saw him under the walls he set his people "first in battel aray within the gate and then with a great noise and tumult he suddenly sallied out.
 "At their first shock and onset divers of the enemies were beaten down and slain: but after that,
 "they ran from all parts to battel, and were come together with equal forces the fight began to be
 "hot and sharp, and a memorable conflict it had been and few like it, but that it rained and poured
 "down to fast and with so many storms and tempests, that it parted both the battels, and laid the "fight, so for that day, having with that small skirmish kindled their courages, and let their blood in "D "their, they retired back as the Romans within the City, and the Carthaginians to their Camp. How"beit of the Carthage, as there were slain, upon the first rally and charge given, not above thirty,
 "and of the Romans not one man. This tempestuous shower of rain lasted all night long, and con"tinued still, and never gave over until nine of the clock before noon the next day. And therefore,
 "albeit they were sharp set, and their fingers itched on both sides to be a fighting, yet for that day
 "they kept within their hold and strength. So the third day Annibal sent out to certain companies in "the territory about Nola, for to forage and fetch in booties: which, so soon as Marcellus un"derstood he presently let his men in array, and entered the field, neither was Annibal for his part "behind. Now there was a mile distance, or very near, between the City and the enemies Camp. In "this space between (for all upon both sides, plain and champaign) they encountered and joyned battel.
 "E "The shout that they set up on both sides, raised and caused to return unto the fight already be"gun the nearest of those cohorts and bands which were gone foraging into the country. The "men of Nola likewise came unto the Romans, and meddled their battel: whom Marcellus com"mended for their forwardness, and gave them in charge to abide in the rearward, to help as occa"sion served, and to carry forth of the skirmish those that were hurt and wounded, and to forbear "fight in any case, unless they had a signal and token given them by him. The fight was doubtful,
 "for both the Generals gave encouragement, effectually, and also the soldiers did their best, and "fought right manfully. Marcellus was earnest with his men to press hard and charge still upon "their enemies, whom they had defeated not three dayes ago, who not many dayes past were put
 "to flight, and driven from Cannæ, and who the year before were beaten from Nola under his con"duct by other soldiers, saying, "That they were not all there in the field, but many of them gone
 "F "ranging abroad in the country, for to lie booties and get prizes. As for them that fought they "were such as were decayed with rioting and following their delights in Capua, as it has with "wine-bibbing in every tavern, whose hunting in every Stews and Brothel-houses, all the while "winter, were become enfeebled in body, spent and wasted utterly. As for that lively strength and "vigour of theirs, it was clean gone: those able and lusty bodies were decayed. Those couragi-
 "ous hearts abated, wherewith they passed over the Pyrenean mountains, and the high cliffs of "the Alps. There remained now nothing but the reliques and shadow of those men to fight, who "are scarce able to bear their very armour, to lift up their arms, and carry their own bodies.
 "Adding withal, that Capua was another Cannæ unto Annibal: there died his warlike prowess,
 "G "there, lost he his military discipline: there was the glorious fame of former dayes buried: there
 "the hope of future time for ever suppressed and stifled. As Marcellus by reproving these and such "like things in his enemies, animated his own soldiers: so Annibal rebuked his men with more
 "sharp words and bitter checks. "I know thee to be (quoth he) the fame arms and weapons,
 "of all at Cannæ. But surely he thinks, when I went to Capua, there to winter. I carried with me "thither, other manner of soldiers than I have brought again from thence. Have ye indeed "much ado to maintain fight with a Roman Lieutenant, Leader of one only Legion and cornet:

wait-laying of wild and ravenous beasts, or by deceitfull fraud of men. Great increase therefore of wealth and much commodity accrued by those cattle, inasmuch as there was made a single Column or pillar of beaten gold, and consecrated in that place, so as the Temple was famous, as well for riches as holiness and devotion. And many times it falleth out, that in such notable places there are attributed some strange miracles. For the report goeth, that there standeth an altar in the very porch of the Temple, the ashes lying whereupon no wind was ever known to blow away.

But to return to Croton. The Cattle thereon on the one side standeth upon the sea, on the other side it bendeth and looketh toward the land. Defended in times past it was only by the natural situation of the ground, but afterwards fortified also with a wall; on that part, whereas Dionysius the Tyrant of Sicily, having gained the back rocks and cliffs behind by craft and guile sometime won it. This Cattle at that time supposed to be strong and safe enough, the Nobles loved and kept, notwithstanding the Bruttii and their own Commons befieged them. At length the Bruttii leaving the Cattle impregnable, by all the forces and assaults that they could make of themselves, were driven of necessity to crave aid of Hanno. Who having assailed to draw and urge the Crotonians to yield upon these conditions, To suffer a Colony of the Bruttii thither to be brought, and there planted; and that thereby a City lying so waste and desolate, might be replenished and peopled again as in ancient time: could not move and persuade any one of them all, but Arifomachus. For all besides, protested and said, they would die before they would be intermingled with the Bruttii, to change their own rites and manner of life, their customs, their laws, and within a while their language also for others that were strange and foreign. Arifomachus alone, seeing that he could not prevail neither by persuasions to induce them to yield, nor find any means to betray the Cattle like as he had done the town before, fled away to Hanno. Shortly after, certain Embassadors from Laeris, by the licence and permission of Hanno, entered the Cattle, and persuaded them to be content for to be translated to Laeris, rather than to abide and stand out the extremity: saying, that they had sent Embassadors already to that intent unto Annibal, and had got a grant at his hands, that they might to do. So they abandoned Croton, and the Crotonians were brought down to the sea side and embarked, and the whole multitude despoiled to Laeris.

In Apollonia the very winter season was not quiet between the Romans and Annibal. Senpronius the Consul wintered at Luceria, and Annibal not far from him in Arpi: and as they could by opportunity, or take their vantage, of the one side or the other, there passed some light skirmishes between them. But the Romans had always the better, and every day more than other, became more wary and feared from all trains and deceitfull snares of the enemy.

In Sicily the Romans found a great change, and all out of order, by reason that King Hiero was dead, and the Crown translated to his Nephew, or some son, Hieronymus: being yet a child, not like to use his own liberty with moderation, and much less to sway the Kingdom and Scepter with discretion. His guardians and friends glided into the protection and government of such a nature, and were ready enough to plunge him headlong into all vice and wickedness. Which King Hiero foreseeing, was willing (by report) in his latter daies, to have left Syracusa free and at liberty, to the end that so noble a kingdom, acquired and established by good means, should not under the Lordly dominion of a child to the great obloquy and shame of the world, be ruined and come to nought. But his daughters with tooth and nail crossed this his designment, and made full reckoning, that the child should only bear the name of a King, but the government of the whole State should wholly rest in them and their husbands, Andronodorus and Zoilus: who were the principall guardians, left to oversee the young Prince. And an easie matter it was not, for an aged man, now fourscore years old and ten, so hardly laid at day and night, by the fair speeches, and feminine flatteries of his daughters, to keep his mind free, and to apply and convert it to intend private regards, and the publique consideration of the State. "And therefore he left fifteen tutors to oversee and govern the child, whom he bestowed upon his death-bed, even when he was going out of this world, to maintain entire and unpotted, the faithfull allegiance to the Romans, which he had kept and observed inviolate for the space of fifty years: and to let to their helping hand willingly, to direct the young Prince above all, to tread in his steps, and to follow that discipline wherein he had been nurtured and taught. After he had given this charge, and yielded up his breath, the guardians came abroad, brought forth the Kings left will and testament, and shewed the young Prince in the open assembly of the people and well near fifteen years of age he was.) Where some few, such as were bestowed here of purpose within the press of the assembly for to shout and shew testimony of their joy and good liking, approved with open voice, and allowed the Kings will: whereas all the rest feared as Orphans in a City bereaved of their King, and (as it were) become fatherless, and feared all things that might ensue. The King was interred and his funerals solemnized, with the love and kind affection of his people and subjects, more than with any studious care and diligence of his own friends that were nearest to him. After this, Andronodorus removed from about the Prince all other guardians but himself, giving out oftentimes that Hieronymus was past a child, and able to govern of himself as King. Thus by depositing the Protectorship, which was common to him and many others, he took upon him and usurped the power and authority of them all. Hard it was even for a right good King and well governed, that should succeed after Hiero, to find favour and win grace among the Syracusan: so heartily they affected and loved King Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if he had been willing and desirous, that by his vicious and wicked life, they should have a great misse of his grandfather, and with again for him: at the very first sight, when he shewed himself abroad in open place,

A place, declared unto the world, what difference and great odds there was. For they who so many years together had never seen Hiero, nor his son Gelo, either in habit of apparel, or in any other ornaments and port, differing from all other Citizens, now beheld him in his purple robes, with his regal Crown and Diadem, attended with his guard and train of armed pensioners: yea, and otherwhile, after the manner of Demis the Tyrant riding forth of his Court and Palace, in a Chariot drawn with four white steeds. This proud pomp and lately array was accompanied and suited with seemable qualities and conditions. He contemned and despised all men: he scorned most proudly to give audience to humble suppliants; and sent them away with reproachfull terms and taunts. And not only strangers, but also his very guardians hardly might have access unto him: and to conclude, his lulls and delights whereto he gave himself, were new and strange: his cruelty that he exercised outragious and inhumane. So dread and terrible was he to all, that some of his Tutors, either by making themselves away, or by voluntary exile were driven to prevent and avoid the danger of cruel torments. Of whom, three only, who alone had more familiar recourse into the Court, to wit, Andronodorus and Zoilus, the sons in law of King Hiero, that had married his daughters, and one Thersa, had little or no ear given unto them in other matters: but whilst two of them drew toward the Carthaginians, and Thersa to the Roman alliance: with their arguing, debating, and dispute, they otherwhile turned the mind of the young King to hearken and give audience to their opinions. Now it hapned that there was a conspiracy intended against the life and person of the Tyrant, and the same detected by one Cals, the companion and playfellow of Hieronymus, and of the same age: one who ever from his childhood had been familiarly acquainted with him, and inward to all his secrets. This revealer of the conspiracy, could appeale and nominate all the conspirators, only Theodorus, by whom himself was made privy to the treason, and solicited to be a complice therein. The party was apprehended instantly, and delivered unto Andronodorus to be tortured: Who at the first without delay confessed himself to be guilty, but concealed all the rest that were accessories. At the last, when he had been torn, mangled, and dismembered, with most dolorous torments, and intolerable (or any man to endure: preceding and making semblance, that he could abide no longer pains: distressed not for all this the guilty persons indeed, but accused the innocent, and said finally, that Thersa was the first deviser of the whole plot: and unless they had born themselves, and relied upon to mighty an head, to let them on work, they would never have attempted so dangerous an enterprise. He appeached also some other of the Tyrant his guard and household servants and daily waiters: even such as came into his mind during the time of his dolours and pains, and bewailed his groans he imagined to be such, as whose lives might be best spared, and deaths least lamented. The naming of Thersa especially made the Tyrant to believe, that the detection founded to be a very truth indeed: whereupon the man was immediately led to execution and put to death: and the other innocents, as clear as himself, tasted of the same cup and suffered with him for company. As for the conspirators themselves, albeit one of their fellows was along while put to bitter and extreme torture, there was not one of them that either hid his head or made an escape: so assured confidence had they in the resolute constancy and faithfull promise of Theodorus: and such power and strength had Theodorus himself, to keep close the secrets committed unto him. Now when Thersa was once dispatched out of the way, who only was the means to hold them in, and to bind them to their alliance and allegiance to the Romans: then forthwith they began openly to incline to rebellion, and sent as Embassadors for the same purpose, two noble young Gentlemen, Hippocrates and Epicles unto Annibal: From whom also they were sent back again in Embassy. These were both born at Carthage, but descended in blood from the Syracusan by their grandfather, that was from thence banished: and were themselves by the mothers side meer Carthaginians. By enticement of these two Embassadors, a League was concluded between Annibal and the Tyrant of Syracusa. And Annibal was content that they should abide till as Leigers in the Tyrants Court.

F When Appius Claudius the Prætor and Lord Deputy of the Province of Sicily heard these news, he addressed straightwaies Embassadors unto Hieronymus: who saying, that they were come to renew the alliance which they had with his grandfather, had scorned audience given them to deliver their message, and were dismissed and sent away by Hieronymus with a scump, demanding of them by way of a scoff, "How they had sped at the battell of Cume. For I can hardly believe" (quoth he) that all is true which the Embassadors report of that field: and I would gladly know the certain truth & thereupon deliberate and take counsell, which side I were best to take. The Roman Embassadors said, they would repair again unto him when he could begin once to give audience with gravity and in good earnest to their embassy: and so after they had warned & admonished, rather than prayed and entreated him, not to change, but to stand to the first covenant and promises, they departed. Then Hieronymus sent his Legates to Carthage, for to confirm the League with the Carthaginians, according to the alliance and amity made with Annibal. In which it was capitulated and covenanted, that when they had expelled the Romans out of Sicily (which would shortly come to pass, in case they sent thither ships and a power of men) the river Himerus, which (as it were) divided the Island in the midle, should confine and limit, both the Syracusan kingdom and the dominion of the Carthaginians. After this, being puffed up with the fair flattering speeches of such as were about him, who suggested unto him, to remember and call to mind, that not only King Hiero was his grandfather, but also King Pyrrhus by the mothers side: he sent Embassadors unto the Carthaginians, to give them from him to understand, That he de-med it right and meer, that all Sicily wholly should lie unto his dominion: and that the Empire of Italy only belonged properly to the Carthaginian people to acquire and conquer. This levity and vain glorious humour they neither wondered at, as a strange thing in a giddy-brained young man; nor yet greatly blamed and found fault with, so long as they might allinge him wholly and alienate him altogether from the friendship of the Romans. But all things in him turned to his overthrow and utter confusion. For whiles Hippostratus and Epicides were set alone with two thousand souldiers, for to found and sollicit the Cities rebellion, that were held by the garrisons of the Romans: and himself in person entered the country of the Leontini, with all the rest of the forces, which amounted to fifteen thousand foot and horse together: certain conspirators, who chanced all to be his own souldiers, and bare arms under him, possessed themselves of a yake house, standing over a narrow lane, through which the King was wont to go down into the market place of the City: there when other food armed and well appointed, and waiting when the King should pass by, one of the conspirators (whose name was Indigeminus), had given him in charge, because he was one of the squires of the Kings body, when the King approached near unto the door of the said house, to find some occasion or other, in that straight passage, to slay the troop and train that followed behind. And so he effected indeed, and put in execution, as it was agreed and contrived. For Indigeminus, lift up his foot, making as though he would looke and slack a freight knot of his sho-latchet, which hindring his going, whereby he flaid the company that followed after, so long, that the King passing by alone without his guard of armed men about him, was assaulted mean while, and received sundry stabs and wounds, before they could come to rescue and save him. Hereupon arose an outcry and tumult, and divers of the guard let flie at Indigeminus, who by this time was ready to oppose himself and to award all venues: howbeit he was hurt only in two places, and so escaped. The guard seeing the King there lying dead, fled away as they could. The murderers, some of them betook themselves into the market-place, unto the multitude, that rejoiced for the recovery of their freedom: others repaired to Syracuse, to intercept and prevent the designments of Andronicus, and other favourites and followers of the late King.

While things stood in these uncertain and doubtful terms, Appius Claudius foreseeing war like to ensue, and that very shortly, addressed his letters unto the Senat of Rome, certifying them that Sicily enclosed already, and was at hand to side with the people of Carthage, and with Annibal. Himself in the mean time bent all his forces toward the frontiers of the Province and confines of that Kingdom, to withstand and hinder all the proceedings and enterprises of the Syracusians.

In the end of that year, Q. Fabius, by order from the Senate, fortified Puteoli, a town of merchandise, and which in time of wars began to be much resorted unto and frequented, and there he placed a garrison. From whence as he was in his journey toward Rome against the great Election of Magistrates, he proclaimed the solemn assembly of the people for that purpose, to be the next Comitall day that followed upon his arrival thither: and so it fell out, that he went along the City side immediately upon his journey, and came down into Mars field before he entered the City. Upon which day, when it hapned that their voices nominated T. Otacilius and M. Emilius Regillus for Consuls, then Q. Fabius after silence made, rose up, and delivered this or such like speech, for Consuls, "If either we had peace in Italy, or war at leastwise with those enemies, with whom if we deal "neither negligently or unadvisedly, the matter were not much, nor importing great hazard and danger: I would think, that whosoever disturbed and crossed your favours and free affections "which ye bring hither with you into this solemn place of assembly, to bestow honours and dignities upon whom ye please had but small and no regard of your liberty and freedom. But since that in this war and with this enemy, never any General of ours failed in the managing of his affairs, but it, of us dear, and we had some great foil and overthrow: it behoveth you, that "with what mind and carefull regard ye enter the field to combat in your armour, in the same ye "should come hither into this Mars field in your gowns, and so proceed by your suffrages to elect your Consuls: and that every one of you should thus say to himself, I am to nominate a Consul to march with General Annibal. No longer since, than this very year, when as before "Capua, Jubellius Taurica, the bravest horseman and Cavalier of all the Campans defied all the Romans, and best man at arms, was chosen to encounter him. In times past, against a Gaul that offered combat upon the bridgeover Anio, our ancestors lent our Manlius, a courageous, resolute, and puissant Champion. Neither can I deny, but upon such another occasion not many years after, the like trust was reposed in M. Valerius, who took arms likewise against another Gaul that challenged single fight. And even as we are desirous, & wish to have our foot and horsemen both, more valorous and hardly than our enemies, or if that will not be, at leastwise equal unto them, and able to countermatch them: even so let us be careful to find out a General of our own comparable every way to the chief commander of our enemies. And when we have chosen the best warrior and Captain in the whole City, then presently without any longer delay, being elect and created for one whole year, he shall be sent to march with an old captain, that hath ever continued in the field, one who is not enclosed within compalls of time, nor restrained & gaged within the straight bounds of law, but that he may order & manage every thing, according as the occasions and present occurrences of war do require: whereas, by that time

of Q. Fabius to the people of Rome.

A "that we can make all ready and dispose every thing in order, and set in hand to begin our affairs, "the year is come about and clean gone. Now for much as enough hath been said what manner "of Consuls ye ought to create: it remaineth to speak on what of them, whom the past "five Century so highly favoureth, and is so much affected unto. A, for M. Emilius Regillus he "is the Flamin of Quirinus, whom neither we may take from his ministry of Sacrifices, nor yet "retain and keep him still, but we shall neglect either the service of the gods, or the due care and "regard of the wars. Othacilius hath married my sisters daughter, and hath fair issue by her. But "your favours and good turns shewed both to me, and also to my ancestors, are not of so small "account and reckoning, but that I ought to prefer the Common-weal before all private "regards and alliances whatsoever. Every mariner, yea, and my passenger is able to pierce and rule "a Ship in a calm water: but when a buffetting tempest is up, and the vessel tossed in a troubled "furious sea, and carried away with violent force of the winds, then there had need come a man "indeed, and a skillful Pilot to sit at the helm, and to guide the helm. We fail not now in a still "and quiet sea: but we have been drenched, and in a manner drowned, with some storms already: "and therefore we ought to have exceeding great care and be well advised, arched, whom "we have to be the steers-man. In a matter of less consequence and importance, we have made "triall, O T. Otacilius, of your knowledge and service: and you have not given us yet to good "proof of your vertue and prowess therein, that we should put you in trust with the managing "of greater affairs. A Navy whereof you were Admiral, we rigged and trimmed to your hands "this year for three causes: first, to annoy and spoil the sea-coast of Affrick: secondly, to defend "and keep to our behoof the ports and havens of Italy: last of all, and above all, to empeach and "slay all supplies and new succours, together with money munition, and victuals, for being transported unto Annibal from Carthage. If Othacilius have performed, I say not all these things, "but in any one quit himself well, to the good and benefit of the State, Elect him Comiti hardily and good leave have you. But if it appear, that while you had the rule of the Armada, all "things (that a man would have) passed out of the country unto Annibal, with as great safety "and security as if the seas had been open and void of enemies: If, I say, the sea coast of Italy "hath all this year been more in danger, and subject to sustain harm, than that of Affrick: what "reason can you allege, wherefore the people of Rome should chiose you above all others, to "oppose as Captain, to confront their enemy Annibal. If you were Consul in place already, we "would judge it requisite and good to nominate and create a Dictator, according to the example of our forefathers: neither could you take snuff or be offended, that there should be found "in the City of Rome a better warrior, and more sufficient than your self, And surely it concerneth "no man more than you, O Othacilius, to see that there be not imposed a burden upon your "shoulders, under which you should fail and fall down right. Wherefore I advise and exhort you "all as much as possibly I can, in electing of Consuls this day, to carry that mind and due care, as full provisions, as ye would, in case ye were standing armed in battell array: and to chiose out "of hand two General Captains, under whose conduct and government ye should presently "fight a field: and make chioice of such Consuls, unto whom our children were to take the oath "of allegiance: at whole commandment they shoud come and assemble together, and under "whole charge and protection they might willingly serve as souldiers. The pool Therapsin, the plain before Cannae, are heavy examples for us to remember: but yet they serve for good precedents unto us, to teach us how to avoid the like mischief another time. So the prerogative Century of the younger and puny sort, was called again to a new & rutiny, and to give their voices again. Whereat when T. Otacilius began to cry out aloud and say very stoutly, that Fabius his drift was to continue Consul still, and therewith grew to be clamorous and troublesome to the assembly: the Consul commanded the Licitors to cry out unto him, and to lay hold upon him. And forthwith as yet he had not entered into the City, but came down straightways into the Mars field presently from his journey, he put them in mind, that the knitches of the rods, together with the axes "F within them should be born before him. And in the mean time the prerogative Century began afresh to give their voices: and by it were nominated Consuls Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. M. Velleius the third time: and all the Centuries besides without any jarring and variance elected the very same. One of the former Prators likewise was chosen again namely Q. Fabius Flaccus. And other new created, that is to say, T. Otacilius Crassus the one, and Q. Fabius the Consul his son, who at that time was Adile of the chair and of the Curule. After the Election of the Prators was ended and finished, there passed an Act and decree of the Senate that Q. Fabius should extraordinarily have the charge of the City, and be Prator there: and that he above all other, when the Consuls were gone forth to the wars should be President and Governour of the City of Rome. There fell great rain and much snow that year, whereby the Tiber overflowed the fields, overthrew many houses, and overwhelmed much cattel and people, so as they utterly perished.

Thus in the fifth year of the second Punick war, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Velleius the third time, when they entered their Consulship, set the City on thinking and musing of them more than usually had been known. For in many years there had not been the like couple of Consuls. And old men would talk and say, that even so were Max. Rullus and P. Decius declared Consuls against the Gauls war: and after them likewise, Papirius and Cornelius against the Samnites and Brutii: against the people also of Lucania and Tarentum. M. C. L.

soon as he heard that Hanno lay encamped within three miles of the City, by the river Colores, he there waited the Country, he himself issued, and pitched his tents within a mile of the enemy; where he assembled all his souldiers together, purposing to make a speech unto them. He had with him the Legions that consisted most of volunteers, who already two years before, had been more willing to deserve their freedom in silent manner, than to challenge and demand it with open mouth. Howbeit, he perceived when he departed out of the winter harbors, that they began to murmur and grumble in the army when they marched, and to complain in this wise, What shall we never serve in the quality and condition of freemen? Whereupon he had written unto the Senate, and shewed unto them, not so much what they desired, as what they desired to have: certifying them, that unto that day they had done him good and valiant service: and wanted nothing I save only their freedom, but they might go forth and lawful souldiers. Whereupon the Lords of the Senate had put it into his discretion for to do by them what he thought was expedient for the Common-wealth. Thereupon, before that he should join battell with the enemy, he pronounced these words before them all, and said: "That now the time was come, of obtaining and acquiring that liberty, which so long they hoped after. For the next morrow they were to affront their enemies with banner displayed, and to fight in a plain and open ground, where without fear of any ambush the triall might be made with more force and true valour: Whoever therefore, should bring me the head of an enemy, him my pleasure & will is, to make free immediately: and who so loatheth ground and retreateth, him will I challenge as a bondslave ought to be punished. Now every man hath his state and condition lying in his own hands: and of your freedom, I not only myself will assure you, but for further warrant, ye have the allowance of M. Marcellus the Coe, and generally of all the LL. of the Council, whose advice I sought, and who committed unto my hands the ordering of your liberty. And withall he read the Consuls letters, and the decree of the Senate in that behalf. Whereat they set up a mighty cry, in token of their assent and approbation, and called for battell, and earnestly urged to give the signal out of hand. Then Gracchus having pronounced the next day for battell, dismissed the assembly. The souldiers were joyous, especially such as were to have their freedom in reward of one daies service, and bestowed the rest of that day in making their armor and weapons ready. The morrow after, so soon as the trumpets began to sound: they were the first of all other that presented themselves before the General his pavilion, well appointed and ready to fight: and by the sun rising Gracchus led forth his men into the field in order of battell. The enemies for their parts were nothing behind, but forward to encounter them. They were in number seventeen thousand of footmen, most of them Brutii and Lucians: of horsemen, twelve hundred: among whom there were very few Italians, the rest were in number all Numidians and Moors. The fight was sharp, and continued long, and for four hours it was not seen which side had the better. No one thing else troubled the Romans more than their enemies heads, which were the prizes to redeem the souldiers liberty. For as any had killed their enemies lustily, they were slain first, with much ado, to cut off their heads, within the troublesome press and tumult, and so to lose time: and after that, by reason that their right hands were employed, and occupied with holding the same heads, it fell out, that the best souldiers gave over fighting, and the feeble dastards and fearful cowards only were to maintain the conflict. Which when the Marshalls of the field and Colonels reported unto Gracchus, and namely, that there was not a souldier of the enemies standing that was wounded and hurt any more: but that they lay along were hacked and hewed as it were by butchers: and that his own souldiers instead of swords, held their enemies heads in their hands: he commanded in all haste, that upon a signal given, they should fling away their heads from them, and charge afresh upon the enemies. For their valour and prowess (saith he) was well enough seen already, and evidently testified, and so long as they were so hardy men and bare themselves so manfully, they should not need to doubt of their liberty. Then the conflict began to be renewed, and withall the horsemen charged the enemies: whom the Numidians received with equal valour: inasmuch as the fight of the Cavalry was as bravely performed, as the other of the Infantry: whereupon once again the victory seemed doubtful, to which part it would incline: whilst in both hosts the Generals reproached and debated the adverse part. Gracchus said that the Brutii and Lucians were so often vanquished and subdued by the Roman ancestors: and Hanno again girded at the Romans, calling them bondslaves, and souldiers let logic out of prison and houses of correction. At the last, Gracchus declared aloud, and said, They were not to hope at all for their liberty, unless that day their enemies were discomfited and put to flight. This one word of his at length set their blood in such an heat, that they raised a fresh shout, as if they had been cast again in a new mould, they charged upon the enemies so violently, that they could no longer be resisted and withstood. First, they that fought in the vanguard of the Carthaginians were put out of order: then they about their standards and ensignes: and last of all, the whole battell was driven back and gave ground. Whereupon they fairly turned their backs, and fled so fast one upon another into their Camp, in such fear and fright, that not so much as at the very gates, nor upon the rampier, they staid once, and turned again to make head: so as the Romans following them hard at the heels into their camp, as it were in one train pell-mell made a new skirmish even within the rampier of their enemies. Where the fight was not so cumbersome, by reason of the frightfulness of the room, wherein they were pent, but the massacre and execution was as cruel and bloody. The prisoners also that were among the enemies, in this confused confusion, tumult, joyed themselves and stuck close together: and having caught up some weapons, helped

A helped forward the victory: and either charging upon the backs of the Carthaginians slew them, or else hindered them in their flight and running away. So of that great army, there were not all out two thousand (and the most part of them horsemen) that escaped with the Generall himself: all the rest were either slain or taken prisoners: and of military enliges were carried away forty five twain. Of the Victors, there died slain upon two thousand. All the spoil, but only the prisoners, was granted to the souldiers. The cattell also was reserved, as many as within thirty daies the right owners could justly make claim unto for their own. When they were returned laden with booties and pillage into the Camp, there were almost 4000 of the voluntary souldiers, who had fought but faintly, and brake not into the Camp with the rest: who for fear of punishment, were a little hill not far from the Camp, and kept it for their hold. But the morrow after being taken thence by the Colonels, they repaired again to the camp at what time as Gracchus had summoned his souldiers to an assembly. Where, after that the Pro-Consul first had rewarded his old souldiers with military gifts, according to each one his prowess and good service in that battell: then as concerning the volunteers, he said thus much, That he had rather they were all commended by him good and bad, one with another, than that one of them that day should have of any punishment: and therefore he pronounced them all free in the name of God to the benefit, happiness, and felicity, both of Common-wealth and also of themselves. At which word, they lifted up their voices aloud with exceeding cheerfulness and alacrity: and one while they clasped and embraced one another in their arms, with gratulation and great joy: another while again, they held their hands toward heaven, wishing and praying at the gods hands, all good blessing for the people of Rome, and for Gracchus especially. Then (quoth Gracchus) before that I had made you all alike, and to have equal part in the right and privilege of freedom, would not it be upon any of you, either the mark of a stout and hardy souldier, or the note of a faint-hearted and heally coward? But now that I have discharged my self of the trust committed unto me by the Common-wealth, to the end, that all difference between prowess & cowardice, should not be forgotten all together and perished: I will take express order that the names of them, whose conscience accused them of faint fighting, and avoiding the hazard of battell, and therefore crevice with drew themselves apart, be brought unto me. And when they are cited and called to me, every one by his name, I will compell them to take a corporal oath (quoth he) that he will be upon himself. D "long as they shall continue in souldiery, they neither eat nor drink but standing upon their feet. And this punishment (I am sure you will willingly take in good part: when ye shall consider better of it, and see that you could not have had an easier note of disgrace and shame for your filie hearts and slender service. Then he gave the signal to truss up bag and baggage, and founded the remove, and so dislodged: and thus the souldiers carrying and driving before them their booties, all the way disposing themselves to merrily and jocund, returned to Arventum: as it they had come from some great dinner, upon a solemn and festive day, and not from fighting a bloody battell. All the people of Beneventum came forth in great numbers to meet them at the gates, welcomed the souldiers, bad them joy, embraced them, and invited them to their houses, to give them entertainment and lodging. The boords were spread in every mans court-yard, and furnished with store of viands: they willed them to come and make merry with them, and requested Gracchus to give his souldiers leave to feast and make good cheer. And Gracchus was content, and upon this condition, that they should all eat their meals abroad in the open street. Then all things were brought forth, and set upon the tables at every mans door. The volunteers took their repast and refection either with their caps on their heads, or else covered their brows with white wooll, some sitting, some standing: waiting and serving one another at the table, and eat their meat, and fed with them together. This was such a worthy sight and solemnity, that Gracchus after he was returned to Rome, caused the representation and resemblance of the celebration of this day, to be drawn and portrayed in colours and the picture to remain in the Temple of the goddess Liberty, which his father caused to build in the mount Aventine, of certain fines and forfeits, and afterwards there dedicated it.

Whiles these matters thus passed at Beneventum, Annibal having spoiled and harried the territory about Naples, removed toward Nola, and there encamped before the town. Whom when the Consul understood to be coming, he sent for Pomponius the Pro-Prator, together with that army which lay encamped above above Stessilia, and provided to meet with the enemy, minding presently to bid him battell. He sent out Claudius Nero with the strength of his horsemen in the dead time of the night at a back gate, that was farthest from the enemy, giving him in charge to cast about closely, and fetch a compass, and fair and softly to follow the enemy, as he marched: and when he perceived the battell was begun, then to come forward, and set upon him behind on his back. But whether it were that Nero missed of the way, or having not time enough, could not put this policy in execution, I know not. In his absence the armies joyed battell, wherein no doubt the Romans had the better hand. Howbeit, for default that the horsemen were not there in due time, the order of the direction failed, and took not effect. And notwithstanding that the enemies gave ground and retreated, yet Marcellus durst not follow hot upon them, but founded the retreat to his own men, being in a good way of victory. Yet were there by report above 2000 of the enemies slain that day, but of Romans under 400. And about the sun set, Nero who all the day and night past had tied horse and man, and done no good, and now returned, without so much as a sight of the enemy, was sharply rebuked of the Coe, inasmuch, that he gave him this check to choak him, That it was long of him and none else, that they had not cried quittance H with the enemy for the overthrow & iois received at Canne. The day following Marcellus came down again into the field, ready to give battel. But Annibal, as one that secretly confided himself to be overcome, held himself close within the strength of his Camp. And on the third day, giving over all hope to get Nola, (an enterprise that never sped well) he departed in the still time of the night toward Isontium, upon a better and more assured hope to gain it by treason.

The civil affairs at Rome were managed with no less courage at home, than the wars in the field abroad. For the Censors, who by reason that the City treasure waxed low, were eased of their care offsetting on the publick works of the City by the great: and having nothing else to do, employed themselves in reformation of mens manners and chastising of vices and enormities, which sprung upon war: like as mens bodies, which by long and lingering sickness grown weak, ever and anon breed new diseases. And first they consented before them those Citizens, who after the battel at Canne, were (by report) minded and disposed to leave the Common-weal, and to depart out of Italy. The ring-leader of them all was L. Cecilius Metellus, who hapned then to be Treasurer of the City. He, with the rest of that crew who were culpable in the same crime, were commanded of the City. He, with the rest of that crew who were culpable in the same crime, were commanded to make their answer and plead their causes: but when they were not able to clear and quit themselves, the Censors charged them openly, that they had given out certain words, and made speeches against the State, tending to a sedition and conspiracy, fort to abandon Italy. Next after them were cited to appear those cunning and crafty companions above said, who with their over-subtil interpretation and contriving of words, would seem to avoid their oath: those captives, I mean, K who being on their way to Rome, came back secretly into the Camp of Annibal, and took themselves freed and discharged, because they had sworn to return again. But these and the others afore rehearsed, as many as served upon the City hories, had their hories taken from them, were displaced out of their Tribe: and condemned all to lose their voices, and to serve without City pay. Neither were the Censors careful to correct the Senat and reform the degree of the Knights only, but also they proceeded to raise out of the publick checkroll of the younger Citizens, the names of all those who for four years space had not served in wars, as many, I say of them, as could not justly plead and alledge either ordinary immunity by law, or sickness for their excuse. And of those were found guilty above 2000: who were awarded to be Araris, and all of them to be removed out of their tribe. And besides this shameful disgrace and note of ignominy awarded by the Censors, there passed a heavy decree of the Senat against them, to wit, That all they whom the Censors had thus ordered and noted, should be bound to serve on foot in the wars, and be confined and sent over into Sicily, to the residue there of the army that remained at Canne. And no other time of service and warfare was limited unto this sort of the soldiers, but until the enemy were driven clean out of Italy.

Whiles the Censors as is aforesaid, upon occasion that the Cities stock was so decayed, gave over and forbore to bargain for the repairing and maintenance of the Churches and holy Temples, and for the finding and provision of chariot horses for the State, and such like: there reorted unto them a great number of those that were wont at the year to take these bargains at their hands by the great, and for a gross sum of money: who exhorted the Censors to deal in those matters still and to let, and enter into bargain with them: as if the City Chamber wanted no money: making this offer that none of them all would demand payment out of the common Chest, before the wars were fully ended.

Then repaired unto the Censors the Masters of those bondmen, whom T. Sempronius had manumitted and set free at Brundisium, saying that they were sent by the Triumvirs, out of the office of the Bankers, called Mensarii for to receive again their monies, according as they prized and valued their slaves: howbeit, they would not, before the war was finished. And as the hearts of the Commons were thus: notably affected, to sustain and support the poverty of the treasure-house: so the stocks of money also that belonged first to Orphans, and afterwards to widows, began now to be lessened in the Chamber of the City: and they that presented and brought in those money, believed assuredly, that they could not lay them up more sure and safe, than in the publick credit and treasury of the City. And whatsoever out of these stocks was disbursed and defraught for to buy and provide any thing for the Orphans or widows afore said, the treasurers kept a book thereof, and noted it down in a register. This kindnes and benevolence of private persons unto their country, extended it self from the City, even as far as to the Camp: inasmuch, that neither horseman nor Centurion would take their wages, but rebuke and rate them that could find in their hearts to receive their pay terming them no better than mercenaries and hirelings.

Now the Consul lay in Camp before Capitulum, which City was kept with a garrison of two thousand Campans, and seven hundred of Annibal's soldiers. They had for their Captain and Commander one S. Silius Metellus, sent thither by Cn. Magnus Atellanus: who for that year was Magistrus of Capua. He put the bondslaves and Commons in arms, intermingled one with another, so to enter upon the Camp of the Romans, whiles the Consul was busied in attending Capitulum. Fabius was nothing ignorant of all these things, and therefore he sent unto Nola to his Colleague there, signifying unto him, that there was need of a second army to make head against the Campans. Whiles the other was employed about the assault of Capitulum: and telling him besides, that either he must himself come in person, leaving a mean garrison behind him at Nola: or else if he might not be spared from thence, for fear of danger from Annibal,

* The head Magistrus
of Capua.

A Annibal, he would send for T. Gracchus the Pro-Consul, from Brundisium. Upon this message, Marcellus having left in Nola a guard of two thousand soldiers, with the rest of his forces, presented himself before Capitulum: upon whose coming, the Campans who were ready to set forward, staid themselves and were quiet. So both Consuls together jointly began to assault Capitulum: where the Roman soldiers that rashly came under the walls received much hurt: and Fabius seeing little good done, judged it best to retire and give over the enterprise, being a service of small consequence, and nevertheless very dangerous: and to depart from thence, seeing there was business toward of greater importance. But Marcellus contrariwise was of opinion and said, that as there were many things which great warriors were not to attempt: so it they were once taken in hand and the adventure given they were not lightly to be given over and laid aside: inasmuch as in it lay matter of great consequence, for time and reputation, both wises: and so he prevailed, that the enterprise was not neglected and abandoned. And in response thereto were manifested, and all other kinds of fabricks and engines of battery and assault, brought from the City: so as the Campans besought Fabius, that they might depart to Capua in safety. And when some few were gone forth, Marcellus possessed himself of that gate whereunto they went: & then they fell to kill and slay one with another first about the gate: and after they had thus done, they put to like execution those also within the City. Fifty there were of the rabblement of the Campans that first got out of the town, and fled for mercy to Fabius: and they by his guard and safe conduct arrived at Capua. But see Capitulum, through the singing flames of the habitations that craved C protection was by advantage taken of their long price, and temporizing: won by the enemies. The captives so many as were either Campans of Annibal's soldiers, were sent to Rome, and there clapt up still in prisons. But the multitude of the townmen were distributed into sundry Cities adjoyning, and there kept in ward.

At the very same time that the Consuls after their conquest, retired from Capitulum, Gracchus being in the country of the Lucans, and having gathered and enrolled certain cohorts and companies of soldiers out of those parts, sent them out foraging, under the conduct of a Captain of Alles, into the territories of the enemies Napoli encountered them: they fought int, uttering wile out of order and let upon them, and paid his enemies again with the sword and loss, or not much less than that which he had received at Brundisium: and in great haste withdrew himself into the country of the Bruttii for fear lest Gracchus should overtake him.

The Consul Marcellus returned back to Nola, from whence he came, and Fabius sent forward into Samnium to spoil and waste the country, and to recover by force of arms the Cities which had revolted. The Samnites about Candium were piteously and cruelly damned: their villages in all places set on fire, their fields laid waste and destroyed, and great booties both of cattle and people driven away. Six towns forced by assault, namely, Camp. Arvens, Alipha, Cossa, Mela, Enfule, and Orbitanium. In the Lucans country, the town of M. Under, and in Apulia the City Auca was assaulted. In these towns and Cities, there were taken prisoners and slain 2500 of the enemies: of fugitives and runagate traitors there were recovered 570. whom the Consul sent home again to Rome, and being thither come, they were all beaten and scourged with E rods in the Comitium, and then pitched down headling to the earth, from the rock Tarpeia. These exploits were achieved by Q. Fabius, within the compass of a few daies. But Marcellus by occasion that he lay sick at Nola, was hindered from performing any feats of arms. The Praetor likewise Q. Fabius, who had the charge and jurisdiction of the province about Lucania, won before about the same time the town Acris, and fortified a standing camp planted before Arundine.

Whiles the Romans were thus employed about these affairs in divers other places, Annibal was come unto Tarentum, to the exceeding great damage and detriment of all places where he journeyed: but being once arrived in the territory of Tarentum, he began to march and lead his army most peaceably. There he did no harm at all, made no havoc nor once went out of the F high way. And it was evidently seen that all this was done not upon any modesty that appeared either in soldier or Captain, but only to win unto him the hearts of the Tarentines. But when he approached the walls of the City, and saw no commotion, nor intercession from thence upon the discovery of his Vanguard, as he thought he should, he pitched his Camp almost a mile from the town. Now had M. Valerius the Vice-Praetor, who was Admiral of the Fleet at Brundisium, sent T. Fulvius his Lieutenant unto Tarentum, three daies before that Annibal showed himself before the walls. He had mustered and enrolled the flower of the Nobility, and bestowed at every gate, and about the walls where need required, good guards for defence: with such vigilant diligence both day and night, that he gave no opportunity and advantage either to the enemies to adventure any assault, or to the doubtful and untrusty friends to practice any treason. So Annibal, having spent there certain daies in vain, and seeing none of them who repaired unto him at the Lake Avernas either to come themselves, or to send messenger or letters: and perceiving now that he had rashly and foolishly followed vain promises, and so was deluded: dislodged and removed from thence. And even then also he spared the territory of Tarentum, and did no hurt at all: and albeit his fained and counterfeited lenity and mildnes hitherto took no effect: yet he hoped still thereby to corrupt their faithfull allegiance to the Romans: and so he went to Salapia. And (by reason that midsummer was past, and he liked well of that place for a winter harbour) he conveyed thither all the corn out of the Territory of Metapontum and and Heracles. Then he sent out the Numidians and Moors, to fetch booties and prizes from out of the Salentine country, and all the woods and chafes next unto Apulia, from whence they drive of other cattell small store: but of hories especially they brought away great numbers, of which there were four thousand divided amongst the horsemen to be handled, broken, and made gentle.

The Romans seeing there was like to be war in Stetly, & the same not lightly to be regarded: & that the death of the Tyrant there, rather gave the Syracusians good Captains, than wrought any change in their minds, or alteration in the cause: assigned unto M. Marcellus, one of the Consuls, that Iro-ince to govern. Presently upon the murder of Hieronymus, first the souldiers in the Leontin country, began to mutine and make an upore, and boldly spake and said, That the Kings death should be expiate, and his obsequies solemnized with sacrificing the blood of conspirators. But afterwards, when they heard often iterated the sweet name of liberty and freedom restored unto them: and that there was good hope that the souldiers should have a largels dealt amongst them out of the Kings Treasure, and be under the command of Captains of better quality, and having besides all this a bedroil rehearsed unto them of the Tyrant his cruelty and foul facts, and of more filthy and loathsome lusts their affections were so altered, that they suffered the body of their King to lie above ground unburied, whom a litle before, they so greatly desired and wished for. Now as concerning the conspirators, whiles the rest of them remained behind to assure and possesse themselves of the army, Theodorus and Sofis took the Kings hories and rode poff, as hard as ever they could to Syracuse, for to surprize upon a sudden all his followers and favourites (who knew nothing of that which was done) J and fall upon them at unawares: but they were prevented not only by the time (which above all other things in such cases is most swift) but also by a courier one of the Kings servants. Whereupon Andronodorus had seized beforehand of that part of the City which is called the Island, together with the Castle, and all other places that he could come at which were thought of any good importance: and then he fortified with good guards, Theodorus and Sofis being entered within the City at Hesperus after sun-setting, in the twy-light and shutting in of the evening: and shewing the Kings royal robes all embued with blood, and the ornament and attire likewise of his head, he passed through Thicia, and called aloud unto the people to fight all at once for their liberty, and to arm themselves, and willed them to repair into Acradina. The people some of them ran out into the streets, others flood in their entrees and porches, divers looked out at the windows from within their houses, and asked what the matter might be? Every place rhyone with torch and cresset-light, and was filled withundry garbolls and hurlyburies. As many as were in arms gathered together in the open places of the City: those that were unarmed, took down off the Temple of Jup. Olympian the spoils of the Gauls & the Illyrians, which the people of Rome had given as a present to K. Hiero, and which he let aloft for a memoriall praying unto Jupiter that he would vouchsafe them this gracious favour, as to bestow those sacred weapons & harness upon them that meant to arm themselves therewith, for the defence of their country, for the maintenance of the Churches and shrines of the gods, & for the recovery of their liberty. This multitude also joynd with the corpi de guards, that in the principal quarters of the City were bestowed in places convenient. But Andronodorus amongst other places that he fortified made: there also with strong guards of armed men the publike garners of the City within the Island. There was a place enclosed round about with four-square stone, and built strongly like a fortress: this was possessed by the youth that had been appointed for to guard and defend that quarter: and they sent messengers into Acradina, to signify that the garners and the corn were kept by them to the behoof of the Senat, And on the morrow at the break of day, the whole people, as well armed as unarmed, assembled together in Acradina within the Palace, And there before the altar of Concordia which in that place stood erected, one of the principal and chief Citizens, named Polynus, made an Oration unto them all, with frankness of speech enough, tendering unto liberty and yet seasoned with modesty & moderation in this wise: Men (quoth he) that have experience of servitude and other indignities, fall to abhor the same, and their stomachs rise against them as known evils. But as for civil discord, what calamities & miseries it bringeth with it, the Citizens of Syracuse have heard their fathers tell, and not seen and tasted themselves. That ye have been lo ready to take up arms and weapons in hand I commend you for it: but I would can you more thank. If ye used them not, unless ye be driven thereto by extreme necessity. For the present, I hold it good, and my counsel is, that Embassadors be sent unto Andronodorus, to intimate unto him, yea, and to require and charge him, to submit himself unto the Senat and people: and by them to be ordered: to let open the gates of the Island, to put away from about him his guard, and deliver up the castle and garrison. But in case he intend under the pretence of being guardian or protector to the kingdom of another, thereby to usurp it to his own use: he must be given to understand, by mine advice, that we will seek to recover our liberty out of the hands of Andronodorus more fiercely and forcibly than from Hieronymus. And so presently upon this assembly embassadors were sent. Then the Senat went together and sat in Council: for, as during the reign of Hiero, there was set an ordinary publike Council of State: so after his death unto that day, the Senators were neither called together, nor their advice taken or sought in any matter. When the Embassadors were come unto Andronodorus, and had delivered their message, he was himself (verily) for his own part moved with the generall consent of the Citizens: but especially when he considered, that among other quarters of the City possessed by the ad-

A verse side, that one part also of the Island, which was the strongest, was betrayed (as it were) and held out against him. But when the Embassadors called fill upon him to come forth, his wife Demaria, daughter of King Hiero, puffed up fill with the proud mind and naughty stomack of a Prince, and full of the vain humour and spirit of a woman, put him oftentimes in mind of a saying, that Demis the Tyrant had evermore in his mouth, namely, That a man should not ride on hories: back to be deplored from his royall dignity and estate of tyranny, but be led fair and softly a foot pace, and go to that as a bear to the flack. An easie matter (quoth she) it is for one to yield and forgo the possession of high place and honour, and a thing that may be done in the turning of an hand, whereforever one will: but to compais and straiten thereto is a right hard matter, and all thereof, to send for the Souldiers out of the Leontin country: unto whom, no doubt, if you would promise a reward out of the Princes treasure, you shall be Lord of it. This perillous unhappy counsel of a woman Andronodorus neither despised and rejected together, nor yet presently accepted and embraced: supposing it a better and safer course, if he meant to aspire unto high dignity and great puissance, for the present to temporize and give place unto the necessity of the time. And therefore he willed them to carry back unto the Senat this answer from him, That he submitted himself, and would be ordered & let down by the Senat and the people. The morrow after, so soon as it was day-light, he opened the gates of the Island to be set open, & shewed himself C in the market-place of Acradina, where he ascended up unto the altar of Concordia from which the day before, Polynus had made a speech unto the people. He began his Oration with an exhort of his late coming and long stay behind, and craved pardon the more, alledging, That he had kept the gates shut, not because he meant to separate his own affairs from the State, and not to take (such) part as the City took: but when swords were once drawn he feared what would be the end, and issue of murders and massacres, and whether men would flay their hands, when there was assurance of liberty effected (as being contented with the death only of the Tyrant, yet whether, as many as either blood and kindred or in affinity and alliance, or in other offices of service, were toward the King, and his Court, should be counted culpable in the fault of another & so likewise have their throats cut. For after that (quoth he) I understood once that they who had delivered and set free their country were minded and willing to save & preserve, these enfranchised: and that there was consulting on all hands indifferently for the good of the State, I made no longer doubt of the matter, but to yield both mine own person and all that ever was under my hand (as committed unto me upon trust and fidelity) unto my native country: now that he, who put all into my hands, through his own folly & outrage overthrown and brought to confusion, Then turning to the murderers of the tyrant, and by name calling unto Theodorus and Sofis, a noble and memorable piece of service ye have already done, quoth he (but trust me truly, your glory in this behalf is begun only, and not thoroughly finished and performed) nay, a great danger is yet behind, unless ye see to the generall concord and unity of all parts, that the common liberty of the City, turn not into pride and inolency beyond all measure.

E After this speech ended, he laid down the keys of the gates, and of the Kings treasure, at their feet. And so for that day, when the people were dismissed from the assembly, with joy and mirth they went in procession and supplication with their wives and children, round about all the Churches & Chappels of their gods. The day following, the solemn decision was held for the creation of Prators. And first, before all others, Andronodorus was chosen, and the rest for the most part, the very murderers of the Tyrant. They elected also two that were abent to wit, Sepater and Deomenes. Who being advertized of all matters that passed at Syracuse, delivered up the Kings treasure which lay in the Leontin country, and was now brought unto Syracuse, into the hands of the Treasurers: who for the same purpose were created. Likewise that which was in the Island, and in Acradina, was committed over unto their custody. That part also of the wall, which divided the Island from the rest of the City, and was supposed too strong a bar between was by common consent cast down and raised, and was supposed too strong a bar between was by common consent cast down and raised, and as their minds were thus affected and inclined to procure and maintain liberty, so all other matters forced fitable and followed after accordingly.

Hippocrates and Epicles, when tidings came of the Tyrants death (which Hippocrates would faine have had concealed, and therefore slew the messenger that brought news thereof) being forsaken of the souldiers, returned to Syracuse: supposing for the present, that to be the safest course they could take. Where, because they would grow into no suspicion nor to be noted to seek for some opportunity and occasion of change and alteration in the State, first they presented themselves before the Prators and Governors of the City, and so by their mediation, they had access to the Senat. They gave out, That they had been sent from Amibal unto Hieronymus G as unto a friend and confederate, and had yielded obedience unto him, as they were willed by their own Generall and Commander. Now their desire was, to return again unto Amibal. But (so much as they might not travell in safety, for the Roman forces, that ranged all over Stetly, they craved a convoy and sufficient guard to conduct them, as far as to Lecry in Stetly: assuring them, that by this small curtesie and desert of theirs, they should rep-reat thanks of Amibal, and come into high favour with him. The suit was soon obtained. For desirous they were, that those Cavaliers that used to lead the King, and were expert and skillfull besides in war, and therewith needy and audacious should be sent away: but they made not so good speed to put this their desire in execution as they should have done. For in the mean season, these young H and lefty marial men, and such as ever had convened with the fouldiers, went up and down one while to them, another while to the fugitive strangers that were revolved, (who for the most part were failers and sea men that came from the Romans) yea, and lotted themselves with the baseliest and most abject persons of the Commoners, spreading tales, and whispering into their ears sundry suspicious matters of crime against the Senators and great men of the Nobility, saying, that they plotted and practised cloely under hand nothing else, but that Syracuse, a uenena colour of reconciliation and accord should be reduced to the obedience of the Romans; and then, the side and faction, and some few with them that are of counsell to renew the associating might be Lords, and tyrannize over the rest. By this means there flocked multitudes every day more than other to Syracuse, whose ears were tickled, and itched still to hear such rumours, and were apt enough to give credit thereto. And they gave not only Hippocrates and Epicides, but Andronodorus also good hope of an alteration, and a new world. For he being at length overcome with the importunate suggestions of his wife, who ever put into his head, That now was the only time to usurp and take upon him the rule of the State, whiles all things were troubled, and in a confusion, upon their new and unknown liberty; whiles the fouldiers were presented in their way, to be dealt withal, and daily maintained and fed out of the Kings Exchequer; and whiles those captains sent from Antibal, by reason of their acquaintance with the fouldiers, were present to let loose word, and further his designments) first therefore acquainted Themistius, who had married Gelo his daughter, with his complot: and after a few daies (still undividedly) imparted his mippd alle, K unto one Arifto, an Actor of Tragedies, whom he used aforesaid to make privy unto his other secrets. This Arifto was well born, and descended of a worshipful house, a man in good place, and of honest reputation: and his profession (for among the Greeks it is reputed no matter of shame to play either in Tragedies or Comedies) was no blot either to his birth, or disgrace to his calling: and therefore as one who made more reckoning of his duty to his country, than of private friendship, bewrayed and disclosed all the treason unto the Prætors. Who finding by good proofs and certain evidences that this was no forged and counterfeit information, after consultation had with the Ancients of the Council by their warrant and direction, let a guard of armed men about the door of the Senat House, and so loon as Themistius and Andronodorus were entered in place, flew them outright. And when there began some upore upon this fact, which in few seemed very horrible and hainous; especially to all the rest that knew not the cause: at length they appeased the tumult, and caused silence, and brought the informer into the Council House, that had detected the intended treason: who declared all things orderly in particular; namely, that this conspiracy was devised and sprung first from the marriage of Harmonia the daughter of Gelo, who was wedded unto Themistius: that divers auxiliary fouldiers of Africans and Spaniards were appointed and provided to massacre the Prætors, and other principal Citizens: that their goods were promised unto the murderers to be ranfacked and rifled: that besides, there was a band of mercenary fouldiers (such as were wont to be at a beck, and ready to execute the commandment of Andronodorus) set in a readines to seize the Island again, and keep it to his use. And when he had laid every thing abroad in order, with all circumstances, what the practices were and by whom they were to be performed and executed, and shewed before their eyes most plainly the whole conspiracy: & namely, what persons and what forces should have been employed. Then the whole body of the Senat were likewise every perswaded that they had devised such an end, and were as justly murdered as Hieronymus. But without the Council House door the confused multitude, composed of all sorts of people who were doubtful of the matter, and knew not what to make thereof, cried out. And albeit they menaced and threatened before the entry and porch of the Senat, yet at the sight of the dead bodies of the Conspirators, lying before their face, they were affrighted and in loon hufht to as with great silence they followed the whole body of the Commons to the public place of assembly. Unto whom, Sopater, by order from the Senat, and his fellow Prætors, was commanded to make an Oration.

Sopater his speech to the people of Syracuse.

He began formally to inveigh against Andronodorus and Themistius, (as they that accuse men N at the bar) and ripped up their former life past, charging them with all the wicked deeds and impious facts, committed since the death of Hiero: "For what (quoth he) did Hieronymus, nay, what could he do of himself, so long as he was but a child and stripling, and scarcely come all the while he lived to have any hair on his face? His officers and guardians, were they that ruled all, and mismanaged the kingdom at their pleasures, but so, as the blame and heavy load lay upon him. Who if they had perished either before Hieronymus, or at least wile together with him, they had been but well enough served. But they, who long ago had deserved to die, and for whom the gallows had already groned, ceased not still after the death of the tyrant, to devise and plot new tricks, one in the neck of another. At the first, openly in the sight of the world, Andronodorus O was by shutting the gates of the Island, entered by way of inheritance upon the kingdom, and sought to vie in his own right, and immediat heir apparent, upon those things that he held under the Prince, only during his nonage. Afterwards, being betrayed by them that were in the Island, & besieged round about by the whole City (which was possessed fully of the Acradina) "seeing that in vain he had attempted to be King by open and open force: he sought means now to aspire thereto secretly, and by cunning feignings. Neither could he be so much as reclaimed and won by any favours and honours done unto him: who being himself a traitor to the free- dom

A dom of the State, was notwithstanding advanced to be Prætor, among other redeemers of the liberty of their country. But no marvel it was (quoth he) that these men were of this harghy spirit, and longed to be Kings: for they had to their wives two princely dames, the daughters, "one of King Hiero, and the other of his son Gelo.

At these words, the people from all parts of the assembly began to cry out with one voice, that neither of them both were worthy to live, nor any one besides of the Kings stock and lineage ought to remain upon the face of the earth. See the nature and disposition of the multitude: Either they serve basely, or rule proudly. Liberty that is the mean between, they have neither the skill to despise with reason, or the grace to entertain in measure. Now, there wanted not (ye may be sure as at all times else) ready instruments and firebrands, to help forward, and kindle more angry, such as seeing the Commons distempered already, and bloodily minded of themselves, put them forward to murder and massacre. As it appeared then; For immediatly as the Prætors put up a bill, that all the Kings stock should be rooted out, and the whole line utterly extinguished: before in manner that it was all read out and published, it passed clear, and was granted. And presently there were sent out certain persons from the Prætors, that murdered Demarat and Harmonia the daughters of King Hiero and Gelo, the two wives of Andronodorus and Themistius. Now there was another daughter of Hiero, named Heraclea, wife to Sopistius, who having been sent as Embassador from Hieronymus to King Ptolomeus, chose a life in voluntary exile, and lived not with his wife. She having an inkling given her aforehand, and knowing that the murderers were coming also toward her, took her two daughters, virgins: and together, with their hair loose hanging down their shoulders, and in other most poor array and ruint habit, able to have moved pity and compassion, they were fled into a privat Oratory or Chappell unto their houte gods, to save themselves. The mother seeing the murderers fell to entreating them most pitiouly, and recommended unto them the late remembrance of her father Hiero, and her brother Gelo: "Bekech- ing them not to suffer her (an innocent and guiltles person) to fare the worle, and be punished upon hatred that was born unto her nephew Hieronymus. As for me (quoth she) I tread not as good by his Reign and Kingdom, unless it were the banishment and absence of my husband: and as by the life of Hieronymus, my fortune was not so good as my sisters: so after he was murdered and dead, my cause is not so bad, nor like unto hers. Moreover, and besides in case Andronodorus had effected his designments, my sister should have been a Queen, and reigned together with her husband: but as for me, I must have been a subject and servant with the rest. Again, if there were any messengers sent unto Sopistius, to report the death of Hieronymus, and the re- fustation of Syracuse to liberty: who can make doubt, but that forthwith he would be embarked and take the seas, and return again into his country? But how much are men put besides their hope, and deceived of their expectation? And who would ever have thought to have seen in a freed fate his wife and children in danger to lose their lives? For wherein do we hinder the common liberty, or the course of laws? What danger can come to any person from us, one do- solate lone woman, and in manner a widow, and two young maidens livings as Orphans fa- therles? And if it be said again that there was indeed no fear of hurt to be imagined from us: E but only the Kings blood and kindred was odious in the eyes of the people: Then, quoth she, let us be sent away far from Syracuse and Sicily, and confined over to Alexandria, the wife to her husband, the daughters to their own father. But when they would neither give ear to her words, nor incline their hearts to pity and compassion: then because she would not spend longer time in vain (for now she saw some of them drawing their swords forth) she gave over all entreating for her self, "and besought them instantly to be good yet, to the young filly girls, and spare their lives, unto whom being of that age, even the very enemies in their heat of anger, fore- bare to offer violence: and that seeing they were to be revenged of tyrants they would not play the tyrants themselves, and commit that wickedness, which they seemed to hate in others. A- midst these words the murderers (sent from the Prætors) pulled her forth of the inward and most secret place of the chappell, and utter throat: and when they had lo done, they smiled and fell upon the maidens, besprent with the blood of their mother: who for sorrow of heart and fear together, being past themselves and out of their wits, and as it were in a furious fit of frenzy ran against them, and got out of the Chappell: minding, if they could have escaped forth, and recovered the street, to set the whole City on an upore. And so shifted for themselves, poor wench by running to and fro within the house, (which was not large and spacious) that for a good while they escaped amongst the thickets of so many armed men, and oftentimes avoided their reaches, and caught no hurt: yea, and when they had caught hold of them, notwithstanding they were to struggle with so many hands, and those lo strong, yet they wound away from them all: untill at length after they had received many a wound, and filled every place with blood, they fainted and sunk down, and yielded up their innocent spirits. This murder, no doubt, was of it self pitious: but much more lamentable, by occasion of a present accident. For straight after came a messenger with exprels commandment, to spare the women, and not to kill them: for that upon a sudden the hearts of the people relented, and inclined to mercy. But when they heard there was so quick dispatch made of execution, that neither they had time to bethink themselves and repent, nor space to cool upon their heat, they fell pity and compassion into an extreme fit of anger and choler. The multitude thereupon began to mutter and murmur, and called to have an election of Prætors in the room of Andronodorus and Themistius (for they were both of them Prætors:) which new new election was not like to fall out in the end to the good liking and contentment of the other Prætors in place. So a day was set down, and proclaimed for this election. At which time, it happened that beyond all mens expectation, one from the farthest part of the assembly nominated Epicides: and then another from thence named Hippocrates. After which the same voices came thick and threefold till, so as it seemed the multitude would wholly go that way. The people there assembled, were a confused sort intermingled, as well with a number of souldiers, as of a company of Citizens and Commoners: yea, and many of them were strangers fugitive, shuffled among, such as rather than their life desired a general change and alteration. The Prætors at first dissembled all, and would seem to take no knowledge thereof: but thought it best to put off the matter to a farther day: yet overcome at last with the common accord and consent of the people, and I fearing withall a mutiny and sedition pronounced and declared the men so named for Prætors. Neither would they at first hand so soon as they were created, set that abroad which was in their mind and desire to effect: notwithstanding they were displeased and discontented much, both for that there had been Embassadors dispatched unto Appius Claudius, about a truce for ten daies: and also when it was obtained, that there were others addressed to treat for the renewing of the ancient league with the Romans.

of Apollonides, of Syracuse.

At the same time Ap. Claudius the Roman General lay at Murgantia with an Armada of 100 galleies, waiting there to hear what was the event of the troubles, which arose upon the murder of the tyrants: and how far forth men would proceed upon this their new and unwonted liberty. And much about those daies, when as the Syracusan Embassadors were sent from Appius unto Marcellus now coming into Sicilia, Marcellus himself after he heard the conditions of peace, thought they would grow to some good agreement and conclusion in the end: and therefore sent other Embassadors to Syracuse, personally to debate and confer in the presence of the Prætors, concerning the renewing of the League aforesaid. But by that time, they found not the City in the same quiet tune and peaceable state. For Hippocrates and Epicides, after news came that the Carthaginian Navy was arrived and rid at anchor under the bay of  Pachinus*, confidently, and without all fear, buzzed in the ears one while of the mercenary souldiers, another while of the fugitive traitors, many tallie speeches against their brethren in Office, and namely, that they went about to betray Syracuse to the Romans. But Appius began to keep his Armada at anchor in the very mouth of the river, listening to know what heart and hope they of the contrary faction had, to effect that which they intended. Much credit was given (as it should seem) unto those flanders and lewd suggestions: in much as at the first the multitude ran to the waters side in a great hurry and tumultuous manner to hinder their landing, if haply they attempted it. In this troublesome confusion of all things, it was thought good, that the people should meet together to deliberate what was best to be done. In which assembly, whiles some drew one way, others hailed and pulled another way and were at the point to mutine and grow to a sedition, Apollonides, one of the principal and chief Citizens, made a speech to very good purpose for preservation of the publike peace, and thus he said: "Never was there any City nearer, either to hope of assured safety, or to fear of utter destruction than this of ours at this present. For if all would go one way together, and with one accord either encline to the Romans, or bend to the Carthaginians, there were M not a City under the cope of heaven, whose state were more happy and fortunate than ours. "But in case we be distracted, and the Common-weal go divers waies, there would not be more bitter and cruell war between the Syracusians and the Romans, than among the Syracusians themselves: when within one and the same walls, there should be banding one against another, and each side have their forces, their armor, and their Captains of their own. And therefore we ought of all hands to endeavor our what we can that all may be of one mind and draw in the same line. As for the main point now in question, Whether society and alliance be the better and more commodious, the Roman or the Carthaginians, is a matter of far less moment and importance than to be consulted and studied long upon. Howbeit, in choosing our friends and allies, we are to be directed by the authority and act of Hiero, rather than of Hieronymus: and N to prefer that amity which we have tried for fifty years in much felicity, above a friendship for the present unknown, and sometime heretofore found unfaithfull. It maketh somewhat also, to resolve upon this course, that in case we should deny peace and alliance to the Carthaginians, we need not presently go to war with them: but with the Romans we must out of hand make account either of peace, or else of hot wars. This speech of his the less that it favoured of faction, spirit, and affection, the more authority and sway it carried with it. And besides the deliberation of the Prætors and choice Senators, the advice also of the martial men were taken. And therefore the Captains of all their own ensigns and companies, yea, and the great Commanders of the auxiliary forces of their allies, were willing to sit in Council together with them. When the matter had been often debated, and much contention and hot words passed between, at the last, because there appeared no colourable reason or cause to make war with the Romans, they agreed that a peace should be concluded, and that together with their Embassadors, there should be others also from them to ratifie and confirm the thing.

There passed not many daies between, when out of the Leontins country there arrived certain Orators, to crave help and succour for the guard and defence of their marches. This Embassage seemed to come very fitly and in good time, for to exonerate and rid the City of the unruly and disorderd multitude, & likewise to send out of the way their Captains and ringleaders,

So

A So, Hippocrates the Prætor was commanded to lead thither the fugitive strangers. Many also of the mercenary souldiers, that were waged to help them in their wars, accompanied them: so as in all, the number amounted to four thousand. This expedition and journey contented greatly, as well the senders and setters of it out, as also the parties themselves that were sent forth. For these of the one side had a good occasion and opportunity now offered them, to continue a change in State (the only thing that so long they had desired) and those of the other, were right glad, that the sink (as it were) of the City was now well sourced and voided away. But this was like the palliative cure of a sore, and a lightning for the present of a sick body: whereby it might soon after by relapse fall back, as it were, into a recidive, and a worse disease and more dangerous than the other. For Hippocrates began at first to make rodes by stealth into the confines bordering upon the Roman Province, and thence to waile & spoil: afterwards when Appius had sent a power of men to defend the frontiers of his confederats, he charged with his whole power upon that guard that was opposed against him, and slew many of them. Whereof when Marcellus was advertised, he dispatched Embassadors incontinently to Syracuse, to charge them with the breach of peace: and to give them to understand, that there would never be wanting some occasion or other of quarrell and war, unless Hippocrates and Epicides were removed, and sent far enough out of the way, nor only from Syracuse, but also quite out of Sicily. Epicides for as much as he remained present in the City he might be charged and brought in question, for the fault and trespass of his brother absent, or be wanting for his part, in the raising of new war: went himself also in person into the Leontins country: and seeing them there forward enough of themselves, and provoked already against the Romans, began also to alienate and turn their hearts from Syracuse. For in these terms he suggested and informed against the Syracusians: namely, "how they had capitulated with the Romans, that all the Cities and Nations which were under the Kings, should be subject unto them and within their jurisdiction: so as now they cannot be content (quoth he) with their liberty, unless they rule also like Lords and Kings. I would avise and counsel you therefore, to send word unto them and give them to understand, that the Leontins likewise deem it good reason, that they should themselves be free in regard to other that the tyrant was killed within the ground of their City, or because the first alarm for liberty began there. For their leaving and abandoning the Captains there that followed the King ran at once from thence to Syracuse. And therefore they are (saith he) to raise that aforesaid article out of the instrument of the covenants, or not to accept at all of peace with that condition. Soon were the multitude perswaded hereunto. And therefore when the Embassadors of the Syracusians came to the Leontins both to make complaint for killing of the Roman Cors de guard, and also to command peremptorily that Hippocrates and Epicides should depart either to Locri, or to what other place they would rather chuse, so they went their waies and voided clean out of Sicily: they returned unto them this stout answer again: that neither the Syracusians had any commission and warrant from them, to make peace with the Romans in their name, neither would they be tied and obliged to any concordancy made by others than their own selves. This answer the Syracusians made report of to the Romans, and said plainly, "That the Leontins were not under their jurisdiction, to be ordered and censured by them: and therefore, any thing comprised in the league with them notwithstanding, the Romans might war against them without breach of any covenant: and in that war they would not for their parts fail them, but do their best upon condition that when they were once subdued, they might be reduced again under their obedience: according to the covenant comprehended in the League. Whereupon Marcellus with his whole power went forth against the Leontins, and sent for Appius also, to assail them on the other side: and so hot were his souldiers in this service, and bare themselves so resolute, for anger that the guard was slain, during the time that there was treaty of peace between that at the very first assaile they won the City, Hippocrates and Epicides, after they saw the walls felled and the gates of the City broken open, betook themselves for their safety, with some few into the Castle, from whence by night they made a secret escape, and fled to Herbesia.

As the Syracusians marched from home with a power of eight thousand armed men, and were come forward as far as to the river Ayle, they met with a messenger who told them that the City Leontins was forced. They reported other news besides, as well lies as truths, one with another, namely, that townsmen and souldiers indifferently without respect were put to the sword: that he thought verily there was not left one alive of fourteen years of age and upward: that the City was put to the sack and all the rich mens goods were given away. At this so fearful and horrible news, the army staid and went not forward. And when they all were greatly troubled, their Leaders Sofis and Diomenes, consulted what to do. This loud lie arose not upon nothing, but was occasioned by mistaking of a matter. For there were scourged and beheaded of fugitive traitors, to the number of two thousand. But of Leontins and other souldiers, there was not one hurt after the City was lost. And every man had all his own goods restored unto him again: saving that only which in the first hurlyburly of a City newly won hapned to miscarry and perish. Howbeit upon this bare report, they neither could be induced to go forward to the Leontins, complaining and grieving that their fellow souldiers were betrayed and murdered, nor yet to abide there still for to expect and hear more certain tidings. The Prætors perceiving their minds disposed to revoke, and yet hoping that this mutinous fit of theirs would not continue long, in case the Captains and heads of their fury and folly were once rid out of the way led the army to Megara and went

themselves in person with a few horiemen toward Herbessus, hoping to gain the City by reason, & whilst they all there were affrighted, But seeing that enterprise would not prevail, they minded to use forcible means. The morrow after they dislodged and raised their Camp from Megara, purposing with all their forces to assail Herbessus, Hippocrates and Epicides supposing this to be the only way for them, although at the first light not the safest, (considering all hopes besides were cut off) namely, to put themselves into the hands of the souldiers, who were for the most part acquainted with them, and besides, upon the bruit of the execution and massacre of their fellow souldiers, thoroughly chafed, went out to meet the army. The foremost ensigns in the forefront, hapned to consist of those six hundred Cretenians, who in the wars of Hieronymus had served under them, and received a favour and benefit at Annibal his hands. For being taken prisoners at Thrasymenus, I among other auxiliaries that came to aid the Romans, they were set at large and sent away without ransom. Whom when Hippocrates and Epicides knew by their colours, habit, and fashion of their armour, they held out branches of olives and other vails and tokens of suppliants, beseeching them humbly to receive them, and being once received, to vouchsafe to protect them, and not to deliver them into the hands of the Syracusians: by whom they should soon be yielded unto the people of Rome, for to be murdered and cut in peeces. At this they all cried aloud with one voice, and willed them to be of good cheer, for they should fare no worse than their own selves. Upon this communication the ensigns staid, and the army stood still and marched not forward: but the general Captains wist not as yet what the cause might be of this stay. After the rumour was spread that Hippocrates and Epicides were come, and that all the host throughout by a general applausse K seemed to like well of their coming: the Prætors incontinently set spurs to horses, and rode forward apace to the forefront of the vanguard, demanding of the Cretenians, what manner and fashion this was of theirs? and how they durst be so bold, as to parl and talk with enemies? and without licence of their Prætors to entertain them within their companies? And herewith they gave commandment, that Hippocrates should be apprehended and bound sure with chains. At which word the Cretenians set up such a cry, and the rest so answered it again with the like, that it was well seen, in case they had proceeded forward as they began, they should have incurred themselves to small danger. And thus in great perplexity and fear of their own lives, they commanded to turn ensigns, and retire unto Megara, from whence they came; and dispatched messengers precisely to Syracuse to signify in what terms they stood. Hippocrates seeing the souldiers pI even to be suspicious and ready to believe every thing, devised a cunning shift besides in this manner. After he had sent out certain of the Cretenians to belie the waies between them and Syracuse, he pretended that they had intercepted some letters from thence, which he read unto the souldiers, and were indeed framed and indited by himself. The tenor of the letters ran in this form: "The Prætors of Syracuse to M. Marcellus their friend, greeting. After these salutations and commendations premised, as the manner is it followed written thus: you have done well and orderly in sparing none at all of the Leontins. But all other mercenary souldiers besides are in the same predicament: neither will Syracuse be ever in quiet, so long as any forrain aid be either in the City, or in your army. And therefore our advice and counsell is, that you would endeavour to get them into your hands, who with our Prætors are encamped before Megara, and by exM cution of them to deliver and let Syracuse free in the end.

The contents of these letters were not so soon read, but with such an outcry and alarm they ran to their weapons on all hands, that the Prætors amidst this garboil were faine to ride away as fast as they could gallop toward Syracuse. But although they were fled, the mutiny nevertheless continued and was not appeased: for the souldiers fell upon the Syracusians that were in the camp amongst them. And they had all drank of the same cup, and not one escaped, but that Epicides and Hippocrates came between, and opposed themselves against the multitude in this their furious rage: not upon any pitifull compassion that was in them, or regard of common humanity, but because they would not cut themselves from all hope of return: and besides, they were not only desirous to have the souldiers themselves affectionate unto them and faithful, and withall instead of hostages: but also purposed, by this so great desert, first to gain and win unto them the kind-folk and friends of those souldiers, and afterwards to oblige and bind them fast by good a pawn and pay remaining still among them. And having good experience, with how small a puff and gale of wind the common people turneth every way, they informed a souldier, one of them who was besieged within the City of Leontinus, to carry news to Syracuse, fusing with his own knowledge, and tell things that were doubtful, as if they were most certain, and by himself knew of known: thereby to stir up men to anger and indignation. This fellow was not only credited of the common multitude, but also being brought into the Council-House, he greatly moved the Senat: inasmuch as some of them, more light of beliefe than others, gave it out openly and said, O "That it was happy, that the avarice and cruelty of the Romans was thus discovered among the "Leontins. And god blefs us from them here. For if they set foot once within Syracuse, they "would commit the like outrages, yea, and worse too a great deal, and more horrible: as they "should find there greater matter to work upon, and to satisfy their covetous and greedy appetite to the full. Whereupon they agreed in general, to shut the gates, and to stand upon their guard and defend the City. But they all feared not alike, nor hated the same persons. For the martial men, in a manner every one, and a great part of the common people abhorred the name of the

A Romans: the Prætors, and some few of the principal Citizens, albeit they were in the huff, and possessed with the false report aforesaid, yet they had more regard to provide for a mischief that was more imminent and near, and ready presently to fall upon their heads. And now by this time Hippocrates and Epicides were come before Hexapylus. Within the City the kindfolk and friends of those Citizens which were in the army, drew together in conventicles, conferred among themselves to let the gates open, and agreed to have the common country of them all, to be defended against the violence of the Romans. Now, when one only wicket of Hexapylus was opened, and they ready to enter in thereat, the Prætors came upon them in the manner. And first they commanded by word of mouth and threatened them: after that by vertue of their place and authority they seemed to fright and terrifie them: and last of all, seeing nothing could prevail, forgetting their own dignity and majesty of their calling, they fell to pray and entreat them not to betray their country to those, who aforesome were the instruments and puppets of the Tyrant, and now the oppressors of the army. But to deaf ear gave all the multitude in this their rage and furious fit unto the Prætors, that they within as well as without, set their hands to, by all forcible means, to butt down the gates, and so when they were all broken open, the army was let in safe, and received within the Hexapylus. The Prætors fled for refuge with the youth and strength of the Citizens into Acradina. The mercenaries, the fugitives, and all the souldiers that were left in Syracuse (of them who served the King) joyntly to the army, and augmented their forces. And to Acradina also, was upon the first assault won. All the Prætors, but those that escaped by flight, and saved themselves in the midst of this hurry, were slain: and the night coming upon them, said the massacre. The day following, all bondslaves were called to receive the cap and made freethe prisoners were set open, and the prisoners let go at large. And this confused rabble and multitude of all sorts created Hippocrates and Epicides Prætors. And thus Syracuse, having for a short time liberty shining favourably upon it, fell again into her old servitude.

When news hereof came to the Romans incontinently they dislodged and removed the camp from Leontinus, and marched directly towards Syracuse. It hapned the same time that the Embassadors sent from Appius by the way of the haven, were embarked in a galee, one of five banks of oars: but another galee of four banks which was sent before, was not so soon carried into the mouth of the harbour, but it was taken: and the Embassadors hardly and with much ado escaped in the other. And now the world there was grown to this pass, that no laws of peace, no nor to much as the very laws of arms were observed, but broken clean: at what time as the Roman army lay in camp a mile and an half from the City, at Olympium, the temple of Jupiter. For when it was thought meet to send Embassadors from thence, Hippocrates and Epicides with their followers encountered them without the gate, and charged them upon their perill not to enter the City. The Roman Orator alledged, and said, "That he came not to proclaim war against the Syracusians, but to bring aid and help, as well unto those, who having escaped out of the midst of the slaughter fled unto the Roman Camp, as also unto them, who being kept under with fear, endured bondage and thralldom more miserable than banishment, yea, and death it self. Neither will the Romans (saith he) put up that shameful and cruel murder of their Allies without due revenge. And therefore, if those persons who were fled for succour unto them, may return home safely into their country: if the authors of that massacre above said, be delivered into their hands: and if the Syracusians may enjoy again their liberty, together with their laws, then shall not need any hostility or war. But in case these conditions be not performed, they would persecute with fire and sword, all such as shall hinder and stand against the same, whole or ever.

To this Epicides framed his words in this wise: "If (saith he) ye had any message and commission to parl with my brother and me, we would return you an answer accordingly. In the mean while ye were best be gone for this time, and return again when the City and state of Syracuse shall be under their governance, unto whom ye were sent. As for war, if the Romans think it good to deal that way, they shall find and know by experience, try when they would, that it is for one thing to assail Syracuse, and another to set upon Leontinus. And so leaving the Embassadors, he made the gates fast against them.

From this time forward the Romans laid siege unto Syracuse, and began to beleaguer it both by sea and land at once. On the land side at Hexapylus, by water at Acradina, upon the walls whereof the sea beateeth. And like as they won the City of the Leontins by terrifying them at the first assault, and therefore distrusted not, but that they should force and enter this also one side or other, being so large and vast as it was, not compact, but built to scatter, one part far alunder from another, they approached with all their fabricks, engines, and ordnance of battery against the walls. Which enterprise of theirs, so resolutely begun and so shortly and torbly followed, had sped well and taken effect, if one man at that time had not been in Syracuse, Archimedes was he a singular Astronomer. A rare man for contemplation and beholding the sky with the Planets and other stars therein fixed: but a more wonderful engineer for devising and framing of artillery, ordnance, fabricks, and instruments of war, whereby he would with very little ado, and at ease, check and frustrate all the inventions which the enemies with great difficulty had prepared for to give the assault. This cunning artificer and admirable workman had planted engines of all sorts upon the curtain of the wall, which stood on certain hills, and those not of even height: and having for the most part high places that yielded hard access, and some other low again, whereunto men might come on even & plain ground, he fitted and furnished every place accordingly. Now Marcellus

speech to his

"a law, which our fathers themselves have confirmed, even by the exemplary punishment & death of their own children, who have transgressed the same. And seeing the Consul Marcellus is not far off ye may, if it please you, send your Embassadors unto him, of whom you may be certified, under whose power, commandment, and government I am. Tush, say they, we will never fend unto him. But if words and reason may not prevail, we will work some other means to recover our liberty again. Then quoth Pinarus to them, If ye think much to address your messengers to the Consul, yet do me this favour, as to call a Common Council of the people for my sake, that I may know whether these demands proceed from some few, or from the whole body of the City. So it was accorded and agreed, that a general assembly should be proclaimed against the morrow. Then Pinarus after that he was departed from this party, returned into the streets, and calling his soldiers together, spake unto them in this wise: "I suppose ye have heard already (my soldiers) in what sort the Romans have, these daies past, been betrayed & murdered by the Sicilians. That treachery hitherto ye have avoided and escaped; first & principally through the goodness of the gods: next and immediately by your own valour and prowess; & by continual watch & ward, standing in your armor both day & night. And I would to God ye might pass as well the time to come, without falling into this hard choice either to endure and suffer such horrible mischief: or to execute and commit a fearful example of cruelty. This intended treason of theirs hath been carried and conveyed closely and cautiously all this while & seeing they cannot as yet meet with any advantage to surpris us, they would seem now openly and without dissimulation, to demand for to have all the keys of the gates under their hands. Which we should not so soon part with & render unto them, but presently Ænna would turn to the Carthaginians, and more cruelly should we here be murdered and hewn in pieces, than the garrison was at Murgantia. Much ado I had to obtain of them respite of this one night to take further counsel: that I might advertise you of the present danger, wherein both I & you stand. To-morrow morning by day-light, they purpose to hold a solemn assembly of the people. And to make a speech unto them, to accuse me, and to stir them up against you. And to-morrow is the day that the City Ænna shall overflow either with the blood of you, or of the inhabitants. And be ye well assured, that as ye shall lose all that you have, if they surpris you: so in case you prevent them and begin the fray, there shall no peril at all betide you. Look who first lieth hand on his sword and draweth it, he shall carry away the victory clear. Therefore ye must be there prest in your armor, and attentive to expect a signal from me. My self will be present in the assembly, and with parling and debating, temporise and draw out the time, until ye be all in readines and every thing in order. And to soon as I shall give you a sign with my gown, then let me hear you set up an outcry, then let me see you fall upon the multitude: down with them and spare not and put them all to the sword. See in any case there be not one of them escape your hands and remain alive, from whom ye may fear any harm, either by fraud or force. And now I beseech thee O Dame Ceres, and thy daughter Proserpina, and all other gods in heaven above, or in hell beneath, who inhabit this City, these holy lakes and sacred groves, wherein ye are honoured and worshipped, to vouchsafe to be propice and favourable unto us: in case we enter into this action and enterprise, for the avoiding of treachery intended against us, and not to offer mischief unto others: and not otherwise, I would use more words unto you my friends and soldiers, for to animate and encourage you, if it were that you had to deal with men in arms: but since they are naked unarmed, & unwarned, you shall kill and slay them at your pleasure, and satisfy your selves with their blood. And to the end that you need not fear any harm from Himilco and the Carthaginians. Ioe the Consul himself lieth encamped near at hand. After this exhortation they were dismissed, to take their recreation and rest. The next day, they were bestowed in sundry parts of the City, to come to beset all the streets, others to stop the passages and the waies against the townsmen, that they might not escape. But the most of them stood upon and about the Theatre, and were nothing suspected as being used heretofore to behold and see the assemblies of the people. The Roman Captain Pinarus was by the Magistrates brought forth and presented before the people: where he pleaded, That it lay not in his hands, but in the power and authority of the Consul, to dispose of that which they demanded: and he iterated for the most part the same allegations that he shewed the day before. At first they began gently to move him by little and little: afterwards more and more of them, required him to deliver up the keys; and so consequently all with one voice, charged and commanded him to do so: and when he seemed to make some stay and defer the matter, they menaced and threatened fiercely, yea, and seemed as if they would no longer forbear but proceed to extrem violence. Then the Captain made a sign with his robe, according to the former agreement: and with that the soldiers who had their eyes upon him waiting wittily for the signal and were ready for execution, let up a loud cry and ran some from aloft upon the multitude assembled over against them: others flood thick at every corner of the Theatre, where the people should go forth, and opposed themselves against them. Thus the men of Ænna, shut up and penned within the Theatre were massacred and lay tumbled one upon other: not they only that were killed, but such also as fled one over another's head: the found fell upon the wounded, the quick upon the dead, one with another, by heaps. Then there was running from thence sundry waies, and as if the City had been taken upon assault by the enemy, there was nothing but murdering and flying away in every place. And as hot and furious were the soldiers in the execution of this unarmed multitude (whom they judged worthily

A chily and justly to be killed) as if like danger presented unto them, or choler raised in their hearts had provoked them thereto. Thus Ænna was held still for the Romans by this means: were the dead simply ill, or by circumstance needfull and necessary: Marcellus mistook not of the fact & granted the pillage of the Citizens of Ænna to the soldiers: supposing that the Sicilians thoroughly-frighted by this fearful example would betray no more garrisons. The calamity and hard fortune of this City, (standing, as it did, in the very heart of Sicily) was in one day divulged and noised throughout the Island, from one end to the other. And otherwise, a famous and renowned town it was, either for the natural situation for exceeding strong: or because all places in it were accounted sacred and holy, in remembrance of Proserpina, who in times past left her footings & traces there, at what time as she was stoln away & ravished by Pluton. Now it was generally thought by the Sicilians, that this cursed and detestable man, had defiled and polluted not only the habitations of men, but also the temples of the gods: whereupon even they likewise, who flood but doubtful and indifferent before, fell now away from the Romans, and turned to the Carthaginians.

Then Hippocrates retired to Murgantia and Himilco to Agri-genum: who were sent for by the conspirators and traitors within Ænna, and approached with their forces, but to no purpose. Marcellus returned to the Leontins country: and after he had brought into the Camp, Corn and other victuals, and left there a mean guard, he presented himself to the legs that lay before Syracuse. And when he had sent Appius Claudius to Rome to the for the Consulship, he committed the charge in his room of the Armado there, and the old leaguer unto T. Quinctius Crispinus. Himself crested and fortified his winning harbours five miles from Exapolis, at a place which men call Leontia. And these were the affairs of Sicily unto the beginning of winter.

In the same summer the war began likewise with King Philip, which long before had been expected. For there came Embassadors from Oricum to M. Valerius the Praetor, Admiral of the fleet, for the defence of Brundisium, and the sea-coast thereof of Calabria, and made report that Philip first assailed to win Apollonia, and was come up the river with one hundred and twenty light galleys, or foists with two ranks of oars against the stream: and afterwards, seeing he could not effect his purpose so speedily as he hoped, privily he might be approached with his army to Oricum: and that the City, situate upon a plain, neither strongly fenced with walls, nor well manned with soldiers, nor yet furnished with armor and munition, was at the first almost surpris'd and won. And as they recounted these new news, they brought him to grant aid and succour: and to make head against this undoubted enemy of the Romans, either by Land or for sea, and to chase him away from them: who for no other reason were by him assailed, but because they were near neighbors to Italy. M. Valerius leaving the guard of that place to Lucius his Lieutenant General, with a fleet of ships well rigged, furnished & appointed: and having embarked these soldiers (which the galleys or war would not receive) in the merchants ships of burden arrived at Oricum on the second day after: and finding that City kept with a small and slight garrison, which Philip when he departed from thence had left there, recovered it without much resistance. Thither repaired to him embassadors from Apollonia, who brought word that they were besieged, because they refused to revolt from the Romans: and were not able to hold out any longer against the forcible attempts of the Macedonians, unless a garrison of Romans were sent unto them. He promised to effect whatsoever they desired, and so shipped a thousand elect and choicest soldiers in galleys and sent them to the mouth of the river, under the conduct of a Captain of Allies Nectus Crispus, an industrious man, and an expert soldier. He having landed his men, and sent the galleys back to Oricum (from whence he came) to the rest of the Armado, conducted his soldiers higher in the country, far from the river side, by a way that was not before held by the Kings forces: and in the night-season, unawares to all the enemies, entered the City. The day following they rested, only the Captain took a survey of the youth and able men of Apollonia of the armor and the munitions and forces of the City. When he had seen and perused all thereupon he was well appaid and encouraged to fight, and withal, he had learned by the friends and spies, how the rebels, Fidle, and negligent the enemies were without. So at midnight he went forth of the City without any noise, and entered the Camp of the enemies so carefully guarded as it was, and lying so open: that by credible reports, there were above one thousand men got within the trench and rampier, before that any one was ware thereof: and if they had held their hands, and not fallen to killing, they might have passed on still even as far as to the Kings Pavilion. But by reason that they saw the wardens next the gates, the enemies were raised: whereupon, they were all so frightened and terrified, that not only there was never a soldier took weapon in hand, and went about to resist the enemy out of the Camp: but even the King himself, naked as he was, and newly wakened out of his sleep, clad in simple apparell, scarce decent for a common soldier, with his sword, for a King, was fain to run toward the river side to his ships. Thither also the other multitude fled dispersed in heaps. There were not many under three thousand either slain or taken prisoners in the camp. Yet there were more by odds of the enemies taken than killed. In the sifting of the camp the Apollonians met with Catapulta and Balists, and other engines provided for the assault of the City, which they conveyed all to Apollonia, to serve for defence of their walls against the like occasion of needfull service. All the booty besides of the camp was granted unto the Romans.

Tidings hereof being come to Oricum, M. Valerius presently set forth the Armado as far as to the mouth of the river, that the King might not flee away and escape by sea with his ships: whereupon Philip distrusting his power as well by sea as shore, and doubting he was not able to match the Romans, drew up some of his ships to land, set fire upon the rest, and so by land went into Macedony, with a great part of his souldiers disarmed and spoiled. The Roman fleet wintered at Oricum with M. Valerius.

The same year in Spain the affairs went variably on both sides. For before that the Romans passed over the river Iberus, Mago and Asdrubal defeated a mighty host of Spaniards, so as, all the farther part of Spain had fallen from the Romans, but that P. Cornelius made haste to transport his army over Iberus, and came in good time to settle the wavering and doubtful minds of the allies. At the first, the Romans encamped at Castrum Alimna, a place memorable for the death of great Amilcar. The Castle was well fortified, and thither alone they had conveyed corn. But because all those quarters thereabout were full of enemies, and sundry times their Cavalry had charged the Roman footmen, and gone clear away without any harm, whereby there had been slain at times upon two thousand of them, which either made small hate away, and laid behind, or straggled loosely over the fields: the Romans departed from thence, nearer unto places of more security and peace, and fortified themselves in camp upon the mount of Vitoria. Thither came Cn. Scipio with all his forces, and likewise Asdrubal the son of Gilgo, the third Captain of the Carthaginians, with a full army. And they all encamped beyond the water, over against the fort of the Romans above-said. P. Scipio, accompanied with certain light armed souldiers, was gone out closely to discover and take view of the place thereabout: howbeit, not so covertly, but he was espied by the enemies, and (no doubt) they had put him to a shrewd foil in the open plain champions, but that he took a little hill thereby for his vantage. Where he was environed and beset round about: but by the coming of his brother Cneus, he was delivered out of that danger.

Casula, a famous and strong City in Spain, and so near linked in affinity to the Carthaginians, that Annibal from thence married his wife, ranged to the Romans. The Carthaginians came against Illiturgum, and began to assault it, because a garrison of the Romans lay there: and like they were to be Masters of the town, by occasion especially of a great dearth and scarcity of victuals within. But Cn. Scipio for to relieve his friends and the garrison, went out with a legion lightly appointed with carriages, and marching between the two camps of the enemies skirmished with them, slew many of them, and entered the City. The morrow after he sallied out, joyned in fight with the enemy, and sped as well: so as in both battels there were slain of them above twelve thousand in the place, more than ten thousand taken prisoners, and 36 military ensignes carried away. Thus the siege brake up at Illiturgum. After this, the Carthaginians began to lay siege unto Bigerre (a City also conederat with the Romans.) But Cn. Scipio at his coming raised that siege without any conflict. Then the Carthaginians from thence went forward against Munda, and the Romans followed them thither straight after. There they encountered together and fought a set battel with banners displayed, for the space well-near of four hours. And as the Romans bare themselves bravely, and had got the better, and were at point of the victory, the retreat was sounded, by occasion that Cn. Scipio was hurt fore in his thigh with a barbed javelin, and the souldiers about him were greatly afraid that the wound was deadly. But no doubt, if it had not been for that stay and hinderance the very camp of the Carthaginians might that day have been forced. For not only the souldiers, but the Elephants also were driven already so far as the trench, and even there upon the very bank, 39 of them were ticked with darts and pikes. In this battel likewise were killed (by report) twelve thousand men, almost three thousand taken prisoners, and 57 military ensignes won. Then the Carthaginians retired back to the City Aurime, and the Romans followed upon them, because they would give them no time to rest and breath themselves after their flight. Where Scipio being brought into the field in a litter, gave them battel the second time, and got the victory clear: but fewer of the enemies were slain by the one half than afore, because there were not so many in number left to fight. But (as they are a nation given naturally to renew war, and to be ever fighting, and cannot give over) they soon repaired and made up their forces. For Asdrubal had sent his brother Mago, to levy and gather new souldiers: whereupon they took fresh heart again to try another field. There, being for the most part other souldiers (new come) fought as it were in revenge, and to uphold that side which in few days (space had so often taken the foil, and demeaned themselves as courageously as they before, and sped as unworwardly. For there were slain of them above eight thousand, not many under one thousand taken captives, with military ensignes 58. In rising of them there was found very much spoil of the Gauls, as rings of gold, car-knives, collars, and bracelets great store. Over and besides, two great Lords and Princes of the Gauls, whose names were Municapins and Croisfmarus, were slain outright in that conflict. Eight Elephants taken alive, and three killed.

Now when as the affairs in Spain went thus fortunately with the Romans, they began at length for very shame to thinke of Saguntum, a town that was the cause of all these wars, and had now five years already been in the hands and possession of the enemy. Whereupon by force of arms they recovered it, drove out of the town the garrison of the Carthaginians, and restored it again to the ancient inhabitants, as many as remained alive, and had escaped these broils of war. As for the Turdetans, who were the occasion of the wars between the Saguntins and the Carthaginians, they subdued them, and brought them under their subjection, sold them in port sale, and destroyed their City utterly. These were the achievements in Spain, during the time that Q. Fabius and M. Claudius were Consuls.

At Rome, when the new Tribunes of the Commons were once entered into their office, presently

A. Atellus one of the Tribunes afore-said, arrested the Censors P. Furius and M. Attilius, peremptorily to make their appearance and answer before the people. These Censors had taken from him being Treasurer the year before, his horie of service allowed him by the City, casted and displaced him out of his Tribe, deprived him of liberty to give his voice, and made him Avernus, and all, for being a party with them at Canna, who comploted to abandon Italy. But by the means and mediation of the other nine Tribunes, they were discharged: for they would not infer, that the Censors should come to their answer whilst they were in office. And the death of one of them, namely, P. Furius, was the cause that they could not accomplish the testing and numbring of the Citizens. And when M. Attilius surrendered up his Magistracy, Q. Fabius M. held the solemn Assembly and Parliament of the people for the election of Consuls, wherein were created Q. Fabius M., the Consul his son, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time both able. For Prætors, there were elected M. Attilius, and with him, they who at that time were Adiles of the chair to wit, P. Sempronius Tuditans, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and M. Aemilius Lepidus.

This year, as it appeareth in old Records, were the Stage-places first let out by the Adiles of the chair, and continued four daies. This Adile Tuditans above-named was he who at Canna (when all besides him for fear were attainted in that wofull calamity) brake forcibly through the midst of the enemies, and escaped. When Q. Fabius the old Consul had finished the Election then the new Consuls Elect were sent for to repair unto Rome, and they entered their Magistracy. Then they assembled the Senat for to consult and take order for the war, for the Provinces as well their own, as those that were under the Prætors: also concerning the armies, and the disposition of every charge and place of command. So the Provinces and armies were divided in this wise: The war with Annibal, wheresoever it fell out, was committed to the managing of the Consuls, with the charge of one army, which Sempronius himself had before under his conduct: and of another, commanded by Fabius the Consul. And those were two legions, M. Aemilius the Prætor, whole lot it was to have the jurisdiction over the foreigners, had committed his authority unto his Colleague Attilius, the Prætor of the Citizens of Rome, that he might govern the Province about Lucania, and those two legions, over which Q. Fabius, now Consul, had the command, whilst he was Prætor. To Sempronius the Prætor befell the Province of Arianus. To Cn. Fulvius was allotted Sueffula, with two legions likewise: so as, Fabius should have the leading of the legions

D of Citizens, and Tuditans receive his from M. Pomponius. The government of the foreign Provinces continued still in the former deputies. M. Claudius ruled Sicily, so far as the dominion of King Hiero extended: and Leulius the Vice-Prætor had the charge of the old Province, T. Octavius was high Admiral of the Navy, without any new supply or augmentation of forces. M. Valerius was employed in Greece and Macedony, with one legion, and the Armado which he had before. Q. Mutius was L. Deputy in Sardinia, having under him the old army, consisting of two legions. And C. Terentius had the administration of the affairs in Picennia, with that one legion which long time he had been Captain of. Moreover, it was decreed and agreed upon, that there should be mustered and enrolled two new legions of Citizens, and twenty thousand men besides levied of Allies and Allies. With these Captains and these forces above-said they provided for

E the defense and maintenance of the State and Empire of Rome, against many wars at once, either in hand already, or suspected shortly. The Consuls having enrolled two legions of Citizens, and chosen a supply to make out the rest, before that they set out of the City, procured the pacification of the gods, for the fearful and prodigious tokens that were reported. For the wall and gates of Rome were blatted and smitten with lightning from heaven: and likewise the Temple of Jupiter at Aricia. Other vain objects and illusions also of the eyes and ears, which men imagined they saw and heard, were believed for truths. Namely, there appeared in the river of Tanais certain resemblances and shews of Gallies, whereas indeed there were none fish. And in the Temple of Jup. Victricius, which standeth in the Territory of Cassia, there was heard forthwith rustling of armor: and the river of Amicernus seemed to run with blood. When satisfaction was

F made for these strange signs, the gods pleased, and all well again, according to the direction set down by the Priests and Prelates, then the Consuls set forward in their expedition, Sempronius into Lucania, and Fabius into Apulia. Where it fell out, that Fabius the father repaired into the Camp at Sueffula, as Lieutenant and assistant unto his son. And when Fabius the younger went forth to meet him, and his Sergeants or Ushers marching afore, said not a word to Fabius the father, nor put him aside to give way, for very reverence of his person, (such majesty he carried) the old man rode forward, and passed by eleven of the laid Lictors with their bundles of rods. Then the Consul commanded the Sergeant that was next himself to do his office: and with that said Usher called upon old Fabius, to alight from his horie back, and at last, he set foot aground: I did all this but to try, quoth he, my son, whether you knew well that you were a Consul or no.

G "There came that night secretly to the Consul while the Camp lay there, one Cassius Attilius, an Arpinet, with his three bondslaves, promising, that if he might have a good reward for his service, he would betray Arpin into his hands. Fabius then propoised this matter unto the Council, to be debated of. Some were of opinion, that Attilius was to be whipped and put to death, fugitive runagate and false knave as he was a common enemy, and a dangerous to either part, and playing with both hands, like a double-hearted hypocrite. Who first, after the overthrow at Canna (as if he might turn with the wheel of fortune, and go from his word and faithful promise, and change ever as she changech) ranged himself unto Annibal: and by his exam"ple, drew with him Arpi to revolt and rebell: now after that he seeth the Roman estate to life H again and hold up head (and that beyond his hope, & contrary to his desires) he would play the "villain and turn-coat again, and come with a new practice of a more shamefull treason than be"fore: as if treachery and falshood were of the nature and quality of a judgment passed in Sep-

"tembril court: and as if he might be allowed to carry two laces under a hood, and alter every "hour. Faithless friend, that he is, not to be trusted, and slippery enemy, not to be regarded. A "good deed it were, that together with that lame traitor of Faleris, and the other of King *Pyr-
"rhus*, he made a third, and were punished accordingly for exemplary justice, to teach all rogues
"and runnagates hereafter how they run from their Lords and Masters. On the other side, old *Pa-
"bin* (the Consuls father) replied, and said, That men now adays had forgot how to make diffe"rence of seasons, and in the very heat & midst of wars, reasoned and gave their opinion and cen- I "sure of every thing and person as in a free time of open peace: when as indeed, we are to think,
"consider, and deliberate of this point, that (if possibly it might be) no more of our allies re"volt from the people of Rome, rather than invite and incite them thereto: and after one is star"red aside, and upon repentance returned again to the ancient amity, to fall a reviling and rebu-
"king of him, and bitterly to say that he deserveth to be made an example to all others. For if it "may be lawfull for one to turn from the Romans, and held unlawfull to return again unto the "Romans, no man need doubt, but shortly the Roman Empire will be forsaken of all her conse-
"derats and allies, and we shall see within a while all the Cities of Italy linked and confedered in "false league and friendship with the Carthaginians. And yet (quoth he) I am not the man that "thinketh Altinus worthy to be trusted in any thing for all this, but I would take a mean course K "in middle way between both extremities. My opinion is therefore, that for the present he should "be taken neither for enemy nor friend, but commanded to ward, and to have the liberty of a "prisoner, and only kept forth-coming in some confederat and trusty City, not far from the "Camp during the time of the war. And when the war is once finished and ended, then I hold it
"good to deliberate and consult, whether that his former revolt hath deserved more punishment "than this his present return meriteth favour and grace. Every man liked well of this advice of "old Fabius, and gave their assent. So he was bound with chains, and both himself and his company "delivered over and put in custody, and a good room full of gold, which he then had brought with "him, was by commandment relieved for his use. At Calis he made his abode: where all the day "time he used to walk at liberty, with his keepers following him, but in the night they kept him L
"close prisoner. But at Arpi, where his home was, they of his own house began first to miss him,
"and seek for him: afterwards, when it was noised throughout the whole City, that he was out of "the way, and could not be found: the same hereof caused a tumult, for the loss of a principall per"son as he was, thus revolted to the enemy. And for fear of an alteration in the State, presently the "news thereof was sent to Annibal. Who was nothing offended thereat, both because long afore
"he had the party himself in jealousy and suspicion, as one neither first nor last, a man of no cre"dit, and hardly to be trusted: and also for that he found a good occasion and quarrel to seize up"on the goods of so rich and substantiall a Citizen and to make sale thereof. But to the end that "the world might think that he was more angry against his person, than greedy of his substance, he "joyined with cruelty, a grave course also of judicall severity, that the one might serve as a file to M "give lustre to the other. For having sent for his wife and children into the Camp, first he examined
"them straightly, for to know whither he was fled, and what store of silver and gold he had left "behind him at home in his house: and when he had learned enough of them touching every par"ticular, and as much as he desired he burnt them quick to ashes.

Fabius being departed from Succisa, purposed the first thing that he did to assail Arpi. Where "he lay encamped a mile from the town: and after he had well viewed by near approach, the "situation of the City, and considered the wall, look where he saw it was most strong and sure, and "therefore guarded most slightly and negligently, there especially he purposed to give the hottest "assault. And when he had sufficiently provided and got together all ordnance and engines, requisite "for the battery of Cities, he made choice of the most hardy and valiant Centurions of the "whole army and let over them certain Tribunes and Marshals, valorous and doughty good men,
"and appointed unto them a Regiment of six hundred fouldiers (for so many he thought sufficient "for the present service) with direction and commandment, that when the trumpet sounded the "relief of the fourth watch, they should bring scaling ladders to that place aforesaid. Now there
"flood a gate low and narrow, answering to the street not much used and frequented, by reason "that quarter of the City was not inhabited, but flood void. That gate he gave them order first
"to scale and climb over, and then to go forward on the wall, and from within forth to break down
"the bars, and level the said gate, and when they were Masters of that quarter of the City, then to "wind the horn, and give signall to the rest of the forces forth to approach and come hard to the "town, saying, That he would have all things in readines, and in good order. This direction was "performed accordingly with great diligence, and that which was thought and feared would have "been an hindrance and let unto them in the action, was the only thing which helped them most,
"that they were not defiered. And that was a smoking shower of rain that began after midnight,
"which caused the warders and watchmen to quit their standings, for sake the Sentinels, and to "slie into the houses for covert. The first noise of the storm pouring down with such a force, made "that the rumbling of the fouldiers could not be heard, as they were breaking down the gate: and as

A as it grew after to rain more softly, and so kept still at one, it founded gently and sweetly in their "ears, until it brought a good many of them fast asleep. Now after they had lized the gate, the "Marshals gave order, That the Centuriers should be belowed in that void street at several dis"tance equally alinder, and to wind their horns, for to waken and raise the Conitil. Which being "done, according as it was before agreed, the Consuls commanded the standards and engines to be "brought forth and somewhat before day-light entered at the laid broken gate into the City. With "that, the enemies at length began to rouse themselves. In now the flower and tempest of the "day approached. There was a garrison in the City at hand of five thousand of Arpi, and "his fouldiers, armed and well appointed: and the Arpins of their kind laces were also strong. Thus
"B the Carthaginians put in the forefront, as a forlorne hope, and opposed them against the enemy, "for fear of some treacherous prank that they might play behind their backs. First they began to "arrange themselves to fight in the dark, blind, and narrow lanes. For the Romans advanced "and taken up not only all the streets, but also the houles that were next the gate to the end they might "not be gauled with shot, and wounded from aloft. Some Arpins and Romans fell at first to "meet, to take knowledge and acquaintance one of another, and to begin to commure and talk to"gether. The Romans asked what the Arpins meant to rebel: for what offence and hurt given "to the Romans, and for what desert and meritt received from the Carthaginians should they (being "natural Italians) maintain war for Alien strangers, and barbarous nations against the Romans
"their old friends and ancient Allies: and to robbing Italy in subjection to Carthage, to do ho"mage and fealty, yea, and to become tributary, and to pay pension unto it? The Arpins excused "and cleared themselves saying, that they (simple men and ignorant in all things) were bought and "sold by their great rulers and principall Citizens, and lived in manner as captives and slaves under "the command of some few persons that might do all. Upon this beginning, more and more of "them grew to parling and conference. At length the Prator of Arpinum it was by his own peo"ple and Citizens brought and presented before the Consuls: where, after tumultuall promulgat "between the engines and the batels: the Arpins immediately bent their forces on the Romans "side against the Carthaginians. The Spaniards likewise (who were not many under all the "men) after they had capitulated and agreed with the Roman Conitil, nothing but this one and he,
"That the garrison of the Carthaginians might be set forth and pass away the without harm:
"D came with their colours to the Conitil. Then all the gates were kept open for the Carthaginians "to depart: and being sent away upon safe conduct without any harm or damage, they "arrived at Salapia. Thus Arpi was restored again to the Romans without any detriment "of any one man, but one yold traitor and new fugitive revolt, the Spaniards were appointed "to have double allowance of victuals: and they performed good fidelity and faithfulness many "times after to the Common weal.

When one of the Consuls was in Apulia, and the other in Lucania, one hundred and twelve "men of arms, Gentlemen of the Nobility of Capua, having licence granted by the Consuls
"to go out of the City, pretending to make a rode into the enemies country, and to buy in baggage "and prizes, came directly into the Romans Camp, lying about Succisa. And coming with the "E Corps de guard, declared who they were, and that they would part with the said Prisoners. *Nu-
"mius*, Fulvius was the General and Commander of the army there: who being informed and con"firmed hereof gave order that ten only of all that number should be brought before him, and "When he heard their suit and demand, which was nothing else but that when Arpi was recovered "by the Romans, they might have their goods restored unto them: he received them all into "his protection. The other Prator also Scamptius Thasiatus, won by force the town of Ugentum
"where there were taken prisoners above seven thousand men: and a good deal of copper and "silver coined besides. At Rome there chanced a terrible and pitifull fire, which continued two "nights and one whole day. All between S. line and the gate Comenalis, together with the Equi"melian and the street Jugurthum, were burned down, and made even with the ground. Likewise
"F without the gate the fire spread far all about, and in the Temples of Fornax and Diana, Curia,
"and Speus, consumed much, as well hallowed as profane.

The same year, when all things prospered well and had good success in Spain, P. and L. both "Scipios having recovered many allies, and thoe of an intestine gate that came in to the Roman
"and yielded themselves: and besides, gained some new confederats, conceived great hope and took "heart to proceed farther, even into Africa.

Syllas King of the Numidians, on a sudden fell out with the Carthaginians, and became their "professed enemy. Unto him the Scipios addressed three Centurions as Ambassadors to treat with "him about a league and alliance: and to promise withal, that if he were content to trouble and "molest the Carthaginians, by making war upon them, he should do an high favour to the Senate "and people of Rome: that they would endeavour and bring about, that in good time and place,
"C he should be well requited for that kindness, and receive at their hands a double open-
"pen with thanks. This embassage pleased the barbarous King right well. And after he had conferred
"and reasoned with the Ambassadors, concerning military Affairs, and the knowledge of war, and "heard thoe old & experienced fouldiers talk of war, he soon found his own wants, and how "unskillful himself was in many points and parts of arms, in comparison of that methodical and "orderly discipline, whereof they had discoursed. "The first thing then that he requested at their "hands, was this: That as they were good friends and faithful Allies, two of them would go

"back with their Embassie unto their Generals; and that the third might remain with him, to H read unto him a lecture in the military science of warfare, saying, that the nation of the Numidians were raw and altogether unskilful in footmen service, and only nimble and practised in fight on horseback, So (quoth he) from the first beginning of our nation have our ancestors used to war: & so have we from our childhood been entred to fight, My, an enemy I have, trusting and preuming much upon his Infantry, whom I would gladly be able to match every way in all kind of service, Footmen I am able to set out as well as another: for why? my Realm is populous and yieldeth abundance of men: but altogether ignorant we are, how to fit them with armor, how to marshall them, how to order and let them in battell array: in omuch as all my people in battell go to it pell-mell, and are as a multitude huddled and thrumbed together at a venture without skill, without discretion and adviement, The Embassadors answered and said, That for the present they would do according to his will and pleasure: but withal, they had his faithful promise & word of a Prince that he should immediately send back their companion again, in case their Generals approved not their deed in that behalf. Q. Statorius his name was: that staid behind with the King. So Syphax sent by the two Romans his answer to the forelaid Embassage into Spain: and besides, with them other Numidians, Embassadors of his own, to receive farther assurance and security from the Roman Generals: unto whom he gave in charge, that forthwith they should sollicite, perswade, and entice all the Numidians that were auxiliary footsouldiers unto the Carthaginians, and served in any Camp City, or garrison Town of theirs, for to abandon them and come to him. And Statorius for his part, having mustered a great multitude of serviceable young men, chose forth and enrolled a power of footmen, to serve in the Kings wars: and when he had sorted them into bands and companies, and ordered them in battell array, as near as possibly he could, to the manner of the Romans: he trained them in their running to follow their colours: he taught them to keep their places in their ranks, and to double their files: and likewise he accustomed them to travel and do work: and so acquainted them with other military orders and exercises, that within short time, the King repoled as good confidence, and was as mighty in his new Infantry as in his old Cavalry: and in a let pitched field on even ground, was able to meet the Carthaginian with banner displayed, and give him the foil in a full battell. The coming of the Kings Embassadors into Spain, was to the Romans also a matter of great consequence and importance: for upon the rumour and fame that went thereof the Numidians began to fall away apace, L and to come thick unto the Romans. Thus were the Romans joyed in amity and friendship with King Syphax.

When the Carthaginians had intelligence of this new alliance, they addressed immediately their Embassadors to Gala, who reigned in another part of Numidia, over a nation called Masanissa. This Gala had a son named Masanissa, of seventeen years of age, but a youth of such towardsness, and so forward in vertue, that even then he made good and apparant shew, that he would another day enlarge his dominion, and make a more flourishing and mighty Kingdom than his father should leave it unto him. Their Embassadors declared unto Gala, "That forasmuch as Syphax had entred league, and was banded with the Romans; to the end that by their alliance and society, he might be more mighty and puissant against other Kings and nations of Affrick: it M "were also better for him and much more commodious to joyn with the Carthaginians in all convenient speed: before that either Syphax passed over into Spain, or the Romans into Affrick: "And Syphax (say they) may soon be defeated and overthrown now, while that he hath gained "naught yet: but the bare name of the Roman League, Gala was soon perswaded to send a power of men especially at the earnest instance of his son, who was very desirous of that war, and to have the managing thereof. He with the help of the Carthaginian legions vanquished Syphax, and gave him a great overthrow. So as at that field there were slain, by report, in one day thirty thousand. Syphax himself in person, with some few Numidian horsemen fled back to the Maurians, that inhabit the furthest coasts, hard upon the Ocean over-against Gades. But the barbarous people at the fame of his coming forelorted in great numbers to him out of all parts, that in a short space N he was able to arm a mighty host. And before he could with them cross over into Spain, which was divided from Affrick with a narrow arm of the sea, Masanissa was come with his victorious Army: who in that place, of himself, without any help or aid of the Carthaginians, gave Syphax battell to his great honour and singular glory. In Spain no memorable exploit was achieved, but that the Roman Generals allured and drew to them the able and serviceable manhood of the Celtiberians, for the same hire and stipend that they bargained for with the Carthaginians: and sent from thence above three hundred Spaniards of the noblest parentage into Italy, to sollicite their countrymen, who served under Annibal as auxiliaries to follow them and take part with the Romans. This only touching the affairs of Spain that year, is a thing worthy to be noted and remembered. That the Romans never waged souldier to serve in their war before that time, when O the Celtiberians began to be their mercenaries, and first received pay.

The five and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and twentieth Book.

Publius Cornelius Scipio, furnished afterwards Africanus, was made Ædile, before he was of twofull years. Annibal won the City Tarentum (all but the Castle, into which the Roman garrison was retired) by means of certain young Tarentine Gentlemen, who had made semblance, that they went by night a hunting. The solemn plaies in the honour of Apollo, were now first instituted, upon occasion of certain propheticall verses of Martius, wherein the overthrow at Cannæ had been foretold. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius Consuls, fought fortunately against Hanno, a Duke or Captain of the Carthaginians. T. Sempronius Gracchus the Pro-Consul, was by a Lucan (his host that gave him entertainment) C trained into the danger of an ambush, and slain by Mago. Centenius Penula, who had served in the wars as a Centurion, having made suit unto the Senat, to have the leading of an army, and promised, if this petition were granted, to win the victory of Annibal, and to vanquish him, took the charge of eight thousand footmen, and gave battell to Annibal: but he was slain himself, and his whole army defeated and put to the sword. Cn. Fulvius the Praetor fought unfortunately against Annibal, and lost the field: in which fight there died sixteen thousand men. Himself, with two hundred horsemen fled and escaped. Capua was besieged by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius, the Consuls. Claudius Marcellus in the third year of the siege won Syracule, and bare himself in that service like a worthy and noble Knight. In that tumult and hurly-burly when the City was taken, Archimedes, whiles he was busily occupied D about certain Geometrical figures and forms that he had drawn in the dust, was killed. The two Scipios, Publius, and Cornelius, after so many and so worthy exploits performed fortunately in Spain, came to a wofull and heavy end, being themselves slain there, with the loss well-near of their whole Armies, in the eighth year after that they went into Spain. And the main possession of that Province had been quite lost, but for the singular manhood and industry of L. Martius, a Knight of Rome, who having rallied and gathered together the remnants of the armies, so encouraged them, that by their valiant service two several encamped holds of the enemies were won, seven and thirty thousand of the enemies slain, and eighteen hundred taken prisoners, and a great rich booty obtained. Whereupon he was called Captain Martius.

The five and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

VV Hiles these affairs thus passed in Affrick and in Spain, Annibal employed the summer season in the territory of Tarentum, in hope by treason to be Master of the City of the Tarentins. In which mean while certain base Cities of the Salentins, and towns of no importance revolted unto him. And at the same time, of those twelve States of the Bruttii, which the year before had turned, and banded with the Carthaginians, the Comontins and Thurins were rallied wholly again to the devotion of the people of Rome. And more of them had returned likewise, but for L. Pompeius Tarentinus Captain of the Allies: who after he had made certain rodes into the country of the Bruttii, and ped his hand F with many booties, took upon him the countenance of a sufficient Colonel, and was no less reputed: and having gathered a power of men, suddenly in haste, without good adviement, fought with Hanno. In which conflict, a mighty multitude of his men were either slain or taken prisoners. But as good hap was, they were but a disordered unruly rabble of ruffical citizens and bond-slaves: and the least loss of all other, was the Captain himself, who amongst the rest was taken captive: a man as then, the author of a rash and fool-hardy fight, and had been aforetime a Publican or Farmer of the City revenues, and alwaies (through his naughty practices and cunning fetches and shifts wherein he was become skillful) a disloyal person and dangerous both to the publicke State, and also to those private companies and societies, with whom he had commerce and dealing. Sempronius the Consul, lying in the Lucans country made many light skirmishes, but not G any one worth remembrance, and won certain poor towns, and of small regard, belonging unto the Lucans.

The longer that this war continued lingering, whiles prosperous success and adverse mishap interchangeably wrought much variety and alteration as well in the inward minds of men: as in their outward state and fortune: such religious zeal and superstition (and the same for the most part in forreign ceremonies) had so seized & possessed the City, that either the men or gods thereof, were suddenly all at once become clean altered and transfigured. In omuch as now the Roman rites and holy observations were contemned, not only in secret, & within doors at home in their private private houses, but abroad also in the open streets, yea, and in the common place and Capitol: where they flocked alwaies a sort of women that neither offered sacrifice and oblations, nor said their prayers, and did their devotions according to the use and custome of their native country and City. Certain odd Priests and Chaplains, yea, and doting wizards and blind Prophets, had inveigled the minds and consciences of men: whose number was the greater by reason first of the rural people and peasants of the country, who for need and poverty, and for fear together, were driven to quit their lands which they had not tilled and husbanded, by reason of the long wars, and many invasions and rodes that laid all waste, and so retired into the City: afterwards by the easie occupation and ready means of gain which they found by the error of others, whom they soon seduced and abused: which trade they used and practised openly, as if it had been a lawfull art and mystery. At the first, divers good and honest persons began secretly to grieve and be offended herewith, yea, and to mutter and utter their griefs in private: but afterwards in process of time the matter was presented before the LL. of the Councill, and brake forth to open complaint in publick places. The Ædiles and Triumvirs Capital were blamed much, and sharply rebuked of the Senate, for not redressing these disorders: and when they went in hand to rid the common place of this multitude and to call down, over-turn, and fling away the preparation and provision for their sacrifices and oblations, they had life to have been misliked and mischieved by the people. When this malady and misorder seemed now to be greater than might be remedied and reformed by the meaner and inferior Magistrate, M. Æmilius, Prætor of the City for the time being, received Commission by order from the Senate, to see that the people were eased and delivered from this new religion and superstition. He not only read unto them in a publick assembly the decree of the Senate in that behalf, but also made proclamation, Imprimis, that whosoever had any books of prophecies or prayers, or treatises written of this art and science of sacrifices, should bring in all those books and writings unto him before the Calends of April next ensuing, Item, that no person should sacrifice either in publick place, or sacred Church, after any new form or foreign rights and traditions. And in that year there died certain publick Priests, to wit, L. Cornelius Lentulus the Arch-Priest, or high Priest: and C. Papyrius Masso, the son of Cæus a Bishop, Alf. P. Furius Philus an Augur, and C. Papyrius Masso the son of Lucius, a Decemvir, deputed for holy mysteries. In place of Lentulus and of Papyrius, were M. Cornelius Cethegus, and C. Servilius Cæpion substituted high-Priest and Bishop. For Augur there was created L. Quintus Flaminius: and L. Cornelius Lentulus was chosen Decemvir over sacred ceremonies and divine service.

Now the time drew near of the solemn election of new Consuls: but because it was not thought good to call the old away, (buted as they were in the wars) T. Sempronius one of the Consuls nominated for Dictator to hold that election afore said. C. Claudius Cæno, who named for his General of the Cavalry Q. Fulvius Flaccus. This Dictator, the first consilial day following, created for Consuls Q. Fulvius Flaccus above named, his General of horsemen, and Ap. Claudius Pulcher, who in his Prætorship had the jurisdiction and government of the Province of Sicily. Then were the Prætors elected, Cn. Fulvius Flaccus, C. Claudius Nero, M. Junius Silvanus, and P. Cornelius Sulla. When the Election was ended the Dictator resigned up his place.

That year was Ædile Cæsius, together with M. Cornelius Cethegus, one P. Cornelius Scipio, whose surname afterwards was Africæ. When he stood and made suit for the Ædileship, and the Tribunes of the Commons were against him, objecting that he was not eligible and capable of that office for that he was not of lawfull age to be a competitor and to put in for it: it (quoth he) all the Quirites and Citizens of Rome will choose me Ædile. I have years enough on my back. Whereupon, in favour and furtherance of his suit, there was such running and labouring on all hands to the Tribes for their voices, that the Tribunes suddenly forcealed their purpose to hinder him. And this was the targets and donative that the Ædiles bestowed. The Roman Games were, according to the wealth of that time, exhibited and set out with great state and magnificence, and continued one day longer than ordinary: and for every street throughout the City, was allowed a N

* About a wine gallon.

Then Q. Fulvius Flaccus the third time entered the Consulship, together with Appius Claudius: and the Prætors cast lots for their Provinces. It fell unto P. Cornelius Sulla his lot, to have the jurisdiction both of Citizens and strangers, which before was executed by twain. To Cn. Fulvius Flaccus fell Apulia: to C. Claudius Nero was allotted Suessula: and M. Junius Silvanus his hap was to have the rule of the Tulcans. The Consuls were appointed by decree of the Senate to war with Annib. l. and to have under their command two legions apiece: and that one of them should receive his legions of Q. Fabius, the Col. of the former year: and the other take his at the hands of Fulvius Centimalus. As for the Prætors, Fulvius Flaccus had Commission for the conduct of the legions at Luceria, which served under Æmilius Prætor there: and Nero Claudius was to have the leading of those that were under the hand of C. Terentius in Picenum: and that they should provide themselves of supply to make up the full number of the Companies. M. Junius had the charge of the legions of Citizens miltred the year before to serve in Tuscany: T. Sempronius Gracchus,

A. Gracchus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus continued still in the government of their Provinces: the one of Lucania, the other of Gallia, and kept their own forces. Likewise P. Lentulus governed the old Province in Sicily: M. Marcellus was Lord Deputy of Syracuse, and so far as the Realm and Dominion of King Hiero reached, T. Octavius Admirall of the Navy. Greece was governed still by M. Valerius, Sardinia by Q. Marcius Scaevola, Spain by P. and Cornelius Scipio. The old armies before, there were other two new legions levied and enrolled by the Coll. So as in all, the whole forces for that year amounted to 32 Legions.

When the Consuls should miltred the soldiers they were hindered by occasion of a lewd prank played by one M. Posthumus Pyrgensis, to the great troubling and disquiet of the State and publick peace. This Posthumus was by his vocation and calling a Publican, who many years together for crafty and deceitfull dealing, for avarice and covetousness, had not his fellow in all the City, but it was L. Pomponius Vicentinus again: the same man, whom the year before as he tormented the territories of the Lucans rashly and unadvisedly, the Carthaginians by the conduct of Hannibal had taken prisoner. These two (forasmuch as it was so enanted and indicted before, that the transporting of those things which were for the provision of the armies beyond sea should be warranted by the City against all danger of tempest: and that all damage and loss of goods that way mis-carrying, should not lie upon the shoulders of the Publicans, who had undertaken by great to serve the armies, but be made good again out of the common Chest and Treasure: these publicans (I say) not only gave false information of certain shipwracks, but also if they brought word at any time truly of some ships that were perished, they were such only as were lost by their own fraud and deceit, and not call away by chance or violence of weather. For they would freight & charge certain old vessels and shaken bottoms, with some few wares of small or no worth at all, and suffer them to sink for the nonce in the deep sea, and save the mariners and sailors with small pinaces and cockboats prepared aforehand for the purpose: and when they had done, lie humbly and say, that they had lost merchandise and commodities in those ships of sundry sorts, and of great value. These cunning parts of theirs had been the year past revealed and notified to M. Æmilius the Prætor, and the Senate him made acquainted therewith: howbeit there was nothing done, nor any act of Senat devised for the chastisement of the offenders: because the LL. of the Council in no case would offend the company and society of these publicans and farmers, in such a time especially, when there was some need of them. Then the common people took the matter into their own hands, for to proceed with more severity against these lewd and fraudulent practices. At length, two of the Tribunes of the Commons, Sp. and Lælius, both Caroli as both shewed themselves. For seeing how odious and infamous an indignity this was, and not to be suffered they brought M. Posthumus in question, and laid an action and set a fine upon his head, of two hundred thousand Ases. When the day of trial was come, whether the fine afore said, should stand and be paid, or taken off and remitted: and that the Commons were assembled in so great number, that the great Court-yard of the Capitol would scarcely hold the multitude: the defendant spake for himself and pleaded at large. But the only hope that he seemed to have was this, in case C. Servilius Sulpicius a Tribune of the Commons, a friend and near kinsman of Posthumus, would by virtue of his place come between and stop the course of law for proceeding farther, before that the tribes and wards were called forth to go together and to give their voices. The two Tribunes above named, having brought forth the witnesses to depose, and their depositions being taken, commanded the people to void and make way: And the lottery casket or foller was brought forth to cast lots in what Tribes the Latines should give their voices. All this while the Publicans were earnest with Cæcia to dissolve the assembly by one means or other, and put off the Court for that day. The common people on the other side called on hard and gainfully. And as it fell out, Cæcia fast forsook in one of the points and corners of the assembly. He wit not what to do his mind was so perplexed for shame of the one side if he did not help his friend and kinsman, and for fear on the other side, because he felt the people so eagerly bent. The Publicans seeing small hope of help in him, with full intent to make some stir, and to trouble the Court, put forward forcibly and advanced themselves through a void way, seized upon an high place, and between the Tribunes and the people, rushed in upon them, and fell to quarrell and brawl both with the people of the one side, and also with the Tribunes on the other: inasmuch as they were like to go together by the ears. Whereupon Fulvius the Consil, " See ye not (quoth he to the Tribunes) how basely ye are accounted of and made of no better reckoning among them, than private persons? See ye not a riot and mutiny toward, unless ye make haste and break up the assembly? So the Commons were dismissed, and a Senate called: Where the Consuls made relation unto the Lords of the Councill, and complained how the solemn Session and Court of the Commons, was by the audacious violence of the Publicans disturbed: That Court (I say) wherein M. Furius Camillus, upon whose exile ensued the destruction of the City, inflicted himself to be condemned by ungrateful Citizens: wherein the Decemvirs afore him by virtue of whole laws the City is governed, and we live at this day: and wherein my principal Citizens afterwards have been content to be set down and judged by the people. Moreover, how Posthumus Pyrgensis by force wrestled from the Commons, the liberty of their voices and suffrages: subverted and made void the judicial Session of the Commons: curbed the Tribunes and had no regard of them: came as it were in warlike manner against the people of Rome and got for their vantage the higher ground, to keep the Tribunes from coming unto the Commons: " and

"and to stop the tribes for being called to scrutiny and to give their voices: and nothing else it was that kept men from committing a fray, and shedding blood, but the patience of the Magistrates themselves: in that for the present, they gave place to the furious rage and malepart fau-
 "ness of a few: and for his will and pleasure brake up the assembly, before they could go together "about the matter they were met for: (which the defendant himself with force & arms was rea"dy to stop and hinder for going forward) because they might have no occasion given them to "quarrel, which was the only thing that they fought for. When this matter with all the circum"stances was thoroughly scanned of, and the best men there had spoken their minds, and given their "opinion according to the outrageousness and indignity of the thing: and thereupon the Senat de"creed, that this violence tended to the breach of common peace, and the hazard of the State (a "most dangerous precedent to be suffered) then without more ado, the two Carvili Tribunes of
 "the Com, laid aside clean all debating about the penalty fine aforesaid, and indicted Pothumius of "a capital crime: and commanded him to be attached by a principall Serjeant, and to be led to pri"son, unless he put in good sureties for his appearance to answer the cause, such as would be bound "for him body for body. Pothumius put in bail: and made default at his day. The then Tribunes "called the Commons together preferred a bill unto them, which they granted to pass as an act, in "this form: That if M. Pothumius came not forth & made appearance before the Calends of May,
 "and being cited and called that day, answered not to his name, and no lawful excuse alleged for "his absence, they judged him to be a banished man, and therefore awarded his goods to be sold in "port-sale, and himself to be excommunicate, and interdicted the use of water and of fire: and to K
 "lose the benefit of a Citizen for ever. This done, they began also to endite all those one after ano"ther of a capital crime, who were his abettors, and the movers and stirrers of a fedition and com-
 "motion of the people, and to call for personal pledges. At the first they committed as many of them "as could find no such sureties: and afterwards, these also that were sufficient to put in bail. For the "avoiding of which danger, most of them departed into voluntary exile. This was the end of the "Publicans fraudulent dealing: and this was the issue of their audacious enterprise, in defence and "maintenance of their guile and deceit.

* 1 of May.

After this, a solemn Court was called for the creation of the Arch-Prelate, and M. Cornelius Ceriberus newly elected Prelate, was the President of this election. Three competitors there were,
 "who stood for that Prelacy, and strived earnestly one against the other: namely, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, L
 "Consul for the time being, who also had before been twice Consul; and Censor besides: also T.
M. Manlius Torquatus, a man of great reputation, for that he had been likewise dignified with a double "Consulship, and one Censorship: and last of all, P. Licinius Crassus, who as yet, was to live for "the Edileship: howbeit, this young man in that fate and contention was superiour, and carried "it away from those grave, ancient, and honourable persons. Before him, for the space of an hun"dred and twenty years, there had not been created any one, the highest Priest, (save only P. Cor"nelius Calpurnius) but had sit before in the Ivory Chair and born office of State. The Consul had "much ado to go through with the Levy, and to enroll the full legion of fouldiers, by reason that "the small number of young and able men would hardly afford both to furnish out the new legi"ons of Citizens, and also to supply and make up the old. Howbeit the Senate would not suffer M "them to give over their enterprise which they were about, but agreed that there should be cho"sen two Ternions of Triumvirs: the one fort of them to be sent out, within the compass of fifty "miles every way from Rome, the other to go further: with commission to take good view and sur"vey, both within that precinct and without, in all through-fares and market towns: in boroughs
 "and places of frequent assemblies: of all persons of free condition that they could lay eye on: and
 "so many as they thought able men of body to bear arms, although they were not come to the "lawfull age for service, to press them for fouldiers. Also it was decreed, that the Tribunes of the "Commons, if they so pleased, should put up a bill, that all under seventeen years of age, who had
 "bound themselves by military oath, should have as good pay, as if they had been enrolled fouldi-
 "ers at seventeen years or upward. By virtue of this decree, the two Ternions aforesaid of the "Triumvirs being chosen, made diligent search, and visited all the country over for free-born men "accordingly.

At the same time letters came from M. Marcellus out of Sicily, concerning the demands of "those fouldiers who served under P. Lentulus, and they were read in the Senate House. That army
 "consisted of the residue which remained after the field lost at Canna, and was confined into Italy
 "(as hath been said afore) with this condition, not to return back into Italy before the Punick "war should be ended. These fouldiers obtained licence of Lentulus to send as Embassadors un-
 "to Marcellus (where he lay in winter harbour) the principall men of arms, such as served on foot
 "as allowed by the City, the chief Centurions also, and the bravest fouldiers and choice flower "of the Legions. One of these in the name of the rest, having liberty granted them for to speak, made "his oration in this wise. "We had come to you into Italy, O M. Marcellus, when you were Consul,
 "and immediately upon that decree made against us (which if it were not unjust and unreasonable,
 "yet surely it was heavy and rigorous enough: but that we hoped to be sent into this Pro"vince (so generally troubled and out of order by the death of the KK, there to be employed "in some dangerous and cruel war against the Sicilians and Carthaginians both at once,
 "and to with our bloudshed and grievous wounds to make satisfaction for our trespasses unto the "Magistrates and rulers of Rome. Like as in our fathers daies, they which were taken prisoners

A "by King Pyrrhus before Heraclea, made amends for their fault by their good service against the "same Pyrrhus. And yet, I can not see, [my LL, of the Senat] for what ill desert of our parts, ye "either have been displeased aforesaid, or are offended at this present with us. For me thinks,
 "I see both Consuls, and the whole body of the Senat of Rome, when I behold your face, O *Mar-
 "cellus*: whom if we had had to our Consul at Canna, it would have gone better both with the "Common-weal, and with our selves, then it did. For I beleech you, infer us both now, before I
 "I make moan, and complain of our hard fate and condition, to purge our selves of that crime
 "for which we are blamed. Set aside, that neither the wrath of the Gods, nor destiny and fatal
 "necessity (upon the Law and decree whereof dependeth the immutable order and infallible "course and consequence of all things in the world) was the cause that we were defeated & over-
 "thrown at Canna, but our own selves, and our default was the occasion: let us see then, whose "fault it was, the fouldiers, or the Generals? For mine own part, I remember I am a fouldier, "and of my Captain and General I will never speak but well: of him especially, unto whom I "know the Senat rendered thanks, for that he departed not of the common-wealth: and whose "government ever since his flight and running away, hath been prologue from year to year, and "who hath had the conduct of armies continually. Neither will I say ought of the rest likewise,
 "who escaped that unfortunate foil and defeat, I mean our military Tribunes and Colonels, who
 "(as we hear say) sue for dignities, bear honourable offices in City, yea, and rule whole Provin"ces as LL, Presidents in foreign parts. It is so indeed my LL? do ye so easily pardon and forgive "your own felles and children? and deal ye so hardly, so rigorously and cruelly, against us bala-"ject persons, and vile wretches? And was it no shame and dishonour imputed to the Consul and "other great personages of the City to flee, when there was no other hope? and were the poor
 "fouldiers sent by you into the field with this intention to be all killed up, and none to escape? At "the battail of Allia, the whole army in a manner fled away: Also at the straits of Caudine
 "(to lay nothing of other shameful foils of our armies) the host yielded up their armor to the "enemy, before they joyntly batted, and fought one stroke. Yet, so far off it was, that those armies
 "sustained any infamy and shameful reproach therefore, that both the City of Rome was recovered
 "again by the means of those Regiments which fled from Allia to Veii, and also the Caudine le-
 "gions which returned to Rome naked, were sent again into Sannium well armed: who subdued
 "D and brought under the yoke of subjection the very same enemies, who had taken such pride
 "joy in that dishonour and ignominy of theirs. And now, for the army before Canna, is any man
 "able to come forth and charge them justly, that either they fled, or for cowardly fear behaved "themselves unequally, and not like fouldiers? Where were slain in field above fifty thousand men:
 "from whence the Consul fled with fifty Horsemen, and no more: and of which company thereof
 "not one remaineth alive, but whom the enemy, weary with killing spared and left. I remember,
 "at what time as the prisoners taken there, were denied money to pay for their ransom, then "every man commanded and praised us, for saving and reserving our selves against another day,
 "to be employed in the service of the Common-weal: for returning unto Rome to the Consul,
 "and for making a good shew of a compleat army. But now, in worse case are we, than in our "E fathers daies, captives have been that were taken prisoners. For they only had their armor and "weapons changed for worse, their rank in the battel shifted, their place in the camp where "they should quarter, altered: which notwithstanding, they recovered again all at once, by per"forming their good devoir to their country, and winning a victory in one fortunate battel. Not "one of them was ever confined (as it were) to a place of exile: none put beside hope to be dis"charged from fouldiery by serving out his full time: and to be brief, they were let to fight with
 "some enemy or other, where they might once for all, either lose their life, or end their dishonour.
 "And we, against whom nothing can be objected at all, unless it be this, that we were the cause,
 "and none but we, that some citizen of Rome might be said to remain alive of all those that were
 "at the battel of Canna: we I say, are sent far enough off, not only from our native country, and
 "P Italy, but also from all enemies: where we wax old in exile, to the end, that we should have no "hope, no occasion and opportunity to wipe away and cancel our disgrace, to mitigate and paci"fice the anger of our fellow-citizens, and finally to die with honor. But it is neither end of "shame, nor reward of virtue and valour, that we desire and crave: but only that we might be "permitted to make proof of our courage, and shew our prowess. Pains and perils we seek for,
 "and to be employed in dangerous adventures, like hardy men and brave fouldiers. Two years
 "already there hath been sharp and hot war in Sicily. Some Cities the Carthaginians won by "force, other some the Romans took likewise by assault. Whole Regiments of foot, many troops "and cornets of Horse encounter together, and assail one another. At Syracuse there are great "enterprises and worthy feats of arms, both by Sea and Land. The shouts of them that fight, the
 "G very clattering and ringing again of their armor and weapons, we can hear where we are, and
 "we sit still like idle larks, and do nothing, as if we had neither hands nor weapons to fight with.
 "T. Sempronius the Consul, with legions of bond-slaves, hath bidden battel to the enemies, "and fought with them in plain field of oke, that they are well recompensed for their labour with "gaining their freedom first, and then the Burgeoisie of the City. Let us yet, in place and quali"ty at leastwise, of bond-slaves taken up and bought for money against these wars, fight with "those enemies, as well as they have done, and by our fight trie, whether we can regain our en"largement and liberty. Will you your self, O Marcellus, make trial of us, and of our valour, by Sea,
 "Q q "by

"by Land, in pitched field, and battelranged, or in giving assault and winning of walled Towns? H
 "Put us to it, and spare not. The hardest adventures, the most painful and dangerous enterprises, "are they which we require most gladly: that we may have that betimes, and at once, which we "should have come unto at Canna: seeing that all the time we have lived since, hath been destined "to our ignominy and disgrace.

At these words they fell down prostrate at Marcellus his feet. Marcellus answered them, that he had neither power of himself, nor commission otherwise, to content them, and satisfy their request. Howbeit, write to the Senat he would: and according as the LL. should give advice and direction, so he would do and not fail. These letters (as I said before) were brought to the Consuls, and by them read in the Senat-house. And after deliberate consultation about their contents, the Senat passed this decree: That as concerning those souldiers, who had forsaken their fellows fighting before Canna, the Senat saw no reason, why they should be put to death. I more with the affairs of the Common-wealth: but if M. Claudius the Proconsul thought it good otherwise, he might do according to that which he judged convenient, and to stand with his own credit, and the safety of the State. Provided always, that not one of them be dispensed with, and freed from service or charge of souldiery: nor rewarded with any military gift in testimony and token of his valour: nor yet reduced home again into Italy, so long as the enemy made abode there.

After this, the Pretor for the City, by vertue of a decree from the Senat, and an act of the Commons, assembled the people together. In which Session were created five Commissioners K called Quingeviri, for the reedifying and repairing of the turrets and the walls: Likewise two other fraternities of Triumvirs, the one for taking an inventory of all sacred things, and to sign and note all offerings and oblations: the other for reedifying the Temples of Fortune and dame Minerva, within the gate Carnementalis, and likewise of Sper without the gate, which the year past were consumed by fire. Great and fearful tempests hapned this year. On the Alban mount it rained stones continually fortwo dayes. Many places were blasted and smitten with lightning from Heaven: and namely, two Chappels in the Capitol, and the Rampier about the camp and fort above Subula in divers places thereof: and two watchmen in their Sentinels stricken stark dead. The wall and certain turrets thereon at Cumes, not only smitten, but also shaken down and overthrowen with lightnings and thunder-boits. At Reate there was seen an huge stone to flie to and fro in the air. The sun also appeared more red than it useth to be, and like to blood. In regard of these prodigious fights, there was a solemn Procession and supplication all one day: and the Consuls for certain dayes together, attended only upon Divine service of the Gods: and the Novendial Sacrifices were devoutly celebrated nine dayes together.

Now whereas a long time already both Annibal hoped, and the Romans also suspected that the Tarentins would revolt: there fell out between, an occurrence and outward accident, which hastned it the rather. There was one Phileca a Tarentine, who having abode long at Rome under colour of an Ambassador leger, a busy headed man, and of an unquiet spirit, one that of all things: could not away with rest and peace, in which so long as he lived he thought every day a year, and that now he was waxen old and aged therein, found means to have access unto the hostages of the Tarentins. Kept they were in the Close belonging to the Temple of Liberty, with the leas attendance and careful eye, because it was expedient and good neither for themselves, nor for their City, to make an escape, and deceive the Romans. These hostages he had oftentimes solicited and perswaded by much talk and many reasons, and at length having bribed and corrupted two sextons and wardens of the said Temple, he trained them forth in the evening out from the place where they were in safe custody: and when he had accompanied them onward on the way as a guide, and directed them how to pass secretly, he fled himself and they together. By day break the next morning they were missed, and their escape was noised throughout the City: Whereupon, men were sent out after them from all parts, to fetch them in again: who having overtaken them at Taracina, laid hold of them, and brought them back to Rome: wherein the Comitum, they were, by the consent of the people, beaten with rods, and then thrown down headlong from the cliff Tarpeia.

The cruel rigor of this punishment, caused much anger: and provoked two of the noblest and most famous Grecian Cities in Italy to indignation, not only in publick generally, but also in private particularly: according as any man was either in blood joyned, or in alliance and friendship linked to them who were thus foully and shamefully put to death. Amongst whom there were about thirteen noble Gentlemen of Tarentum, conspired together, and the chief of them were Nico and Philonetes. These conspirators before they would stir and enter into any action, thought best to speak and confer with Annibal first: and so having gone forth of the City, under a pretence as if they went to the chase a hunting, by night they came unto him. But when they drew near unto the camp, the rest hid themselves within a wood neer unto the high way: Nico and Philonetes only went forward to the watch, and there being taken (as they requested themselves) were brought before Annibal. Who when they had delivered unto him their complot and upon what occasions they entered into that designment, they were highly commended, and promised great rewards: and willed and charged by him, that to the intent they might bear their country-men in hand, how they ever went out of the City to fetch in some booties, they should drive afore them into the City, certain cattel of the Carthaginians, which were put out to pasture and feeding: and

A and herewith gave them his word to do it safely, and without any impeachment and resistance whensoever. Thus these yong Gentlemen were seen to bring in good fode of cattell: and as they were known to make this adventure the second time and oftner still, men marvelled the lesse at the matter, and suspected nothing. Now upon a new parling and communication with Annibal, they covenanted with him upon his faithful promise in the eternals, Impiis, for the Tarentins themselves, to enjoy freely their Lands and goods, and live under their own laws. Item, to pay no pension nor tribute unto Annibal, nor be forced to receive a garrison against their wills. And last of all, to betray the garrison souldiers of the Romans, and all their fortresses and places of strength deliver up into the hands of the Carthaginians. When these conditions and capitulations

B were agreed upon, then Philonetes used much othner to go forth and come in again in the night: and as he was known to be a great hunter, and much delighted in that exercise, he had his hounds following him hard at his heels, and all other furniture about him fit for huntmen: and lightly ever he took some wild beast or other with his hounds, or else got something from the enemy, that of purpose lay ready for his hands: and always as he brought home ought with him, he would bellow it either upon the Captain of the Roman garrison, or deli it among the wardens of gates. And they all, verily believed and were perswaded, that his going out and in thus, moit by night, was only for fear of the enemies. Now, when he had used this so accustomably, that he had made it an ordinary practise, in so much, that at what time of the night to ever he had but once lured or whistled, the gate was straight set open for him: then Annibal thought it time, to put the

C plot above said in execution. Three dayes journey he was off: Where became he would have men the lesse marvel, why he kept a standing camp so long still in one place he feigned and made himself sick. The Romans also, that lay in garrison at Tarentum gave over to suspect his long abode and leaguering there. But after that he was determined and resolved to advance toward Tarentum, he picked out ten thousand foot and horsemen together, whom he supposed for nimble bodies, swift footmanship, and lightness of armor, to be moit meet for expedition: and with them at the fourth watch of the night, he marched forward with his ensigns. And having sent out afore-hand fourscore Numidian light Horles, he commanded them, to ride about and fowr all the wayes on every side, and to call their eye to eiepe and discoveir all the castles, that no country people a far off might descry and view the army on foot, but they should be seen: and withal, to

D bring in, as many as were gone before, and kill all them they met and encountered: to the end that the Peasants there inhabiting, might think they were Theeves and Robbers, rather than the vancurriers and fore-riders of an army. Himself in person marching with great speed and celerity, pitched his camp almost 15 miles from Tarentum. Neither would he there, be known unto his men of his purpose, nor tell them whether they should go: only he called his souldiers together, and charged them to hold on the direct way, and not to suffer any one to turn aside, nor in the march go out of his rank or file: and above all things, to be ready for to receive their charge and commandment from their Captains, and do nothing without their warrant and commission. As for himself, he would when he saw his time, let them know his mind, and what the service was that he would have done. And about the same very hour and instant, news came as far as Tarentum, that

E some few Numidian Horlemen forraged the country, and had put the villagers in great fright all about. At that tidings, the Captain of the Roman garrison was no more moved, nor made any other halt, but only gave order, that some of the Horlemen the next morning by day light should ride forth, to keep the enemy from farther excursions. In the mean time, they that had this charge, bare themselves so carefully in providing themselves to execute that which they were commanded, that contrary-wise, they took those outdoes of the Numidians for a good argument, that Annibal with his army was not dislodged, but abode still in leaguer where he lay still. Annibal when it was once dark and dead night, began to set forward. Philonetes was there ready to be his guide, laden with his game hunted as his manner was. The rest of this conspiracy waited their time to execute their several charges, as it was agreed among them. Now it was ordered between

F them more, that Philonetes coming in at the usual little wicket, with his venison that he had hunted, should bring in with him some armed men: and Annibal on another part, come to the gate called Temenis, which looked toward the East, and stood on the Land side of the City, a good way within the wall, as it were in a nook. When Annibal approached the said gate, he made a fire, in token that he was come (as it was devised between them before) and it flamed forth and gave a shining light. The like did Nico again. Then the fires on both sides were put out, that they made no more blaze. And Annibal in great and still silence, led his army close to the gate. Nico came suddenly at unawares upon the watchmen fast asleep killed them in their beds, and opened that gate. Annibal entred with his Regiment of footmen, and commanded the cavalry to lay behind, to the end they might have liberty of open ground to ride, whithersoever there was need, and as occasion required. Now by this time, Philonetes also was come neer to that little gate on the other side, where he used to make his egress and ingress to and fro. And when he had raised the watchman with his voyce so wel known and with his whistle wherewith now he was familiarly acquainted, & said withal, that he was troubled with tugging and lugging of a foul & heavy beast: therewith the wicket was set open. Two lusty fellows there were carrying in the wild bore between them, and he himself followed with one of the huntmen, lightly & nimbly appointed, and whilst the watchman his eye was upon the two porters that carried the beast, wondering at the signals of the bore, and took no heed to himself, Nico, thrust him through with his spear. Then

From Trojan line, O Romans once descended, Fly Cannæ River, near to Cannæ Town;
 Left strangers burn, who have thy death intended,
 Force thee to fight on Diomedes' down,
 But warning mine, thou wilt not rest upon,
 Until with blood thou fill'st do fill the plain;
 And then to Sea from fruitful Lands anon Thy men shall down the stream by thousand stain.
 Thy flesh must bait the fish in Ocean deep,
 And lure the fowls that sue from high to prey,
 And feed wild beasts, on earth below that keep,
 Mark well my words, Jove thus me taught to say.

And they who had been souldiers, and served in those wars, knew as perfectly Diomedes his plains, and the River Canna, as they did the very defeat it self, and loss at Canna. Then was the other Prophecy likewise read, which was the darker of the twain: not only because future things are more uncertain than those which are past already; but also by reason of the kind of writing, which was more obscure and intricate, in these terms:

If enemies ye would expel, if batch and plague sore
 * Sent from a far, ye would drive forth, and vexed be no more To Phœbus (Roman) I advise, ye vow from year to year To sit forth plays in solemn wise, with mirth and merry cheer.
 From publick flock, the people must part of the charge disburse:
 The first shall ye, for you and yours, defray with price at purse.
 The sovereign Pretor must procure these games to be perform'd,
 Who sits in place, mens pleas to hear, and see all wrongs reform'd.
 Then shall the ten Decemvirs hit, the Greekish rites observe,
 In slaying beasts for sacrifice, and nothing from them swerve.
 If all be done accordingly, your joy shall eye thereafter,
 Your State shall daily grow in wealth, and fruit of blessed peace.
 For God Apollo will you save, he will your foes destroy,
 Who at their pleasure waste your fields, and work you much annoy.

For the explanation and expiation both, of this prophesie, they took one whole day. And the morrow after, there passed a decree from the Senate, That the Decemvirs should peruse and look into the books of Sibylla about the exhibiting of those said games, in the honour of Apollo, and celebrating likewise the sacrifices. And when all was perused, and relation made before the Senate: the Lords made an Act, and set down an order: First, to vow and set forth solemn sacrifices accordingly, to the honour of Apollo. Item, After the Games were done and finished, to allow the Pretor twelve thousand Ases, toward the expenses of the divine service, and two greater beasts for sacrifice. There passed also another Act of the Senat, That the Decemvirs should celebrate divine service and sacrifice after the observance and rites of the Grecians: and offer up on the Altar these beasts, to wit, an Ox with guided horns, and two white female Goats, with guided horns likewise; for Dona Apollo: and a Cow with horns, in like manner guided, for Dame Latona. The Pretor, when he was to represent the Games within the Circus Maximus, gave commandment, and made proclamation, That the people, during the time of those solemnities, should contribute money, for an offering to Apollo, every man according to his ability, and as he might well spare. This is the beginning of the Apollinare Games and Plays exhibited for to obtain victory, and not for to escape some plague or pestilence, as most men suppose. And when they were celebrated, the people stood to behold and look on, adorned with garlands upon their heads, and the dames and matrons of the City went in procession, and made supplications, Every mans doore was set open, and they feasted and made good cheer generally through the City in the open street: and a high holiday this was, solemnized with all kind of ceremonies that could be devised.

But to return again to Annibal, who was about Tarentum: and both Consuls remaining in Samnium, but ready, as it seemed, to besiege Capua: it fell out, that the Campans already were distressed with hunger and famine, (a calamity that usually followeth long and continual siege) and the reason was, because the armies of the Romans had impeached and hindered their feedneesse. Therefore they dispatched Embassadors to Annibal, beseeching him, that he would take order for grain to be brought into Capua, from all parts near adjoining, before that the Consuls were come abroad with their legions into their territory, and all the wayes betwixt, and passages stopped by the guards and companies of the enemies. Whereupon, Annibal gave direction to Hanno, that he should remove out of the country of the Bruttii, and passe over with his forces into Campania, and endeavour so, that the Campans might be provided of sufficient store of corn. Then

Hanno dislodged anon, and departed with all his power out of the Bruttians country, purposing to avoid the leaguer of his enemies, and namely the Consuls, who lay in Samnium: and when he approached near to Penventum, he pitched his Tents three miles from the City it self, upon a high ground. After which, he commanded, that the corn should be brought to him into his camp, out of all the assailable and confederate Cities thereabout, into which it had been carried in the summer afore: and allowed a good guard for the safe convey thereof. After this, he sent a messenger to Capua, to give them notice, upon what day they should attend, and be in readinesse to receive their corn; and against the time, provide out of the country for the carriage, carts, wains, and draught-beasts, and pack-horses of all sorts. But the Campans, like as they carried themselves in all things else, idly and negligently, so in this they were very slack and retchless: for they lent little above forty carres, and some few beasts for carriage betwixt. For which they had a check given them, and were rebuked by Hanno: because that hunger, which causeth the very dumb beast to belitt it self and make hard shifts, was not able to prick them forward to be more careful about their own business. So there was a farther day appointed for to fetch their corn, and to come more furnished and better provided for carriage. A little being reported to the men of Penventum, with the circumstances and particulars, as it was, they addressed with all speed ten Embassadors to the Roman Consuls, encamped then about Formina. Upon which intelligence given of the affairs at Capua, they took order, and agreed betwixt themselves, that one of them should conduct an army into Campania, and Fulvius, who undertook that charge, marched by night to Penventum, and put himself within the walls of the Town. And there he was advertised by them that dwelt near hand, that Hanno was gone out with part of his forces, for to purvey corn: that there were 2000 carts come, with a rude and disorderly multitude besides of people, without armor: that all that they did was in hurry and haste, and great fear: and finally, that the camp was out of form and fashion, and all good military order clean gone, by reason of a rabble & multitude of country clownes came out of those quarters, and entangled amongst them. The Consul, being informed for certain by credible persons of these things, gave his souldiers warning to make ready against the next night coming, nothing but their engines and weapons, for that they were to charge upon the camp of the Carthaginians. And so they set forward at the relief of the fourth watch, leaving their packs and trunks with all their baggage behind them at Penventum: and presenting themselves before the camp, somewhat before day, they put them into such a bodily fear, and so terrified them, that it had been pitched upon a plain ground, no doubt, it had been won at the first assault. But the height of the place, and their rampiers and fortifications besides, which stood upon a steep hill, without climbing upon the steep hill with much difficulty, were a defence unto it. By day light there was a lusty assault given, and a hot skirmish begun, but the Carthaginians not only defended and kept their rampier, but also (as having the vantage of the ground) they chased and thrall the enemies back, as they mounted up the hill. Howbeit, resolute hardnesse overcame all hardnesse and difficulties whatsoever: For in diverse places at once they advanced as far as the banks and trenches; but it cost bloody blows first, and the death of many a souldier. The Consul therefore calling the Coronels and Marshals together, said, it were not amiss to give over that rash and heady attempt, and as he thought, it were the safer course, for that day to retire the army to Penventum, and on the morrow to encamp themselves afresh against the enemy, to the end, that neither the Campans might get forth, nor Hanno return and enter into the Town again. And that this might be the sooner effected, and with a great deal more ease, he would lend for his Colleague also with his army, and both of them jointly bend their forces that way. But these devices of the Capt in general were soon dashed. For as he was about to sound the retreat, the souldiers with a loud voice cried out, that they could not away with such faint Captains: they flocked to be commanded in so cold and slothful services: they would none of that: and so put the Consul out of his bent. It happened, that next unto the gate entering into the enemies camp, there served a cohort or company of the Peligni, led by Captain Umbro, who caught the hinder out of the bearer his hand, and flung it over the rampier and with that, fell to curing himself and his company both: wishing a plague light upon him and them too, if the enemies went away with that banner: and therewith led himself the way, and brake first through the trench, and over the palisado into their camp. Now by this time the Peligni fought within the rampier: and then Valerius Flaccus a Coronel of the third legion, from another side fell to upbraid the Romans, and hit them in the teeth with their heavily cowardice, for suffering their allies to have the honor of entering and taking the camp. Whereupon T. Pedinnus (a centurion of the Regiment called Principes, and serving in the first place thereof) took likewise an ensign from him that carried it, and withal, Now shall, quoth he, this ensign, and this Centurion (meaning himself) presently be within the rampier of the enemies: let me see you die follow, and save it from being taken by the enemy. At first, his own band and company followed him hard at heels, as he clambered to get over the rampier, and then the whole legion came after likewise. By this time, the Consul also seeing his souldiers climbing over the rampier, changed his purpose, and was of a clean other mind: and from calling and reclaiming his souldiers back, fell to exhort and encourage them, shewing in how great hazard and danger a right hardy and valiant cohort of allies were, and the whole Legion of Citizens besides. They all therefore let out and every man did his best: and notwithstanding there was many a dart driven and javelin hurled, notwithstanding the enemies opposed posed their armor and bodies full against them yet they never flinced to assay every place, as well high as low, until they were broken through, and gotten in. Many a man was hurt (ye may be sure) but yet even they that bled until they fainted, and were not able to fight any longer, carried this mind and drove withal, to die yet within the rampier of their enemies. Thus in the turning of an hand the camp was won, as easily as it had been pitched upon a plain and even ground, and not fortified at all with trench and rampier. From this time now, there was no more fighting, but killing on all hands in that tumult and confusion of pell mell within the camp. Slain there were of enemies more than six thousand, and above seven thousand taken prisoners, together with the Campan purveyors for corn, and all the provision of wains, carts, and laboring beasts. Besides another huge booty was taken, which Hasdrubal when he went a foraging all abroad, had raised out of the country of the associates of the people of Rome. Then the Consul after he had cast down all the fortifications of the camp, returned from thence to Beneventum. And there both the Consuls together (for Sp. Claudius also thither came after a few days) made sale of all the prizes and pillage, and divided the same. Vibius the Pelignian, and T. Pedanius a principal centurion of the third legion, by whose forward and singular good service, the camp of the enemies was forced, were rewarded especially above the rest. Hannibal then together with some few foragers whom by chance he had with him returned from Cominium Cevitum (whither the news came of the loss of the camp) into the Brutians country, more like one that fled in rout, then marched in warlike order.

The Campanians also having heard, as well of their own losses as of their allies, sent Embassadors unto Annibal, to certify him: "That both the Consuls were at Beneventum, that the war was "within a dayes journey of Capua, and but a step from the very gates and walls of the City: and "unless he made good hatt to succour and rescue them, Capua would sooner come under the "obedience and subjection of the enemies than Arpi did. And he was not to make such a reck- "ning of all Tarentum much less then of the Castile alone, as in regard thereof to leave Capua un- "defended, and yeeld it to the people of Rome, Capua I say, which he was wont to compare and "make equal with the City of Rome. Annibal promised that he would take care for the good estate of the Campanians: and for the present he sent two thousand Horsemen with the Embassadors, as a guard to keep the country and territory from invasion a diabol.

The Romans in this mean time, among other their affairs, neglected not the safety of the Castile of Tarentum, and the garrison there beleeved. For C. Servilius Lieutenant, by order and authority of the Senat, was sent by P. Cornelius the Prætor into Hydruntum to purvey for corn, and to buy flour: who with certain ships laden therewith, arrived in the haven of Tarentum passing even through the guards of the enemies. At whole coming, they that before whiles they had but small hope, were oftentimes by way of partly moved by the enemies to go to the contrary side now themselves began to periwade and solicit the enemy to come unto them. And the garrison forcibly was strong enough, considering that the souldiers which lay at Metapontum, were drawn from thence to the defence and keeping of the Castile of Tarentum. And therefore the Metapontins, so soon as they were delivered of the fear whereby they were kept and held in as with a bit, revolted unto Annibal. Semblably did the Thurins also, who inhabited the same tract by the Sea side. They were moved and periwaded thereto, not so much by the rebellion of the Tarentins and Metapontins, with whom they were linked in kindred, and joyed near in blood (over and besides that they were defended as well as they out of Achæia) as with anger toward the Romans for the hostages lately by them killed. Their friends therefore and kinsfolk dispatched letters and messengers unto Hannibal and Mago (who were in the country of the Brutii near at hand) offering to deliver the City into their hands if they brought their power and presented it before their walls. Now was there one M. Atinius, Captain there over a small garison whom they supposed might be easily drawn forth of the Town to make some rash and inconsiderate skirmish, preferring not so much upon his own souldiers (who were but an handful) as upon the youth and flour of the Thurins, whom he had of purpose enrolled into bands and companies, and furnished with armor against the like occasions of service. The Carthaginian Captains afore named, had divided all their forces between them in two parts, and were entered into the territory of Thurii: and Hannibal with his Regiment of footmen, advanced with banners displayed before the City: Mago with the Horsemen, laid behind close among the Hills, over-against the Town, and there lay secretly in ambush. Atinius then, who by his epistols was enforced only of the squadrons of footmen, came forth with his forces into the field, ignorant (God wot) both of the falsehood of the treason of the Townsmen, and also of the covert treason and ambushment of the enemies. The skirmish of footmen was exceeding faint and cold, whilst the Romans being but few, fought in the vanguard: and the Thurins looked rather when the skirmish should end, than made any hatt to fight themselves and help: and withal, the squadrons of the Carthaginians gave ground for the nonce, to train the enemy as far as the side of the Hill, under which, on the other side their Horsemen lay in wait and were ambushed. And thither they were not so soon come, but the Horsemen made hatt to shew themselves, with a great outcry, and presently put to flight the raw and disordered company and multitude of the Thurins: who were not very fast and found in heart to them on whose side they fought. The Romans albeit they were environed round, whilst the footmen lay still at them on the one side, and the Horsemen charged them a-fresh on the other side, yet they maintained fight, and held out a long while: but at last, they likewise turned their back

A back and fled to the City. There the traitors and conspirators being gathered together on heaps, so soon as they had let in at the gates standing wide open, the companies of their own citizens: when they law once the Romans running apace in diarray toward the City, made a tale alarm, crying aloud that the Carthaginians were at hand, and that both enemies and friends together intermingled, would enter the City, unless they made better hatt to shut the gates. So they excluded the Romans out, and gave them as a prey to be hewn in peeces by their enemies. Howeverbeit, Atinius with some few, was received within the Town first. After this, there was tumult and dissension between the citizens themselves, for a little while. Some were of mind to stand upon their guard and defend the Town: others were of opinion, to yeeld unto fortune of the time, and deliver it up to the victors hands. But in conclusion, fortune and bad counsel together, (as for the most part it falleth out) prevailed. And so, after they had brought Atinius and his souldiers to the haven side, unto their ships for to be embarked, more upon good will that they bare to him for his mild and just government, and therefore were ready to save him, than for any regard at all they had of the Romans, they received the Carthaginians into the City.

The Consuls then led the legions from Beneventum into the territory of Capua, not only to make spoil and marre the corn, that was laid up already in strong Towns against winter, but also to assail Capua: supposing they should make their Consulship renowned unto posterity, by the destruction of so rich and weakly a City: and besides, do away the great dishonour and shameful C blemish of the Empire of Rome, in suffering a City so near unto them to continue now three years in rebellion, without revenge and condign punishment. But to the end that Beneventum should not be without a guard, and that against all suddain accidents and occurrences of war, in case Annibal should come to Capua, for to rescue and aid his allies: (which they made no doubt but he would do) there might be Horsemen to withstand his violence: they commanded G. Gracchus to come out of Lucania, with the cavalry and light armed footmen: and to take order and leave some there to govern the legions and the standing camp, for the guard and defence of those parts there.

Gracchus before he dislodged out of the Lucans country, hapned to have a careful and prodigious token, as he offered sacrifice. For after the sacrifice was performed and accomplished, two D Snakes came gliding out of a blind hole, no man knew how, to the very tails of the beasts, and fell to eat the Liver: and so soon as they were eiped, suddainly they set offight and way to the river seen. Now, when as the bowel-priyers had given advice to kill a new sacrifice and so on, the inwards were opened and laid forth, to tend and look unto them, more brashly, the Snakes came again, as it is reported, the second and third time: and when they had on, given as it were an assay, and tasted the Liver, they went clear away without hurt and untouched. And albeit the Soothsayers aforesaid, had given an Item, and foretold, that this prodigious sight pertained properly unto the chief Captain and General, and warned him to take heed of some close persons and secret practices: yet his fatal destiny of death that hung over his head, could by no force, and providence be altered and avoided. Now there was one Flavius a Lucane, the principal head of E that bend and side of the Lucans, which when the other faction revolted unto Annibal, took the Romans parts: and having been by them chosen the Prætor, had continued in that place of Magistracy a year already: this man all on a suddain changed his mind and affection, and seeking to wind and enter into the favour of Annibal, could not be content to revolt himself, and to draw with him the Lucans to rebellion: unless he made a league also and covenant with the enemies, and sealed it with the murder and blood of his General: of him I say, who being entertained and lodged in his house, he purposed villanously to betray. He entered therefore into secret speech and conference with Mago, Governour over the Brutii, and having capitulated with him, under his faithful word and promise. That if he delivered the Roman General into his hands, the Lucans might live in freedom under their own Laws, in league and amity with the Carthaginians: F he told him of a place into which he would bring Gracchus, with a small company and guard about him: willing Mago to put his foot and horse in arms, and in such a place aforesaid where in he might bestow closely and secretly a mighty number of men. When the place was well viewed and considered all about, they agreed upon a day, for putting this plot in practice. This done, Flavius cometh to the Roman General Gracchus, and enformeth him that he had begun an enterprise of great consequence, for the accomplishment and full perfecting whereof, he needed the helping hand of Gracchus himself: "Namely, he had perswaded with all the Prætors and Governors, who in that universal and general trouble of all Italy, had revolted unto Annibal, for "to return again into the league and friendship of the Romans: seeing that the Roman state and "their Dominion, which by the overthrow at Canus was come in a manner to the lowest ebb, "and fallen into extrem despair, flowed now again, and grew every day more than other, greater "and mightier: whereas contrary-wise, the puissance of Annibal decayed much, and was well "nearer come to nothing: besides, the Romans were men that might be appeased and reconciled "again, especially the trespasses being so long ago done and past: for never was there nation under the sun, more tractable, more exorable and ready to pardon a fault: and how often have "they (to go no further for examples) forgiven the open Rebellion even of their fore-fathers and "ancestors? These (quoth he) were my words unto them, and indeed, but my words. Mary "they had rather hear Gracchus himself speak, and hear the same from out of his own mouth: "they

"they would more gladly talk with him in person, and take hold of his right hand, which as the H affured pawn of his faithful promise, he carliest always with him wheresoever he goeth, and they desire no more, I have therefore (saith he) appointed a convenient place of interview, and conference: lying out of the way and forth out right; but yet not far from the Romans camp.
There the matter may be dispatched in few words, and all the reparation of the Lucans, reduced under the obedience and alliance of the people of Rome. Gracchus suspecting no fraud nor harm, neither in his words nor deeds, founding all to a great likelihood of implicitly and truth in his conceit, departed out of the camp attended upon with his Sergeants, and guarded only with a corner of Horsemen: and so by the guidance of his own host, in whose house he lodged, was plunged headlong within the danger of the ambush of his enemies: Who suddenly arose: I and Flaccus because he would put it out of doubt that he was a traitor, went to their side and joyed with them. Then they let flye arrows, and shot darts against Gracchus and his Horsemen on every side. "Whereupon Gracchus light from horseback, and commanded the rest to do the same, exhorting them, that the only thing which fortune now had left unto them, they would "grace and honour with vertue. For what remaineth else for us, (a small handful unto them)
"invited as we are with a multitude of them, within a valley compassed about with hills and "woods, but present death? This only we are to resolve upon. Whether in this present amazed-
"ness and heartless fear, we will as beasts suffer our throats to be cut without revenge again: or "turning wholly our timorous expectation and suffering of death, into choler and courage, fight
"adventurously and manfully, and bathing our hands in the blood of our enemies, lose our lives "and fall down dead, upon the weapons and bodies of them, lying gasping themselves under us.
"Ah! that Lucan, that fugitive rogue and rebel, that treacherous and false traitor, see ye all lay "him. Whole hap it will be, ere he die, to be his Priest, to sacrifice and send him to the Devil, "he shall win an honourable prize, and find no small solace and comfort in his own "death.

Gracchus killed by his host, a Lucan.

With these words, he wrapped his rich coat of arms about his left arme (for they had not brought forth with them so much as their shields) and charged with exceeding force upon the enemies. The fight was far greater on their part than for the proportion and number of the men.
The bodies of the Romans lay open most unto the floor. And thus overcharged on all sides from the higher place: as being in the valley subject to the volley of their darts, they were soon pierced through. When Gracchus was left naked alone, and his guard dead at his feet, the Carthaginians did what they could to take him alive: but he having despised among the enemies his good host and friend, that Lucan, ran among the thickest press: where he was so fully bent to mischief him, that they could not will nor choose but kill him outright, without they would have lost the lives of many other. He was not so soon dead, but Mago sent him straight wayes unto Annibal, and commanded that his body together with the kniveths of rods (belonging to his Magistracy) should be presented and shewed before the Tribunal seat of the General. And this is the true report of the end of Gracchus: to wit, that he let his life in the Lucan Land, about the plains which are called Veteres Campi. There be some that tell it otherwise, how he being accompanied with his Sergeants, and three serving men his bondslaves, went out from the camp within the territory of Beneventum, near unto the River *Calor, for to wash himself: where there chanced his enemies to lurk, and lye in wait among the willows and salows that grew by the bank side, and so being unarmed and naked too, he was assaulted, where he defended himself as well as he could with flinging at them pible stones such as the River afforded and carried down with the stream, and so was slain. Others write, that by advice of the Bowel-priests, he went but of the camp half a mile off, for to purge and expiate in some pure and clean place, those prodigious tokens above rehearsed: and there was beset and environed round about with two troops of Numidian Horsemen, who hapned there to lie in ambush. See how variable and uncertain the same goeth, both in what place, and after what manner, this so noble and famous person came by his death. Nay, the very funeral and sepulture also of Gracchus, is diversly delivered. Some say he was entered by his own souldiers within the Roman camp. Others give out and say (and that is the more common report) that by the appointment of Annibal he was buried in the very entrance of the Carthaginian leaguer; that there was a funeral fire made in solemn wise to burn his corps:
that the whole army justed and ran at tilt and torment in their compleat armor: that the Spaniards leaped and danced Morrice; and each nation according to their guise and manner performed sundry motions and exercises as well of their weapons, as of their bodies: yea, and that Annibal himself in proper person, with all honor of funeral pomp that might be devised, both in word and deed, solemnized the obsequies in the best manner. This say they that affirm the thing to have hapned in the Lucans country. But if a man should believe them, who record how he was slain at the River Calor, then the enemies had got nothing of him but only his head. Which being presented unto Annibal, he sent Caribalo immediately with it into the Roman camp, unto Cn.
Cornelius the Treasurer or Quæstor: who there within the very camp performed the funerals of the General, and both army and citizens of Beneventum together solemnized the same right hon-ourably.

The Consuls being entred into the territory of Campana, as they foraged all abroad, stragling one from another, were by the Townsmen of Capua which sallied out, and by the Horsemen of Mago, put in fear: whereupon in great fright and hast, they rallied the souldiers to their colours,
that

A that were ranged over the Country: but before they could well embarrail them, and set them in array, they were discomfited, and lost above a thousand and five hundred men. Upon which good success, the enemies (as they are a nation by nature proud) began to be very lusty and exceeding audacious, inasmuch, as they offered to skirmish sundry times with the Romans, and ever challenged them to fight. But that one battail, so unadvisedly and inconsiderately achieved, made the Consuls more circumspect and wary afterward. However, one small occurrence happened, which, as it encouraged and animated them again, so it abated the heats, and damped the boldness of the other. For in war there is nothing (be it never so little) but one time or other, it is the occasion of some great consequence and importance. There was in the same one T.
B Quintus Crispinus, linked in special friendship and familiarity with Pubius, a Citizen of Capua.
Their acquaintance grew and encreased upon this occasion: This Pubius upon a time, before the revolt of Capua, fell sick at Rome, and lying in Crispinus his house, was liberally and kindly used, yea, and tenderly seen unto by him, during his sickness. This Pubius having put himself forward before the standing guards, that watched at the gate of the Roman camp, wished, that Crispinus should be called out unto him. Which being told unto Crispinus, he happened no otherwise of it, but that he should talk friendly and familiarly with him. For albeit both nations generally were at enmity, in regard of the publick State, yet the private right and bond of hospitality, remained still in force, and was not forgotten, and therefore he went out somewhat apart from the rest of his fellows. Now, when they were come to light and interview one of the other, I challenge thee, O Crispine (quoth Pubius) to combat: let us mount on horseback, and trye it out between us two, without any other companion, whether of us is the better man at arms. To this Crispinus made answer again and said, We want no enemies, neither you nor I, upon whom we may make proof of our manhood: as for me, if I meet and encounter you in the very battail, yet I would decline, avoid, and shift from you lest I should defile and stain my hand in the murder and bloodshed of my guest and friend. And with this he turned from him, and went his way.
But the Campanians contrary-wise, upon these words, was the more eager with him, railing and raving at him for his effeminate cowardice and dastardiness, letting flye at the battails and imo-cent man all spitefull terms and reproachfull language: which himself I wot (if he had his due) was well worthy of: calling him a friendly foe, and a kind enemy indeed, and finally charged him, D that he made his excuse of sparing him, for friendship sake, whom he knew he was not able to match in manhood and valour. But if (quoth he) thou thinkest, that by the breach of publick league and covenant, our private bands of amity and hospitality, are not yet enough broken in sunder, then here I pronounce openly, in the hearing of two armies, That I Pubius a Campanian, renounce all hospitality with thee T. Quintus Crispinus a Roman, and to farewell all friendship for ever: I will, I say, have no more to do by way of acquaintance with thee, no society, no alliance, no hospitality will the guest have with that host, who in hostile manner is come to invade his native country, and to make assault upon the publick buildings and private houses thereof. And therefore, if thou be a man, meet me in the field. Crispinus drew back a long time, and was loth to enter into the action, but at last his fellow Horsemen, serving in the same troop and comit with him, forced and perswaded him, not to suffer that bragging Campanian, thus to insult over him without revenge. Whereupon he made no more ado, nor any longer delay, but whilst he went unto the L. Generals to know their pleasure, whether they would permit and license him, out of his order and rank, to fight with an enemy that challenged him, and gave him defiance. And having obtained leave, he buckled his armor about him, took his weapon, mounted on horseback, and calling upon Pubius by name, bad him come forth if he durst to singe fight. The Campanian made no stay, and so with spear in rest, set spurs to, and they ran their horses till carrier one at the other. Crispinus with his lance pierced Pubius above his shield, through the left shoulder, and therewith unhorsed him, and when he was faine to the earth with the pulsh, he alight himself from his horse, minding on foot to fall upon him as he lay along, and so to dispatch him outright. But Pubius, before his enemy scited upon him, left his target behind and his horse, and by good footmanlike recovered his own fellows. Crispinus then, all goodly to be seen with the spoils of his enemy, made shew of the horse and armor that he had won, and bearing up withal the bloody point of his lance, was with much praise and great gratulation of the souldiers, brought honourably to the Consuls, and presented before them. At whole hands he was both highly commended, and also liberally rewarded.

Annibal having dislodged out of the territory of Beneventum, and removed into Capua, within three dayes after he was come thither, brought forth his forces into the field, making no doubt at all; but that, considering the Campanians in his absence, had but few dayes before fought fortunately, the Romans now would be so much lesse able to abide his royal army so often used to victory. And verily when the conflict was once begun, the Roman battalions of the Infantry were much troubled and distressed, especially with the fierce assault of the Horsemen, who overcharged and pelted them mightily with their darts and Javelins, until the signal was given to their own Cavalry also, to set hard to, and charge the enemies with their horie. Now whilst the men of arms were busily in fight on both sides, it hapned that the Regiment of Sempronius (Gracchus lately slain) were desired marching a far off, under the conduct of Cn. Cornelius the Treasurer, which put both parts in like fear, lest they were some new and fresh enemies that advanced against them. So they founded the retreat on either side, as if they had been agreed to

to do, departed out of the field (as a man would say) on even hand, and retired themselves unto their several holds: howbeit, the greater number was slain of Romans, upon the first violent charge given by the Horsemen. From thence, the Consuls intending to draw Annibal away from Capua, departed sundry ways, Fulvius into the territory of Cumes, and Claudius into the Lucans Country. The next day, when Annibal was advertised, that the Romans had abandoned their camp, and that they were gone into divers parts with their several armies; being at first uncertain whom to pursue, resolved at length to make after Appius, and so began to do. But after he had once trained the enemy about to the place that he desired, he returned himself another way to Capua. And Annibal hapned also upon a new occasion presented, to have a good hand of his enemies in thole parts.

There was one M. Centenius, surnamed Penula, one of the chief Centurions of the Pilani, a singular good Captain in that kind, as well in regard of his mighty and goodly body, as also of his bravemind, and valiant courage. This man having served out his ordinary time required by Law, was by the means of P. Cornelius Sulla the Pretor, brought into the Senat-house, and became a Petitioner unto the LL. of the Council, that he might have the leading of five thousand footmen: promising that within short time, by reason he was so well acquainted with the nature and qualities of the enemy, and withal so much beaten in coasting thole quarters, he would do some great deed, and achieve a piece of notable service: and look, by what cunning devices and stratagems, both our leaders and our armies had been until that day, entrapped and over-raught, the very same would he use and practise against the enemy. He was not so vain and unadvised in making this offer, but they were as forthwith and foolish again in taking him at his word, and trusting him: as who would say, A good Leader and Commander, and a stout and hardy souldier were all one. And so where as he demanded but five thousand, he had the charge given of eight thousand: whereof the one half were citizens, the other allies and confederates: and besides them, he himself also gathered together out of the country as he marched, a good Company of Voluntaries: in so much as his power was doubled, by that time he came into the Lucans Country, where Annibal abode, after that he had followed Claudius in vain, and to no effect. But a man that had but half an eye, might see what the issue and event would be of the conflict between General Annibal, and Centenere Centenius: between both armies also, the one of old beaten souldiers used ever to victories, the other of raw novices and yong beginners, yea, many of them taken up suddenly in halt, and slenderly armed by the halves. For so soon as both halves had confronted one another, and that on neither side they dallied and shifted off, but minded presently to go to it & fight: soon were they on both parts arranged in order of battail, And albeit the Romans had many disadvantages, yet they maintained skirmish more than two hours: and that so holily and courageously, that they thrunk not one jot, so long as their leader stood on foot. But after that he once was stricken down and slain, who not only in regard of remembrance of the former name (that he had won) of valour and prowess: but also for fear of future shame and dishonor, in case he should remain alive after the defeat of his forces, whereof he was the only cause through his fool-hardy rashness, presented himself desperately upon the pikes of his enemies, where he might be sure of nothing but present death: and incontinently the Roman battail was discomfited and put to flight. And so hard beset they were, in seeking ways and means to escape (all the avenues were so laid and beset with the Horsemen) that of so great a multitude, there were hardly one thousand saved, all the rest miscarried here and there, and came by their death one way or other.

In this mean time, Capua was straightly beleaguered by the Consuls, and they began to assault it in most forcible manner: great preparation there was of all things needful unto such an exploit, and with great diligence every thing provided and brought accordingly. Corn was conveyed to Castellum, and laid up there for store: at the mouth of the River Vulturnus (where now the City Handely) was the sconce and castle fortified (which Fabius before had built) and a strong garrison therein planted, to the end that both the Sea so neer, and the whole River also might be at their command. Into these two fortresses standing on the Sea side, as well the corn which lately was sent out of Sardinia, as also that which Mutius the Pretor had bought out of Hetruria, was transported from the Port of Ofiss, whereby the army might be served plentifully all winter season. Over and besides that loffe received in the Lucans country, the army likewise of the Voluntaries, i. Voluntary souldiers (which during the life of Craffus, had served truly and faithfully) now abandoned their colours: as if by the death of their Captain they had taken themselves fully discharged from warfare.

Annibal made no small account of Capua: for willing enough he was, that his allies and friends there, should not be forsaken and left in so great peril wherein they stood: and yet upon that fortunate success which hapned unto him through the rashness of one Roman Captain, his fingers itched to be doing with another of them, and hoped to find some good opportunity and advantage to surprise and overthrow both Captain and army. Whereas therefore certain Apulian Embassadors advertised him, that Cn. Fulvius the Pretor, (who at the first in assaulting of certain Cities in Apulia, which had revolted unto Annibal, bare himself like a wife and prudent Captain: now afterwards, upon his good fortune and happy speed in thole affairs, whereby himself and his souldiers had made up their mouths and filled their hands well with booties and pillage) both himself and his men were grown so idle and so dissolute, that no good government nor military discipline remained among them: hereupon Annibal having good experience, (as often heretofore, so in this late instance but few dayes past) in how small stead an army serveth, when it is directed by an unskilful Leader, removed his forces into Apulia. Now lay the Roman legions and Fulvius the Pretor, encamped about Herdonia. And when the news came thither that the enemies were on their journey coming toward them, hardly might the souldiers be reclaimed and stayed, but they would in all hast pick up standards and ensigns, and straightways go into the field and bid them battail, without commission and commandement of their Pretour. And no one thing more held them back, than the assured hope they had, to do it at their pleasure whenever they would. Annibal the night following, having certain intelligence, that there was a tumult in the camp, and that most of the souldiers mightily importuned their General to put forth unto them the signal of battail, and called earnestly unto him for to lead them out into the field, made full account to meet with good opportunity and occasion, to have a fair day of his enemies: and therefore he bestowed three thousand men lightly appointed, in divers villages thereabout, among the thick groves and bushes, and within the woods: who at a sign given them, should all at once upon a suddain, start up and leap forth to their lurking corners: and withal, he gave order to Mago, with two thousand Horsemen or thereabout, to keep all the wayes whereas he supposed they were most like to flee and make escape. Having thus ordered all things beforehand in the night time: at the break of day he entered the field with his army, and embattailed himself in warlike manner. Fulvius for his part, was not behind: nor induced so much upon any hope or conceit he had of good speed, as drawn and halted thereto through the rash enforcement and compulsion of his souldiers. And therefore as they came forth to battail upon a head and heat, inconsiderately, so they were set in array as disorderly: even at the pleasure of the souldiers, according as they came forth and took up their ranks and files, as they list themselves: and then again, as the toy took them in the head left the same, either upon wilfulness or fear. The first legion together with the left wing or cornet of Horsemen were first marshalled: and the squadrons drawn and stretched out in a great length: not withstanding the Knight-Masters and Coronels cried out, that within, there was no strength nor power at all: and that the enemies whereforever they should hap to charge, would break in upon them and go through. But no wholesome counsel for their own good might be taken and considered upon: nay, they would not so much as bend their ear, and give them the hearing. And by this time Annibal was in place, with another manner of army (you may be sure) and otherwise ordered and arranged. And therefore the Romans were not able to abide so much as the first shout and shock of the onset. The Captain himself (as foolish and heady as Centenius, but in courage and resolution far short of him) seeing how the world went, the field like to be lost, his souldiers in fear and great perplexity: recovered his horse in great hast, and with some two hundred horsemen fled away and escaped: all the army besides, beaten back affront, beset behind flanked on the sides, and environed round, were so killed and hewn in pieces, that of eighteen thousand, there were not past two thousand saved. And the enemies besides were masters of the camp.

When these losses one in the neck of another were reported at Rome, the City was set in a great fit of sorrow and fear for the while: but so long as the Consuls, in whom rested the main chance, had hitherto prospered and sped well, they were the less troubled at these by-blows and cross misfortunes. Whereupon they addressed C. Lellorius and M. Mutius as messengers unto the Consuls, willing them to gather together with good care and diligence, thole dispersed reliques and remainders of the two armies: also to have an eye and heedful regard unto them, that upon fear and desperation they yielded not themselves to the enemy (as it hapned after the Cnarian overthrow): and last of all, to make diligent search and seek out thole Voluntaries, or voluntary servitors, that had abandoned their ensigns and called themselves. The like charge was laid upon P. Cornelius, who had commission besides to levy more men. And he made proclamation throughout all market Towns, fairs, and places offrequent resort, That thole Voluntaries should be found out and brought again to their own colours, to serve as aforetime. All these directions were executed and accomplished with exceeding great care and diligence.

Appius (La diu the Consul, after he had made D. Junius Captain of the sconce erected upon the mouth of the River Vulturnus, and M. Aurelius Cotta Governor of Puesoli, with commission, that as any ships [with corn] from out of Hetruria or Sardinia arrived there, they should immediately send the corn to the camp: went back himself to Capua: where he found Q. Fulvius his Colleague, transporting thither all provision from Castellum, and making preparation for the assault of Capua. Then both Coll, jointly together besieged the City: and sent unto Claudius Nro the Pretor, for to come unto them from Suffida out of the old camp of Claudius. Who likewise leaving a small garrison there to defend the peace, with all his power and forces, descended into the plains before Capua. So there were three royal pavilions pitched for three LL. Generals about Capua: and three full armies in three sundry places began to fortifie, erecting bastions and forts in places not far distant: yea and to cast a trench and raise a rampier round about the City. And in divers quarters at once, they skirmished with the men of Capua whenever they came to hinder their fortifications, with so good success, that the Townsmen were driven at last to keep within their gates and walls. But before that thole rampiers and trenches above said were fully finished and all ends brought together, there were Embassadors dispatched unto Annibal, to complain in the name of the Capuans, as finding themselves grieved.

ved, that he had forlaken Capua, and in a manner delivered it into the Romans hands: and with all, to beseech him earnestly, that now or never, he would rescue and succor them, being not only besieged, but also shut up and almost trench'd about, as within a prison. P. Cornelius likewise the Pretor of the City of Rome, sent his letters unto the Consuls, advising them before they had fully invetted Capua round about, to make offer unto the Capuans of this liberty. That as many as would, might depart with bag and baggage out of Capua: and whosoever went forth before the Ides of March, should enjoy their freedom and all their goods and lands: but as many as after that day, either departed or tarried there still behind, should be reckoned no better than very enemies. These intimations were made known unto the Campans, but so light they set by them, that they fell a railing, reviling, and menacing the Romans, with most reproachful taunts and spiteful terms. Anibal was departed from Herdonia with his legions unto Tarentum, hoping either by force or fraud to gain the Castle. And seeing he little prevailed, he turned from thence, and took his way to Brundisium, supposing that Town would be betrayed into his hands. Whiles he lay there also, and lost his time in doing nothing, the Embassadors of the Campans arrived and came unto him, with complaints and humble requests both at once, Unto whom Anibal made this glorious and lordlike answer with a Majesty: Once already have I raised the siege, and never will the Consuls, I trow, abide my second coming. The Embassadors having received their dispatch, departed with this hope: but much ado they had, to put themselves within Capua, so enclosed round was it (by this time) with a double trench and a rampier.

It fortuned at the very same instant, when Capua was thus slightly beleaguere'd, that the siege also and assault of Syracuse came to an end: helped forward and hastned by intestine treachery and treason withal, as well as by force of army and valour of Captain abroad. For Marcellus in the beginning of the spring, doubtful in himself and hanging in suspense, whether to bend his whole forces toward Agrirentum, against Himilo and Hippocrates, or still proceed to besiege Syracuse: albeit he saw the City might not possibly be won either by forcible assault, (considering it was by situation both by Sea and Land invincible) or pining famine, by reason the passage in manner lay open to and fro between it and Carthage, for safe transporting of all sort of victuals: yet because he would leave no stone unrolled, but try all ways that could be devised: he commanded certain revols from the Syracusans (for there sided with the Romans some of the noblest persons of the City, who at the time of the first backsliding from the Romans, because they misliked and abhorred all rebellion and change in the state, were driven out and banished the City) to deal with their bend and faction by way of conference, to found the hearts (I say) of such as were their followers, and to solicit them to their part: and withal to assure them (upon their warrant) that if by their means Syracuse were betrayed, they should live in freedom, and enjoy their own Laws as they would themselves. But no opportunity could they espie for to parly and talk with them. For by reason that there were many suspected to encline and draw that way, every man had a careful eye and regard unto them, that there could be no treachery practised, but soon it would be found out and detected. Yet a bond-servant toward one of the banished persons aforesaid, hapned to be let into the City, pretending that he was run away from the adverse part unto them: who hapning to meet with some few, began to move and broach such a matter, After which certain others lying close hidden under the nets in a fisher boat, came about by water to the camp of the Romans, and had conference and communication with those former fugitives and exiled men. And thus from time to time, this was practised in the same manner, by divers and sundry persons, until at length they were a crew of fourscore in all. Now when all things were concluded for the betraying of the City, neer upon the point of execution, it chanced that one Atalus (a false brother among them, who took snuff that he was not specially trusted in the matter) disclosed the conspiracy unto Epicides, and appeached the parties: whereupon they were all put to extremest torture, and suffered death every one. When this plot would speed no better, they conceived hope another way, by a new occasion and occurrence that presently offered itself. There chanced one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, sent from Syracuse, as a messenger to King Philip for to be taken prisoner by the Roman armada. Now both Epicides was very desirous and exceeding careful how to ransom him, and also Marcellus was not unwilling for his part to grant the same. For even then, the Romans began to affect the friendship of the Ætolians, with which Nation the Lacedemonians were confederate, and in league. So, when there should be commissioners and delegates sent on both sides, to parley and treat about his redemption, the most indifferent place for them to meet in, was at the key or wharf of Trogilus, fast by a turret which they call Galegræa, as being just in the midst between, and most convenient for both parties. It hapned now, that as they had recourse oftentimes thither about this business, one of the Romans well viewed the wall neer by, he counted the stones, that appeared in the forefront of the wall, and made estimate to himself of their quadrature and proportion: and withal, giving a guess as near as he could of what height (by his reckoning) and measure, the wall might be: and supposing it was a good deal lower than either he himself or others had always before taken it to be, and easily to be scaled with ladders, even of a mean size and middle sort, he relatesth the matter, and his conceit of it to Marcellus. And in his opinion it was a thing not to be neglected, but to be thought upon. But forasmuch as there was no access unto that place by reason, that for the lowliness thereof, it was the more care fully guarded and defended, it was thought good to wait for some opportunity and advantage to help that difficulty. Which, as good hap was, offered it self presently unto them by means

A means of a fugitive: who gave them intelligence, that they held a solemn feast of Dionysus at that time within the City, and the same continued three dayes together: also he said that for want of other things, during this siege to make good cheer withal, they spared for no wine, but made merry therewith in great plenty and abundance. For why? not only Epicides had bountifully bestowed wine upon the whole Commons, but also the great men of the City had in every ward and parish where they dwelt, allowed a proportion besides, of their own charges. When Marcellus heard this, he called unto him some few of his Colonels and knight Marthals, and conferred with them: and when they had sorted out certain choice and elect Centurions and souldiers, fit and sufficient men to adventure and execute to great a peece of service, and withal provided ladders secretly: to all the rest he commanded a watchword and warning to begin, That they should betimes take their refection of meat and repose of sleep, for that in the night they were to be employed in an expedition and action of service. After this, when he thought it was about the time, that they (as having feasted all day long, and well filled their bellies with meat and their heads with wine) were gone to rest, and newly fallen found asleep, he commanded one ensign or company of souldiers, to carry ladders: and besides them, there were upon a thousand well armed and appointed, marching with silence and in thin ranks, brought thither to the place. When the tumult without any stir or noise at all had scaled the top of the wall, others followed in their course. For the forward and resolute boldness of the former, was able to animate and encourage the rest, if they had been faine-hearted. By this time now the thousand armed souldiers had seized the wall: when the rest of the ladders were set to: and upon more ladders still they got up to the wall in diverse places, upon a signal given them from the gate Hexapyle, thuto which places the Romans were now come, and found no stirring at all, but exceeding silence and desolation, (forasmuch as a great sort of them had made good cheer within the turrets, and either were fast asleep with drinking wine already, or else were bibbing still, notwithstanding their eyes were heavy, and their hearts asleep. And yet, some few of them they took in their beds, and killed. Neer unto Hexapyle there is a little wicket, which with great violence they began withal, to break it open. So as now, both from the wall (as was before appointed) they gave signal by sound of trumpet: and also from all parts they went not to work any more by stealth, but plainly and openly without dissimulation. For they were come already as far as Epicides, a place full of watchmen and warders. And the enemies were to be terrified now and stricken into fear, and no longer to be dealt withal by craft and guile. And it fell out so indeed, that they were mightily scared. For they heard not so soon the sounding of the trumpets, and the shouting and outcry of them that were possessed of the walls and one part of the City, but the warders, thinking all was gone, some ran along upon the wall, others leapt from the walls, or else were born down headlong, with the press of others that were affrighted. And yet many there were who were not ware at all of this misery and extremity, both because generally they were all dead asleep, and also by reason that the City was so wide and large, that a thing felt and seen in some remote parts, reached not straightwayes throughout, to all the rest. The gate Hexapyle was broken down somewhat before day, at which Marcellus with all his power entered the City. He awakened them all, and set them to their business: he made them take weapon in hand, and to help (what they could) a City in a manner wholly surpris'd and taken. Epicides mid half from the Island (which they themselves call Naxos) with a company of souldiers about him, making full account to drive them out again: as supposing that they were but some few, who through the negligence of the watchmen and warders were got over the wall: and ever as he met with any that were scared and in fear, he laid unto them discourses, that they themselves made more ado and every thing worse than there was cause, reporting all in greater measure and more fearful manner than need was in very truth. But when he saw all pass about Epipolæ full of armed men after some small volley of shot, and little skirmish with the enemy, (whereby he provoked them, rather than did any good effect) he turned back again with his companies, and retired into Acradina not leaving so much as the violence and multitude of the enemies, as left some intestine mischief by this occasion might arise, and that he should find in this tumult and hurlyburly the gates of Acradina and the Island shut again to him. Marcellus being entered within the walls, took his prospect from the higher places, and when he beheld under his eyes the most goodly and beautiful City of all others in those dayes, (by report) he wept and shed tears abundantly, partly for joy that he had brought his purpose to good a pass, and partly in compassion and remembrance of the ancient glory and renown of that City. He called to mind the navies of the Athenians by them sunk and drowned: he thought upon the utter overthrow of two puissant armies, together with the loss of two most noble and famous Captains of theirs: moreover, there came into his memory so many wars fought against the Carthaginians, with so great peril and hazard: to many and so mighty Tyrants and Kings that reigned and kept their seat and royal court there and amongst the rest, he could not chuse but think of King Hiero, of fresh and famous memory, a Prince, who above all other gifts which his own virtue and fortune had graced and endued him withal was recommended especially for his many favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome. When all these things presented themselves to his remembrance, with this cogitation besides how all that beauty and glory within one hours space was ready to burn on a light fire, and to be consumed into ashes: he, one that he advanced his ensigns against Acradina, he sent before, those Syracusians who had converted (as is aforesaid) amongst the guards and garrison of the Romans to persuade the enemies with mild and gentle tle speech, yet, to yield the City. It so fell out, that the most part of them that warded the gates and walls both, of Acradina, were certain fugitive revolts fled from the Romans, who had no hope at all, upon any condition whatsoever to be pardoned. These would infer none, either to approach the walls, or to parle and speak with any. And therefore Marcellus, after he saw that enterprise frustrate and disappointed, commanded to retire with the ensignes unto Enryalus. This Enryalus is a little mount and fort, situate in the utmost quarter of the City, remote far from Sea, and commanding the high way that leadeth into the fields, and the middle parts and very heart of the whole Island: a place very commodious for the taking up and receipt of all victuals. The Captain of this hold was Philodemus an Argive, placed there by Epicides. Unto whom there was sent from Marcellus, Sofis, one of them that murdered the tyrant: and after long communication, Sofis with crafty words abused him, and colourably put off until another time, made relation unto Marcellus, that Philodemus had taken a farther day of treispare and deliberation. But he put off still from day to day, trifling out the time of purpose, until Hippocrates and Himilco might come with their forces and legions, making no doubt, but if he might receive them into his fortres, the whole army of the Romans being now enclosed within the walls, should be overthrowen, and utterly defeated. Marcellus seeing that Enryalus was not delivered up, (and forced possibly it could not be) encamped himself between Neapolis and Tyche (so are two parts of the City named; and may for their bigness go well enough for two entire cities of themselves;) for fear lest if he were once entered into the populous and most inhabited places of the City, his souldiers greedy of pillage, would not be kept together, but run loosely up and down to rife. Thither came unto him from Tyche and Neapolis, Embassadors and Orators, with olive branches adorned with sacred veils and insules, humbly beseeching him to hold his hand from effusion of blood, and saving the City. Marcellus calling his Council about these their petitions, rather than demands after mature deliberation, by general consent of all, gave express and freight commandment to the souldiers, that no man should offer abuse or violence to the body of any free-born person whatsoever: as for all besides, his will and pleasure was it should be their booty. Now was the camp of Marcellus defended on both sides with housing in stead of a wall, and he bestowed a good corps de guard at the gates thereof, lying open over against the streets: left when the souldiers ran to and fro in the City, the camp in the mean while might be assailed. Then upon the found of Trumpet the souldiers fell to their business, ran into all parts, brake open dores, set all on a fearful hurry, but spilled no blood; and they never gave over ransacking and rifling, until they had cast out and carried away all the riches and goods, that had been a gathering a long time, during their wealthy and prosperous estate. Amid these sirs, Philodemus also seeing no hope of succours and reliefe, after he had covenanted for his security, to returne safe and without harm to Epicides, withdrew his garrison away with him out of the fort, and rendered it up to the Romans.

Now whilst every man was turned another way, and busied in that part of the City which was forced, Bomilcar taking the advantage of one night, wherein the Roman fleet by reason of a violent tempest could not ride at anchor in the main Sea, gat forth of the haven of Syracuse with 35 ships, and having Sea-room, hoisted up sails, and away he went with a merry gale of wind, leaving 4th behind for Epicides and the Syracusians: and after he had informed the Carthaginians in what danger the state of Syracuse stood, returned within few dayes with a fleet of a hundred sail, rewarded for his labor (as the report went) by Epicides, with many rich gifts, which the treasure of King Hiero paid for. Marcellus possessed now of the fortres Enryalus, and having planted there a garrison, was well rid of one care yet: for he doubted, lest if a new power of enemies had been received behind his back into that fort, they would greatly have annoyed his men, enclosed now as they were, and encumbered within the walls.

After this he besieged Acradina, and invested it round about, and fortified three several camps (in meet and convenient places) against it, hoping to shut them up into such streights, that they should be driven to extreame scarcity and want of all things. Now when as for certain dayes, the guards of the one side and the other had rested quiet, suddenly upon the arrival of Hippocrates and Himilco they within began from all parts to set freshly upon the Romans. For, first Hippocrates (after he had encamped and well fortified himself fast by the great Key, and given a signal to them that kept Acradina) assaulted the old camp of the Romans, where Crispinus lay with his guard for the defence thereof: then Epicides also laid forth, and brake upon the Corps de guard of Marcellus: and withal, the Carthaginian fleet approached close to the strand that lieth between the City and the Roman camp, to hinder that Crispinus might have no aid sent unto him from Marcellus. And yet for all this ado, the enemies made a greater fit and tumultuous alarm, than any skitmiñh to speak of: for Crispinus not only gave Hippocrates the repulse, and drove him from the defences of his own camp, but also followed him in chase, as he fled fearfully in had away: and Marcellus forced Epicides to take the City again, and get it over his head. So as now they seemed very sufficiently provided and appointed against all dangers from thence forth, of their sudden fallies and irruptions.

Over and besides all these troubles, there hapned a common calamity unto both, the plague and pestilence: in such manner, as it might soon have withdrawn the minds, as well of the one part as of the other, from thinking any more of war. For besides that it fell out to be the Autumn or harvest season of the year, the place it self by nature unwholesome, stinking and corrupt (but much more without the City than within) the extreame and intolerable heat of the weather

A weather mightily dis tempered all their bodies generally, in the camps both the one and the other. At the first, by occasion of the dis temperature of the season, and corruption of the place, they both fell sick and died: but afterward by visiting and tending one another that were infected, the disease grew catching and contagious, and so spread and increased more and more: in such manner, as either they that were fallen sick perished for want of looking to and diligent attendance: or if any came about them, to keep them and minister unto them, they were infected, and endangered also as deeply as the other: so as every day a man could go no where, but either death, or corpses carried forth to their graves, were presented to his eyes: night and day in all places there was nothing heard but weeping, wailing, and piteous lamentation. In the end their hearts were so hardened and made savage again, by continual usage to this misery, that not only they gave over to weep over the dead, and to accompany them unto their sepulchres with due mourning and doleful plaints, but also to carry them forth and to inter them: so that the breathlesse bodies lay scattered all abroad on the ground in the sight of them, that looked every hour for the like miserable death themselves. The dead killed the sick: the sick infected the sound, partly with fear, and partly with the corruption and pestiferous stench that came from their bodies. And because they would die rather upon the words point, than of this maladic, some of them made offer to go alone among the armed guards of their very enemies, to be killed out of hand, and rid out of their misery. Howbeit, the plague was hotter by far in the Carthaginian camp, than among the Romans, by reason of corrupt water, and much laughter committed there, and so long siege about Syracuse. For of the enemies army, the Sicilians at the first, so soon as they saw the sickness to spread commonly, and increase by reason of the corruption of the place, got themselves away, and stole every man home to the Cities near adjoining. But the Carthaginians were faine to stick by it still, as having no place to retire themselves unto, and so, they together with their Generals themselves Hippocrates and Himilco, died all of them, and not one escaped. Marcellus when he saw this mortality grow thus hot, brought his people into the City, where the houses and shadowy places yielded some good refreshing to the sick and weak bodies: howbeit, many also of the Roman army went of it, and turned up their heels. Thus when the Land-souldiers of the Carthaginians were all gone and consumed of the plague, the Sicilians who had served under Hippocrates, withdrew themselves into certain Towns, which were not greiv, yet sure and strong, both by natural situation, and also by strength of walls and other defences: the one of them three miles from Syracuse, the other fifteen miles distant from the haven mouth: and thither they conveyed from out of their own Cities adjoining, all manner of victuals, and sent abroad for aids of men.

In the mean while Bomilcar set sail once again with his fleet for Carthage, where he made relation of the state of their confederats in such terms, that still he fed them with some hope. That not only by their help they might be saved, but also that the Romans (notwithstanding they had in some sort forced and taken the City) might be surprized and taken there themselves: and in conclusion perswaded and prevailed so with them, that they granted not only to send with him a great number of hulks and caricks, laden with store of all things, but also to furnish him with E more ships of war, to increase his Armado. Whereupon he departed from Carthage with 130 Gallies, and 70 ships of burden, and had forewinds good enough to let him over into Sicily. But those winds kept him from doubling the point of the Cape Pachynus.

The fame and rumor first of Bomilcar's coming, and then his delay above mens expectation, that checked it again, wrought diversly in the minds of the Romans and Syracusians, ministering one while fear, another while joy unto them both. Whereupon Epicides learning lest if the same Easterly winds which then held, and were settled in that corner, should continue many dayes more, the Carthaginian navy would return again into Affrick, leaving the guard of Acradina to the Captains of the waged and mercenary souldiers, sailed to Bomilcar, riding still with his fleet in the rode that looketh toward Affrick, and fearing a conflict at Sea, not so much because he was inferior to the enemies either in force or number of ships (for he had many more than the Romans) but for that the winds stood more favourably to help the Roman Armado than his: howbeit, in the end he perswaded him to try the fortune of a battail at Sea. And Methanhis for his part, seeing both the Sicilian forces gather and assemble together from all parts of the Island, and understanding that the Carthaginian fleet was coming with great force of victuals: for fear lest at any time whilst he was shut up within the enemies City he should be assailed both by Sea and Land: albeit he was short of them in number of ships, yet determined to hinder Bomilcar for arriving at Syracuse. Thus rid two armades of enemies affronting one another, about the head of Pachynus, ready to joyn battail, so soon as the calmness of the weather would give them leave to advance into the main and open Sea. Therefore when the East wind began to lie, which for certain dayes had bliftred and raged first Bomilcar weighed anchor: and the vanguard of his Armado seemed to gather still into the deep, only because he might more easily gain the Cape and promontory aforesaid. But so soon as he saw the Romans ships make way toward him, (I wot not what sudden accident it was that astonished him) he set up all his sails and fell off, into the main Sea: and after he had sent certain messengers to Heraclides, willing them to go to fetch again their hulks home into Affrick, himself coasted all along Sicily, and shaped his course for Tarentum. Epicides disappointed thus on a sudden, of so great hopes that he had, because he would not return again to the siege of a City, whereof a great part was lost already, faithlesly

Aggrigennum, there to abide and expect the event and small issue, rather than to stir himself and trye any more, how to help them with any succour from thence.

These things being reported in the camp of the Sicilians, to wit, that Epicides had quit Syracuse; that the Carthaginians had abandoned the whole Island of Sicily, and in manner yielded it again into the hands of the Romans: after they had founded first their minds who were besieged, by talk and conference with them, they sent Embassadors unto Marcellus, to treat about conditions of surrendering the City. When they were grown in a manner to this point, without any squaring or difference at all, that the Romans should have the signory all and wholly which belonged unto the Kings: and that, all the rest the Sicilians should enjoy, with liberty and their own proper Laws: the Embassadors aforesaid called forth to a parley, those unto whom Epicides at his departure had committed the government of the affairs, and declared unto them, that as they were addressed Orators unto Marcellus, so they were from him sent unto the army of the Sicilians: that generally all, as well the besieged, as those who were without the danger of the siege, should be comprized within the treaty, and abide one and the same fortune: and that neither the one side nor the other should capitulate or enter into any covenant for themselves apart, without all the rest. Who being received and admitted, for to salute and speak unto their kinsfolk and friends, made them acquainted with the agreement and composition between Marcellus and them: and so after they had presented unto them some good hope of their safety, they perswaded with them so far forth, as to joyne with them, and all together, for to set upon and assault the bodies of the Captains deputed by Epicides, namely, Polycletus, Philisio, and one Epicides furnished Sydrus. When they were once made away and killed, they called the multitude together unto a general assembly: where they complained greatly of their poverty, and penury of all things (for which they were wont to murmur secretly among themselves): "And albeit we are distressed (say they) with so many miseries and calamities, yet are ye not to blame for- tunc therefore, so long as it was in your own power and choice, either to be delivered from them, or to endure them longer. As for the Romans (said they) it was not harred, but meer love and charity, that moved them to come against Syracuse for to assault it. For when they heard that the government of the state was usurped by Hippocrates and Epicides (the ministers first belonging to Annibal, and after to Hieronymus) then they began to lay siege unto it, intending not the overthrow and destruction of the City it self, but to put down and depose the cruel tyrant that ruled the state. Seeing then, that now Hippocrates is dead, Epicides excluded from Syracuse, his Deputies and Captains killed, and the Carthaginians driven out of all their hold and possession of Sicily, both by Land and Sea, what reason have the Romans, but to be willing and well content, that Syracuse should continue in safety now, as well as if Hiero himself were living, the only maintainer and observant upholder of the Roman amity? And therefore, if ought but well should happen, either to the City, or to the Citizens, ye may thank your selves, and none else, for letting slip opportunity now offered, of reconciliation and atonement with the Romans. Never look to have the like occasion hereafter, to that, which at this instant is presented: if ye had the grace to see what a door is opened for you, to be delivered from the yoke of most insolent and proud tyrants. This speech they gave ear unto with exceeding accord and general applause. But before that any Embassadors were nominated to M sent unto Marcellus, it was thought good that new Pretors should be created. Out of the number of which Pretors, there were Orators addressed unto Marcellus. And the principal man among them, spake in this wise, "Neither we Syracusians (quoth he) O Marcellus, at the first re- volved from you Romans, but Hieronymus, impious and wicked Prince as he was: yet nothing so much hurtful to you as to us: nor afterwards, when peace was knit again upon the murder of the tyrant, was it any citizen of Syracuse, but Hippocrates and Epicides (the Kings right hands and ministers, who oppressed and kept us under, with fear of one side, and with de- ceivable sleights on another side) that made the brack, and were the troublers and disturbers of this peace. Nor yet can any man come forth and say truly, that ever we were at our own liberty, N and entertained not peace and amity with you. And now all I assure you, so soon as by the massacre of these, that held Syracuse in such oppression and bondage, we began again to be our own men, and to have the law in our own hands: the first thing you see that we do, is this, to come and present our selves unto you, to deliver up our armor and weapons, to yield our bodies, our City, the walls, and all the strength thereof, and to refuse no condition, that it shall please you Romans to impose upon us. As to your self, O noble Marcellus, the Gods have given you the honour of conquest, over the most noble and beautiful city of all other in Greece. Behold, now, what memorable as is forever that we have at any time achieved, either by Land or Sea, all makes to the advancement of the glorious title and dignity of your triumph. See you then, that another day it be not known by bare hear-say and the trump of fame, how great and mighty a City you have won, but rather that it may stand still and remain for all posterity, for a mark and worthy spectacle to behold: to the end, that whoever hereafter, shall resort thither by Land, whoever shall arrive there by Sea, it may present unto them, both our Tro- pices and worthy victories over the Athenians and Carthaginians: and also this of yours over us, the bravest conquest of all the rest. See (I say) that you leave for your house and family, the City of Syracuse whole and sound, to do homage and fealty ever hereafter, to the name and lineage of the Marcelli, and to hold of them as of their sovereign LL, in chief and in villenage. That

A "That all the World may see, that the late remembrance of Hieronymus, beareth no greater stroke with the Romans, than the ancient name of King Hiero, a noble Prince of famous memory. Much longer was he a friend, than the other an enemy. His good deeds and many favours ye have tasted and felt with great contentment: the folly and madnels of Hieronymus, hurt none of you, but wrought his own confusion and overthrow. There was nothing but they might have obtained at the Romans hands: all was clear there, and no danger from thence. But among their own selves they were at more war: there was the peril, there was all the mischief. For the Roman rebels, who were run from them, doubting that they should be delivered over into their hands, and not comprized within the terms of the composition and protection, drove B the auxiliaries also that were waged soldiers into the same trouble and fear, they hastily there- fore took arms, and so killed the Pretors: and afterwards, ran all about to massacre the Syracusians. Look whom they hapned to meet, whom they murdered in this furious fit of choler. Whatsoever came next to their hands, and lay handsome for them, they rifled. And because forsooth, they would not be without their leaders, they created six Provosts or Captains, that three should govern Acradina, and other three Nafos. At the last, alter the upore was appeared, the mercenary soldiers aforesaid, followed the matter thoroughly by search and diligent inquiry, what were the capitulations indeed agreed upon with the Romans: and then began the very truth to appear, namely, that their condition and the fugitives were far C different.

These Embassadors in very good time returned from Marcellus, and certified them that they were carried away with a wrong surmise and false suspicion, and the Romans had no just cause to punish them. Now there was one of those three Provosts of Acradina, a Spaniard named Mericius. Unto him there was sent for the nonce among those of the retinue and train of the Embassadors aforesaid, one of the Spaniards, who were auxiliary soldiers, serving under the Romans: who finding Mericius alone without other company, gave him to understand especially above all things, in what terms he had left Spain (and from thence he was newly come) namely, how the Romans there were grown mighty, and held a great hand over them with their force. And that himself, in case he had a mind to do some worthy deed, might soon rise, and be a great man in his country: chuse whether he list to serve under the Romans, or return again into his own D home. Contrary-wise, if he went on still in this course he had begun, and minded still to be besieged, what long abiding place could he have there, shut up as he was from Sea and Land? Mericius pondered well these reasons: and when it was agreed, that there should be addressed new Embassadors unto Marcellus, sent his own brother with them, who by the self same Spaniard was brought apart from all the rest unto Marcellus: and after he had a protection granted, he laid the plot, and ordered all the matter how it should be done, and so returned to Acradina. Then Mericius because he would withdraw mens minds from all suspicion of treason, and that he intended nothing lesse, than to betray Acradina, gave it out, That he liked not, and would no more of this recourse, ever and anon, of Embassadors between: and therefore as he would admit of none to come from Marcellus, so he would send no more to him. And to the end, that E all the guards should be kept more diligently, he thought it good to divide conveniently among the Provosts, the quarters of the City, and assign to every one his ward by himself, and that each one should be bound to answer for the safe keeping of his own division, and for no more. Then all gave their consent to part accordingly, and to himself belet the charge of that quarter which reacheth from the fountain or well Arethuse, unto the mouth or entry of the great key or haven. And hereof he gave notice and intelligence to the Romans. Whereupon Marcellus caused a great Hulk, laden with armed soldiers, to be battened by an haling rope unto a Gally of four couple of oars, and so in the night by strength of oars to be towed and drawn up after it into Acradina, and linceth the soldiers over against the gate, that is near to the fountain Arethuse. This being done about the relief of the fourth watch, Mericius received the soldiers that were set ashore at F the gate, according as before it was agreed. And Marcellus by the dawning of the day, with all his forces gave a Camifado upon the walls of Acradina, in such manner, that not only he turned thither unto his assault all those that kept Acradina, but also from Nafos there came running whole squadrons and companies of armed men (leaving their own wards) for to repel and put back the violence and assault of the Romans. In this turmoil and trouble, certain Barges appointed and furnished thereto aforehand, were brought about to Nafos: there (for other soldiers aland) who coming at unwares upon the corps de guard, that were left half naked and very weak, by reason of the departure of their fellows, and finding the gates wide open, at which while the soldiers ran out, with small ado were Masters of Nafos, left, as it was, forlorn of warders, who in fear made haft to run away and escape. And none of them al had lesse means to defend themselves, or smaller mind to tarry till, than the fugitive rebels, for they durst not well trust their own fellows, and so in the hottest of the skirmish made an escape. Marcellus so soon as he understood, that Nafos was won, and likewise that one quarter of Acradina was held and kept for him, and that Mericius with his guard had joynd to his soldiers, founded the retreat: for fear, that the Kings treasure, which was more in name than in deed, should be rifled and spoiled.

Thus by suppressing the violence of the soldiers, both the rebel fugitives that were in Acradina, had good time and place to shift for themselves and get away, and also the Syracusians de- livered livered now at last from fear, opened the gates of Acradina, and sent Orators unto Marcellus, H craving nothing but life for themselves and their children. Marcellus called his Council together, and those Syracusans likewise, who in the time of civil dissention, were driven to forsake their houses, and remained among the garrisons of the Romans: and then he made the Embassadors this answer. "There have not been (quoth he) more benefits and good turns for the space of fifty years received at King Hiero his hands by the people of Rome, than detriments and mischiefs intended against them within these few years, by them that have seized and possessed the City of Syracusa. But most of those mischiefs in the end, have lighted upon their heads right justly, who duly deserved the same: and for the breach of league and covenants, they themselves have suffered at their own hands more grievous punishment by far, than the people of Rome I would willingly ever have required. As for me, this is the third year that I lie in siege before Syracusa: not, I assure you, with this intent, that the City should not be referred safe and sound for the natural people thereof to keep and inhabit, but that the Captains and ring-leaders of fugitives and rebels might not seize it, and to hold it in captivity and oppression. How much the Syracusans might have done with me at first, may be easily seen by the example either of those Syracusans who converted among the guards of the Romans, or of the Spanish Captain Marcus, who yielded up his garrison. Yea, and the hardy and resolute course in the end taken (although it were with the latest) by the Syracusans themselves, may sufficiently testify the same. Whereby also it may appear, that for all my travel and pain which I have undergone, for all the perils which I have adventured and passed through, about the walls of Syracusa, both by Land and Water, thus long: I have gathered no fruit so sweet and pleasant as this, that it may be said, how I was able, yet at last, to win and conquer Syracusa.

Then the Quæstor was sent, attended with a guard, unto Nasos, for to enter upon the Kings treasure there, and to keep the same in safety. The pillage of the City was given to the soldiers: but there were appointed certain warders over every house of theirs, who were among the garrisons of the Romans, for to save the same. Amidst many cruel, spiteful, and foul examples of anger, malice, and covetousness, which happened to be committed during the time of this sackage, it is reported. That in so great hubbub as possibly might be, when a City is newly taken, and hungry soldiers run to ridding, Archimedes was busily occupied, and studying upon certain Geometrical figures that he had drawn out in the dust, and happened to be slain by a soldier, that knew not who he was. Whereat Marcellus was much offended and displeased: and thereupon gave especial order, that he should be honourably entred: yea, and caused his kinsfolks to be sought out: and all they in remembrance of him, and for his name sake, were not only saved, but also well accounted of, and had in good reputation. Thus you see in what fort, and by what means especially Syracusa was won. A City wherein was found such store of wealth and riches, as hardly would have been gotten in Carthage, if it had been forced then: notwithstanding it was able to hold out with Rome, and maintain war with equal force and power.

Some few dayes before the winning of Syracusa, T. Otacilius with fourscore Gallies, of five ranks of oars, crossed the Seas from Lilybaeum to Utica, and being entred the gate before day light, chanced to take by the way certain Caricks charged with corn. After he was disbarbed and let a Land, he wasted grievously part of the territory about Utica, and returned to the City with booty and prizes of all sorts. And the third day after he went from Lilybaeum he returned thither again with 130 caricks full of corn and other booty: and that com he sent forthwith to Syracusa: which with it had not come as it did in good time to help the present necessity, the conquerors as well as the conquered had felt the smart of most extrem and grievous famine.

In the same summer, the Roman Generals in Spain (who almost for two years had done no memorable act there, but warred by policy and stratagems, more than by force of arms) dislodged from their forts and winter harbors, and joynd their armies together. Then they called a Council, where they jumped with one general accord in this opinion, That considering all this while they had effected this much only, as to encompass and itay Asdrubal from all means of passing over into Italy, it was now high time to make an end at once of the war in Spain. And to effect and bring this to passe, they supposed verily that their strength was well amended and sufficient, by reason that in the winter time they had levied and put in arms thirty thousand Celtiberians. Now the Carthaginians had in Spain then no fewer than three armies. Asdrubal the son of Gilgo, and Mago, were encamped with all their forces together, distant from the Romans almost five dayes journey: Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, an ancient warrior, and an old Captain in Spain, was somewhat neerer with his whole power, before a City named Antorgis. Him the Roman Generals were desirous to defeat and vanquish first, and in good hope they were, that they had strength enough and to spare, for to accomplish that: many, this was their only doubt and fear, lest upon the discomfiture of him, the other Asdrubal and Mago would for fear retire themselves into the unpassable woods, and take the wilds and mountains, and so maintain a long war. They supposed therefore it was the best course to divide their power between them in two parts, and at once to compass the whole war of Spain. And thus they agreed to part their forces: namely, That P. Cornelius should leave 10 third parts of the army, consisting of Romans and allies, against Mago and Asdrubal: and that Cn. Cornelius with the other third part of that old army should joyn with the Celtiberians, and war against Asdrubal the Barchine [i. son of Amilcar abovejoyn] Both these Captains with their hosts set out together in their journey, putting the Celti-

A berians before in the vanguard, and encamped neer the City Antorgis in the sight of their enemies, having but the river running between. And then Cn. Scipio laid behind, and made his abode with the power aforesaid: but P. Scipio went onward to perform that part of the war which he purposed and intended. Asdrubal after he perceived that there lay in camp but a small power of Romans, and that their whole hope relied upon the aids of the Celtiberians: as one that could well skill of the falshood and treachery of the barbarous people, but especially of all those nations, among whom he had been so long a soldier: by reason that both camps, as well his own as the other of the Romans, were full of Spaniards, he used by the means of reciprocal commerce of their language for to have secret speech and conference with the principal heads of the Celtiberians, and so treated with them, that in consideration of a great sum of money, they were persuaded and yielded in the end to withdraw all their forces from thence, and give the Romans the slip. And this they supposed was not so heinous and odious a fact. For why? they were not dealt withal to turn their swords upon the Romans, and to war against them: again, they were to have as good pay and wages to sit still, and not to serve, as was sufficient to bind them for to bear arms and fight: and last of all, rest it self, and sleeping in a whole skin, together with their return home to their own, and the joy and pleasure of visiting their friends, and seeing their goods and lands, were plausible and pleasing inducements to every man. And therefore the Captains themselves were no sooner drawn thereto, than the very multitude, Over and besides, to dislike it dead fire, they stood in no fear of the Romans (being so few as they were) that they could possibly keep them perforce. And surely, this might well serve, to be a caveat for Roman Captains ever hereafter, and such precedent examples and instances as this, may stand in stead of good lessons indeed, to teach them how they trust again the aids of foreigners: and never to rely themselves so much upon them, but that they always have in their camp the greater part of their own forces, and the more number of their natural soldiers. All on a sudden therefore the Celtiberians dislodged, plucked up standards, and departed from them and never had them farewell. And when the Romans demanded the cause of this change, yea, and besought and importuned them to tarry, they made them no other answer but this, That they were called and sent for home by occasion of wars in their own country. Scipio seeing that these Allies of his were so slippery, and could neither be intreated nor enforced to stay: and that himself alone without them was not able to make his part good with the enemy: and to joyn again with his brother, was a thing impossible: for want of all other good means, for the present, when he saw no remedy else, determined to retire himself as far backward as he could: having this especial care above all things, not to encounter and joyn battail with the enemy in plain field, without some advantage, who now was passed over the river, and traced him hard at heels in his dimarch.

About the same time P. Scipio stood in the like terms of fear, but in more danger by the coming of a new enemy, and that was Masaniassa: the young Prince who then was a friend and pensionary soldier of the Carthaginians: but afterwards mighty and renowned for his amity with the Romans. He with his Numidian Horsemen first encountered P. Scipio, as he marched on his journey, and afterwards both day and night molested and troubled him very shrewdly: in such sort, that not only he would intercept and catch up those that were gone out wandering and stragling far before the camp, a felling or foraging, and send them short of home: but also ride braving even before the camp. Many a time would he venture, yea, and enter upon the thicket of the standing corps de guard, and make foul work and trouble among them. By night also he used oft to make many starts upon a sudden, and assail the gates of the camp and the rampier, and put them in exceeding great frights. So as the Romans at no time, nor in no place could be at rest and quiet for him, but ever in fear and doubt of some shrewd turn or other by him: so as they were driven to keep within their rampier cut off from the use of all commodities abroad, and in a manner as good as besieged: and more frightly yet were they like to be beleaguered, in case Indibilis, who was coming (as the rumor went) with 7500 Suffletrians, were once joyned with the Carthaginians. Whereupon Scipio a wary warrior and prudent Captain otherwise driven to the hardest extremities, and forced to make shifts, entred into a rash and inconsiderate designment, even to go on and meet (forsooth) Indibilis in the night, and in what place soever it should be his hap to encounter him, there to bid him battail, and fight with him. Leaving therefore a mean guard to keep the camp, and T. Ponticus his Lieutenant, as Provost and Captain, he set out at midnight and meeting with his enemies, joynd battail with them: but they skirmished rather by loose companies in their march, than with their united forces in set and pight field. Howbeit, the Romans had the better hand so much as it was, considering what a confused and disorderly conflict there might be. But the Numidian Cavalry, whom Scipio thought he was secured of, and that they were not aware of him, all on a sudden flanked the sides of the Romans, and mightily terrified them. Against these Numidians, whiles Scipio made head again afresh, beheld a third sort of enemies also charged upon his back, even the Carthaginian Captains, who by this time while the other were in fight, had overtaken their allies and were come thither. So as the Romans were to maintain battail on all hands and were at a stand and in doubt with themselves against which enemy to turn first or what way with a close couched squadron to give the venture for to break through. As the General was thus manfully fighting, and encouraging his soldiers, presenting and opposing himself forward, where was most need and danger, his chance was to run through the right side of his body with a Lance: and that massive band of the enemies which had charged upon the thick from thence by that means he sleeth straightwaies directly toward the other camp. Where they H were caught up by the cohort of footmen, and the cornet of horsemen, which rose up suddenly out of their Ambuscado: and being enclosed on every side, were killed to the last man. And yer, if it had been any ones good hap to have escaped from thence with life, so wisely, and with lo great expedition) the Romans after they had got the nearer camp, sped themselves to the other, that he could not have recovered it before them, to bring news of the defeat. And even there likewise, the farther they were off from their enemy, the more negligent they were: and because some also a little before day were slept away a forraging, fuelling, and plundering, the Romans found every thing more loose and out of order, than in the other camp. Their weapons only stood reared up in their corpi de guard, the soldiers themselves were unarmed, either sitting and lying all along on the ground, or walking up and down before the gates, and under the rampier. With these soldiers so secure, so retchless, so difarmed and disordered (the Romans being yet in their hot blood, and not cooled upon their fresh massacre, and more than that, lusty and brag for their new victory) began to make a fray, and to skirmish. But the Carthaginians were not able to keep them out of the gates. And so within the Camp there was a hot and cruell fight: for, from all turps thereof, they ran together upon the first alarm that arose in the very beginning of the tumult and scuffling. And long had that skirmish continued, but that the Romans bucklers and targets seen all bloody were a pattern unto the Carthaginians of a former execution: and thereupon drove them into a mighty fear. This fearful sight caused them all to turn back and take their heels: and thus as many of them as escaped killing got out by heaps wherefoever they could make shift to find way, and were clean turned out of their camp, and all that they had. So in the K camps of one day and night, by the conduct and direction of L. Martius, there were two encamped holds forced and won from the enemies: in which there were 37000 of the enemies slain, 1830 taken prisoners besides the gain of a mighty rich booty. In which pillage, there was found a shield of Antiver weighing 138 pound, with the image and portraiture of Asdrubal the Barchine. Valerius Antiver recordeth, that the camp only of Mago was taken, and seven thousand men slain: and that in another battell with Asdrubal, upon a fally forth, there died ten thousand, and 4330 were taken prisoners. Piso writeth, that when Mago followed after our men in an hot and disorderly chace (for they seemed to give back and retreat) there were five thousand men killed by the train of an ambush. But all writers do blaz on the great honour and fame of Duke Martius. And L besides the very truth of his glorious name, they make mention also and speak of some miracles: namely, that as he made the Oration unto his soldiers, there was seen a flaming fire burning from his head, without any sente and feeling of his to the great wonder and fear of the soldiers that stood about him: and that in the memoriall of his brave victory over the Carthaginians, there remained in the temple of Jup. untill the Capitoll was burned, that foresaid field, with the Image of Asdrubal, and it was called Martius his field. After this, Spain was quiet for a long time, whiles both sides after so many overthrowes given and taken between them, were loath to hazard the main chance in one battell.

In the time that these affairs passed in Spain, Marcellus upon the winning of Syracuse, having set all other things in order throughout Sicily, with such faithfulness and upright integrity, that M not only he greatly augmented his own glory, but also enlarged the majesty of the people of Rome, brought over to Rome all the goodly and beautiful ornaments of that City, their graven and molten images, their pictures and painted tables, whereof there was great store in Syracuse. These braveries (no doubt) at the first were no more but the spoils of enemies, and lawfully acquired in right of war and conquest. But from thence began our great love and liking to the cunning workmanship of Grecian Artificians: and from hence came afterwards our licentiousness and outrage in spoiling and robbing, so commonly & ordinarily, all sacred and profane places, where these things were to be had: which staid not so, but proceeded and turned at length to the spoiling of the Roman gods themselves, and to that very first Temple which by Marcellus was beautified and adorned principally above the rest. For strangers and forrein travellers used in pilgrimage to visit N the Temples which were dedicated by Marcellus at the gate Capena, in regard only of the most rare and singular workmanship of the ornaments in that kind, of which at this day there is very little or nothing to be seen.

Now from all City well-near of Sicily, there resorted Embassies unto him: as their causes were divers and unlike, so their conditions were not all one. As many as before the winning of Syracuse, had either not rebelled at all, or became reconciled and in favour again, they were accepted in the quality of faithfull Allies, and made much of: those who for fear after the loss of Syracuse, yielded, were reputed as conquered, and received laws and conditions at the will and pleasure of the Conqueror. There remained yet no small reliques of war about Aggrigentum for the Romans to dispatch, namely, Epicides and Hanno, the Captains of the former war: and a third, sent new from Annibal in the room of Hippocrates, a Citizen of Hippo, his countrein name him Mutines: descended from the Libyphoenices, a man of Action, and one who under Annibal had been brought up and taught all feats of arms, and skill of warfare. Unto his charge were committed by Epicides and Hanno the Numidian Auxiliaries, with whom he over-ran all the countries be- longing to the enemies: he went unto all the Confederates, and so wrought with them to continue fast in their allegiance, and to send aids to every one in due time accordingly: in such sort, that within A within short time he got himself a great name throughout all Sicily so as the favors and faction of the Carthaginians had no greater hope in any than in him. And therefore both Captains, as well Hanno the Carthaginian, as Epicides the Syracusan, who for a time had been pent up within the walls of Aggrigentum, bearing themselves as well upon the fidelity as policy of Mutines, boldly adventured to come forth of the walls of Aggrigentum, and upon the river Himer, encamped themselves. Whereof Marcellus having intelligence, forthwith removed with all his power, and fate him down encamped, almost four miles from the enemy, minding to wait and expect what they did or went about. But Mutines gave him neither opportunity of place to ret him long, nor respite of time to take counsell in, but crossed the river, and with exceeding terror, and tumultu- Bous noise assailed the standing guards of his enemies: yea, and the morrow after gave them bat- tle as it were in a pitch field, and drove them within their holds and fortifications. But being called from thence by occasion of a mutiny of Numidians within the Camp (who to the number almost of three hundred were departed to Heracles Mino) he went to appeale their moods, and to reclaim them to due obedience: but he gave the rest of the Captains (by report) a great charge and expers warning, not to fight with the enemy, howsoever they did in his absence. But both the Captains were greatly offended therat, and Hanno especially, who was already mile-con- tent, and repined at his glory: What? saith he, thinker Mutines, a base African, and not of the right stamp neither, to gage and rule me a Carthaginian General, sent with Commission from the Senat and people? He periwaded therefore Epicides effectually to pass over the river, and to strike C a battell-for-quoeth he, if we should stay for him, and then hap to have a fortunate day of it and win the victory, all the honour no doubt shall redound to Mutines.

Bye sure, Marcellus thought this a great indignity, that he who had repulsed at Nola Annibal, even when he bare himself so bravely upon his fresh victory at Cannae, should give one foot to these petty enemies, vanquished already by him both by sea and land: whereupon he commanded his soldiers to arm in all haste, and to bring forth the standards and ensigns. But as he was ar- ranging his men in battell array, there came riding unto him all on the spur, with bridle on the horse neck, ten Numidians from out of the army of the enemies, with these tidings and intelligence, assuring them, "That their countrein, who first were offended and discontented by occa- D sion of that mutiny aforeaid, wherein three hundred of their company departed and went away to Heracles: and then afterwards, because they saw their own head and leader, by the practice of those other Captains, who malignd and envied his glory, sent far enough out of the way, e- ven against the very day when the battell should be fought: were not disposed at all to fight, but would sit still and not stir. A kind of people they were, deceitfull otherwise, and used to break promise: howbeit now, they were just and true of their word. Upon this, as the Romans took better heart unto them, (for there was a speedy purfivant, or contrient throughout the battalions from company to company, for to signify unto them, that the enemy was disappointed and abandoned of his Cavalry, whom they feared most of all other) so the enemies were mightily dismayed and put in fear: for over and besides, that they had no help from them who were the greatest strength of their army, they were in a deeper left their own horsemen would E be set upon. By which occasion the conflict was not great, for at the first shout and shock given, well it was seen which way the game would go, and the matter was soon determined. The Numidians, who at the first encounter, and during the conflict, had stood quiet in both points of the battell, seeing their own fellows turn back and flie, bare them only company for a while as they fled: but after that they perceived them all to make haste forsoar to Aggrigentum: fearing also themselves there to be besieged among them, slipped away every one to their own Cities. Many thousand were there slain and taken prisoners: and eight elephants besides taken alive. This was the last field fought by Marcellus in Sicily: upon this victory he returned to Syracuse. By this time now was the year almost come about and growing to an end. And therefore at Rome the Senate decreed, that P. Cornelius the Praetor should lend letters to the Consuls, lying before Capua, pur- F porting this tenour: That forasmuch as Annibal was far from them, and no great matter of consequence like to be performed the while at Capua: the one of them (if they thought fit) should repair to Rome, for to create new Magistrates in the room of the old. The Consuls having received the letters, agreed between themselves and took order, that Claudius should go to hold and accomplish the solemne election of Magistrates: and Fulvius remain till at Capua. So Claudi- us created new Coss. Cn. Fulvius Centimalus, and P. Sulpitius Galba the son of Servius: a man that had not born any curule office of state before. After these were Praetors chosen, L. Cornelius Lenu- tinus, M. Cornelius Cethegus, C. Sulpitius, C. Calpurnius Piso, unto Piso befell the jurisdiction with- in the City. Sulpitius had the government of the Province Sicily, Cethegus of Apulia: and Lenu- tinus of Sardinia. The Consuls had the government of their Provinces prorogued for to continue G one year longer.

The answer of
Cn. Fulvius.

"full and ignominious soldiery. Lo; how unequally at Rome the freedom of the City is parted "between the rich and the poor: between men of nobility and high calling, and those that are of "mean parentage and low degree."

Thus much spake the plaintiff C. Sempronius Blaesus. The defendant on the other side, shifted all the blame from himself, and laid the whole fault upon his soldiery, alleging and pleading thus: "That when they called upon him hastily, and with great wilfulness to give battle, he "brought them forth into the field, not on that day which they would themselves (for it was late "in the evening) but the morrow after, when both time and place were meet, and convenient for "the purpose: and notwithstanding they were well appointed and orderly embattled, yet were
"they not able to sustain, either the fame, or the fury of the enemies, I know not whether, And "when they all fled away again, he also was carried away in the throng of the rout like as Varro
"the Consul, at the battell before Cannæ, and as many other Generals elsewhere. And what good "could he have done to the Common weal, in case he had staid behind alone? unless perad-
"venture his death might have cured and remedied the publike foer and maladies: or made "amends for the common losses. Neither was it for want of victuals, nor for that he light at un"awares upon places of disadvantage and danger: nor yet, because he was entrapped within the "trains of an ambush, marching on end for ward, without lending his elpials before, that he was "overcome; but even by mere force, by dint of sword, in open field, and in a plight battell. And it "was not he could do withall, if his own men were fearful and timorous, and the enemies hardy
"and venturous, he had not the rule of their hearts, It is long of every one his own nature to be "either bold or heartless."

Two several days he was judicially accused, and at both times a fine of money only set upon his head, in case the matter should go against him. At the third Session the witnesses were produced forth, to be deposed and give evidence: and after that he had been shamefully reviled, and charged with all manner of reproaches: there were very many upon their oath testified, That the first beginning of the fright and flight both, was occasioned by the Prætor himself: and that the soldiery, seeing themselves forsaken by him, and supposing verily that their Captain and Leader was not afraid of his own shadow, but had great reason to fear, they likewise turned their backs and fled. Upon which evidence, the whole Court was so incensed against him with anger, that they cried all with one voice, to commence a capital action, for that he was worthy to die.
Whereupon arose a new debate and controversy: for whereas the Tribune had twice before laid a penal action upon him of money, and now at the third time said that he would have a jury of life and death go upon him: then he called upon the other Tribunes for their helping hand to mitigate this rigour of the Tribune. But when those his Collegues made answer again and said, that they would not oppose themselves nor hinder his course, but that he might proceed in the suit at his own good pleasure, more majorem, &c. [according to the ancient manner used by their forefathers,] either by order of law, or rule of custom, and bring him being but a private person to the trial either of a capital crime, or penal trespass: then Sempronius spake and said flatly, that he laid upon him a criminal action of treason against the State: and requested of C. Calpurnius the L. chief Justice of the City, for to have a day of hearing and judicial trial by the people. Then the defendant cast about to help himself by another remedy, namely, in case he could compass that M Q. Fulvius his brother might possibly be present at the Session when he should be judged: who at that time was a man of great credit and reputation, in regard both of the name that went on him for his noble acts, and of that great hope which men had of him, that he was like presently to be Master of Capua. But when this said Q. Fulvius had requested so much by letters, ended to that purpose as effectually as he could devise, and to move commiseration and pity in behalf of the life of his brother, the L. of the Senat returned this answer unto him again, That it was not for the good of the State that he should depart from Capua: thereupon, before the Sessions day was come, Cn. Fulvius departed of his own accord into exile to Tarquinius, and the Commons made an act and confirmed that banishment of his to be a just, due, and sufficient punishment for his offence.

During these businesses at Rome, the whole strength and force of war was bent against Capua, and yet the City was rather straightly beleghered than forcibly assaulted: inasmuch as neither the servants or bondmen, nor the common people were able to endure the famine any longer: and send unto Annibal any messengers, they possibly could not by reason of the straight watch and ward that the Romans kept, so near one unto the other. At length there was a certain Numidian offered to go and to escape clear away, who having taken letters unto Annibal to put him in mind to be as good as his promise, departed in the night, and passed through the midst of the Roman camp, and put the Campains in very good hope, to issue forth at all the gates, and to make a rally upon the enemy, whilst their power and strength served them. And verily in many scufflings and skirmishes which they made, they got the better for the most part in horse-fight, but lightly their footmen had ever the worse. The Romans for their parts were nothing so much pleased when they had the upperhand at any time, as they were disconcerted and ill apaid, to receive a toll in any kind of service of them, who were not only besieged, but in manner overcome already and conquered. So they devised a means in the end, to make up and supply by industry and policy the defect they had in strength and force. They chose out of all the Legions certain lusty young men, such as for clean strength of body, and lightness withall, were most nimble and swift.

A swift. These had every one of them, a light buckler or target, shorter than commonly horsemen have, and seven javelins or darts apiece, four foot long, with iron heads at one end, like as those Javelins have, which they use to lance that are lightly armed, and begin skirmishes. And every horseman took up one of these behind him on horseback, and used them, both to fit the horse and ride; and also to leap down on foot, with great activity and agility, at the signal and token given them. Now, when as, after daily practice and exercise, they were able to do it nimble enough, and without fear, they advanced forth into the plain, lying between their camp, and the wall of the City, and affronted the horsemen of the Campains, as they stood arranged in bat-tall array: and so soon as they were come within darts cast, the light javelottiers aforesaid, dismounted from their horses, at a sign given them: and behold, all of a sudden, out of the Cavalry there was a battalion of footmen arranged, who charged the men of arms of the enemies, and let flie their thor with great force, dart after dart, which they lanced so thick, that they galled many a horse, and wounded also many horsemen. Howbeit, their fear was much greater, by reason of the strange and unexpected manner of fight. The Roman horsemen seeing their enemies thus affrighted, set too hard, and charged them upon lustily, chased them and beat them down even to the City gates. After this the Romans were the better in horse-service also. And hereupon began the manner from henceforth, to entertain such light armed javelottiers, called Falces, even among the Legions. The first devil of this mingling of footmen among the horsemen they say was one Q. Navius a Centurion, and that he was highly honoured by the General for his invention.

Whiles things stood thus at Capua, Annibal was greatly distracted in mind, and possessed with two contrary cogitations, whether he should go to gain the Cattle of Tarentum, or to rescue and save the City of Capua. At last the regard of Capua prevailed with him: for he saw that as well friends as enemies depended thereupon, and had their mind and eye wholly bent that way: as being a City like to give the very trial and proof, what would the issue be generally of all the revolt and rebellion from the Romans. Leaving therefore behind him a great part of his carriage in the Brutians country, and all his soldiery heavily armed, he made haste into Campania, with an elect power of foot and horse, such as he supposed most meet and best appointed for expedition and riddance of way: yet as fast as he marched, there followed after him three and thirty Elephants, and so he late him down closely in a secret valley behind the mountain Tifflus, which overlooketh the City Capua. At the first coming he forced the fort called Gatula, and compelled the garrison there to quit the place, and then he turned and opposed himself against the enemies who besieged Capua. But he dispatched certain couriers afore unto Capua to signify unto them at what time he minded to let upon the camp of the Romans: that they also at the very instant might be ready to issue forth at every gate of the City to do the like. The Romans having no fore-knowledge by their elpials of this occurrence, were mightily terrified: for Annibal himself assailed them one way, and all the Campains as well foot as horsemen (together with the garrison soldiery of the Carthaginians under the leading of Doflar and Hanno their captains) sallied out another way. The Romans therefore being driven to their shifts, as well as they might in so sudden and fearful a case, had an eye to this, not to make head altogether one way, and so to leave the rest quite without defence: therefore they divided their forces in this manner among themselves: Appius Claudius opposed himself against the Campains: and Fulvius against Annibal, Claudius Nero the Vice-Prætor, with the horsemen belonging to the sixth legion, quartered upon the way that leadeth to Suesfula: and C. Fulvius Placcus the Lieutenant with the horsemen of Allies, took up his standing and planted himself over against the river Vulturinus. The battell began not after the usual manner, only with shouts and outcries, but besides all other clamours of men neighing of horses, and rattling of armour, there was a multitude of Campains good for no other service of war, placed upon the walls, who together with ringing and sounding of basons and vessels of brass (as the manner is in the still dead time of the night, when the moon is in the je. liple) made such an hideous noise, that it caused even them that were in fight to be amuted thereupon, and to listen after it. Appius with small ado repulsed the Campains from the trench and rampier. But Fulvius on the other part had more trouble to deal with Annibal and the Carthaginians, who charged so fiercely upon him, that the sixth legion there gave ground and retreated: which being once beat back, a Squadron of Spaniards and three Elephants passed forwards as far as the rampier, and had already broken through the main battell of the Romans: but they were in suspence between doubtful hope and present danger, thinking one while to break through and pass into the Camp; and doubtful another while to be excluded from the rest of their companies. F. Hann seeing this fear of the Legion and pe. ill wherein the Camp stood, encourageth and exhorteth Q. Navius and other principal Centurions, to assail valiantly, to kill and hew in pieces that one company of the enemies which were fighting under the counter-carp. "For all now lieth a bleeding, quoth he, and in extreme hazard:
"for either you must give the enemies way, and then will they more easily enter into the camp, then
"they had already pierced through the thick fignons of the battell: or else ye must defeat and "slay them in the place even under the trench. And that quoth he were no difficult piece of ser"vice, considering they are but few in number, severed and shut out clean from the succour of "their fellows: and the same Roman battalion which seemeth now disbanded and open, whilst
"it is affrighted, if so be it would make head and turn both sides upon the enemy, were able to

"compass round and environ them, and put them to a doubtful hazard, yea, and cut them in pieces within the midst. Navinus had no sooner heard the General speak these words, but he caught the ensign of the second band of Hastati from the ensign-bearer, and displayed it in the faces of the enemies, threatening to fling it among the midst of them, unless his souldiers made the better haste to follow him, and settle themselves to fight. He was a goodly tall and personable man of body, his brave armor besides set him out and beautified his person: and withall, the advancing of his ensign on high, drew every mans eye upon him, as well enemies as friends. But when he was approached once to the banners of the Spaniards, then from all hands they spared him not, but canceled at him their barbed javelins, and the whole battell in manner was bent only against him. But neither the multitude of enemies, nor the volley of their shot, was able to repress and rebut the violence of that one man. Likewise M. Attilius a Lieutenant, caused the ensign-bearer of the first band of the Principes, belonging to the same Legion, to enter with his ensign upon the cohort and troop of the Spaniards. The Lieutenants also L. Porcius Licinius and T. Popilius, who had the guarding of the camp, fought valiantly upon the rampier in defence thereof, and killed the Elephants upon the very counterescarp, as they were passing over and entering the camp. And by occasion that their bodies filled up the ditch, the enemies had a passage made them into the camp, as it were over a causey or bridge raised of purpose to give them way: and there over the very carcasses of the Elephants, there was a cruell slaughter committed. But on the other side of the camp, the Campains and the garrison of the Carthaginians had the repulse already: and under the very gate of Capua which openeth upon the river Vulturinus, there was another skirmish, where the Romans striving to enter the town, were not so much put back and withstood by force of armed men, as by brakes, scorpions, and other engines of ordnance, which being mounted and planted upon the very gate, discharged shot so violently, that they drove the enemies farther off. Over and besides, the forcible and furious assault of the Romans was danted and suppressed, by reason that their General himself, Ap. Claudius, was hurt; who as he was encouraging his men to fight in the very forefront of the vanguard, happened to be wounded with a dart above in his breast under the left shoulder: yet there were an exceeding number of enemies there slain before the gate, and the rest were driven for fear to make haste and get the City over their heads. Annibal also perceiving the Cohort of the Spaniards lying along dead, and the camp of the enemies so manfully defended, even to the death: gave over farther assault, and began to retire his ensigns, and to turn backward all his footmen, interposing his horsemen behind them, for fear the enemy should charge them on the tail. The legions were exceeding eager to pursue after the enemies: but Flaccus commanded to sound the retreat, supposing they had done well enough already, and effected two things, to wit, that both the Campains law in how little stead Annibal served them: and also Annibal himself knew and perceived no less. Some writers that have recorded this battell, set down that of Annibal his Army there were slain that day eight thousand men, and of Campains three thousand: that the Carthaginians lost fifteen ensigns, and the Campains eighteen. But in others, I find that the conflict was not so great, and that the fight was much more than the skirmish: for when as the Numidians and Spaniards together with the Elephants brake at unawares into the Roman Camp, those Elephants as they passed through the midst thereof, overthrew and laid along many of the tents and pavilions: and the Sumpter-horses and other beasts there for carriage, with great noise brake their halters, and collars, fled for fear, and bare down all afore them as they went. And that besides this tumultuous fright and confusion, Annibal dealt fraudulently, by sending in among the rest certain that could speak the Latine tongue (for some such he had about him) who in the Confils name gave commandment (since that the Camp was lost) that every souldier should make shift for himself, and flee to the next mountains.
But this deceit was soon elipted and prevented with the loss and slaughter of a number of enemies: and the Elephants were coured out of the Camp with fire. But howsoever this battell was either begun or ended, the last it was fought there, before that Capua was yielded up and surrendered.

The Mediftruticus (for so they call the head Magistrate and Governor of the City of Capua) for that year, was one Seppius Lelius, a man of base parentage and mean calling. The report goeth, that his mother upon a time as she made satisfaction in the name of him (being then fatherless and under age) by a purgatory sacrifice, for a prodigious domestic portent, that happened in her house, was told by the Soothsayer out of his learning, that one day the chief government of Capua should befall to that child: whereat, the seeing no likelihood nor hope at all of any such matter, said thus again, You talk of a poor City of Capua, when that day comes: and God save all, when my son shall be advanced to the highest place and government thereof. But these words (spoken at random and in jest, proved afterwards good earnest, and true indeed. For when as the Citizens were driven to great straits, through sword and famine, and were past all hope of recovery: in such sort, as they that were of quality and born for honour, refused to be in place of authority, this Lelius complaining that Capua was forlorn, betrayed, and abandoned by her own nobility, took upon him the chief Magistracy, and was the last of all the Campains that bare sovereignty rule in that City.

Annibal perceiving, that neither his enemies would be drawn forth any more to fight: nor possibly he could break through their camp for to come unto Capua: for fear lest that the new Consuls should stop all the passages, and intercept his purveyance of victuals, determined to dislodge without

A without effecting his purpose, and to remove from Capua. And as he call and toiled to and fro in his mind what course to take, and whither to go: it came into his head to make no more ado, but to march directly to Rome, the very head and seat-City of the whole war. This was the upshot of all, and the empire that he most desired. Howbeit as all others much grieved and greatly blamed him, that he had over-slipt the opportunity when it was, even presently upon the battell at Canna:
to himself acknowledged no less that he was mightily overseen. And yet the thing was not so far past (he thought) that he should despair, but upon some sudden fright and unexpected tumult, he might seize of some quarter of the City or other. And if Rome were one in that hazard, neither both the Roman Generals, or one at the least, would immediately leave the siege of Capua.
B Who if they had once divided their forces, both of them would be the weaker, and minister el-ther unto him, or to the Campains some occasion of good fortune. The only thing that troubled his mind was this, for fear lest that as soon as his back were turned, the Campains would yield themselves unto the Romans. He therefore with large and liberal rewards induceth a certain Numidian (an audacious and adventurous fellow, one that cared not what dangers he undertook) to be the carrier of certain letters, and to enter into the camp of the Romans, countreiting himself to be a fugitive, from the adverse part unto them: and so when hee had his time to slip secretly from the other side of the camp to Capua. The letters were very comfortable, importing unto them, "That his remove and departure from thence was for their good and safety, whereby he meant to withdraw the Roman Captains and their forces from Capua to the defence of their own City of Rome: willing them not to let fall their hearts and be discouraged: for by this abiding some few daies they should be wholly freed and delivered of the siege. Then he made stay of all the shipping and vessels that he could find upon the river Vulturinus, and commended them to be brought to Castellum, which he had fortified aforesaid with a pile or Castle to guard and keep the place with a garrison. And having intelligence that there was such store of barges and bottoms upon the river, as would serve to transport in one night his whole army: he made provision of victuals for ten daies, brought down his army by night to the river side, and, rolled the water with all his power before the next day-light. But this was not carried so secretly but before that it was effected, intelligence was given thereof by certain runagate fugitives: whereupon Fulvius Flaccus addressed his letters unto the Senate of Rome, and gave notice thereof. At D which tidings men according to their sundry fancies and humours were diversly affected: and as to fearful an occurrence required incontinently the Senate assembled.

P. Cornelius, surnamed Africus, was of opinion, that all the Captains and Armies whatsoever should be called home out of all parts of Italy, without regard of Capua or any other exploit besides, save only the defence of the City. Fabius Maximus thought it was dishonest, lewd, and a shamefull part, to depart from the siege of Capua, and to be scared to turn here and there, and to be carried away with every copy of Annibal his countenance, and with his vain threats and menaces. He that won a victory at Canna, and durst not then go forward to the City, hath he conceived any hope now to win Rome, being already repulled from Capua? No, he marcheth toward Rome, not minding to besiege it, but hoping to raise the siege from Capua. And however it E be, I am assured (quoth he) that Jupiter (the witness of covenants broken by Annibal) and other gods besides, will defend us with the help of that army which we shall find at home in the City. Between these two opinions P. Valerius Flaccus held the mean, and prevailed: for he having a regard and due consideration, both of the one and the other: thought good to write unto the Colonels that lay before Capua, and to certify them what strength they had of able men to defend the City: as for the forces of Annibal; and what power was needfull to maintain the siege at Capua, they themselves knew best. Therefore in case that one of the Pro-Consuls there, and part of the army might be spared from thence and sent to Rome, and nevertheless, the siege continue with the conduct of the other Pro-Consul, and the rest of the army: then Claudius and Ful-vius should to order the matter between themselves, that the one of them might remain till before Capua at siege, and the other repair to Rome, for to defend and keep their native country from the same danger. Hereupon the Senate agreed, and made an Act: which being brought unto Ca-pua, Q. Fulvius the vice-Consul who was to go to Rome, by reason that his Colleague was sick of his hurt, chose out of the three armies certain companies of souldiers, and so with fifteen thousand footmen, and one thousand horsemen, passed over the river Vulturinus. Then having certain intelligence, that Annibal minded to march along the Latine (tree way: he took his journey through the towns and burroughs situate upon the way Appia, and sent his couriers before unto Seria, Sera, and Lavinium, which are seated near unto it, not only for lay provision of victuals ready for him in their Cities and towns, but also from the country villages farther out of the way, to bring their provision to that port through-fare: and to draw forces into their towns for their own defence, and every one to stand upon their good guard, and to look unto their state, as well publicke G as private.

Annibal the same day that he had crossed Vulturinus encamped not far from the river. And the morrow after entered into the territory of the Sidicins, and led his host near unto Caler. There, after he had laid one day, foraging and spoiling the country, he marched by Suofula, into the territories of Alifus and Casertum, by the way of the Latine street. Under the town Casertum he abode in camp two daies, and raised booties here and there in every place. From thence leaving Interapina and Aquinum, he came into the country about Fregelle, as far as to the river Liris, where where he found the bridge cut down by the Fregellans, for to impeach and let his journey. Fulvius likewise was slain at the river Fulturnus, by reason that the barges and bottoms were burnt by Annibal: and much ado he had, for the great scarcity of timber and wood, to make pines and boats for to set over his army. But Fulvius, after he had once transported his men in such boats and plankas was made shift withall, had afterwards no hindrance in his journey: but found not only force of victuals in the Towns and Cities as he travelled, but also plenty thereof brought ready for him to the waies side right courteously. Then the souldiers as they marched on foot cheered and encouraged one another to mend their pace and make speed, considering they went to the defence of their natural country. Now there was a post sent from Fregella, who rode night and day and never made stay, and he put the City in exceeding fear. The running together besides of the people, that ceased not to make every thing more than it was, and to invent something of their own fingers ends, and put it to the news that they heard, made a greater hurry than the messenger himself, and let the City in an upore. And not only the women were heard to weep and wail in their own private houses: but also from all parts the Dames of the City came flocking into the streets, running about to all the Churches and Chappels of their gods and goddesses, sweeping the Altars with the tresses of their hair hanging down, kneeling upon the bare ground, and stretching out their hands up toward heaven unto the gods, pouring out their prayers and supplications. That they would vouchsafe to preserve the City of Rome out of the hands of the enemies, and to save the Roman wives and their little children from harm and all abuse. The body of the Senat gave attendance upon the Magistrates in the common place, ready to give them their advice and counsell. Some receive of them direction, and departed every man to execute his charge: others offer themselves to the Magistrates, to be employed in any service whatsoever. Sundry guards were bestowed in the Castle, in the Capitoll, and upon the walls: all places about the City were well manned. The Alban mountain also and the Castle of Tusculum were furnished with good garrisons. Amidst this alarm tidings came, that Q. Fulvius the Pro-Consul, was departed from Capua, and onward on his journey to Rome with an army. And because he should not be abridged of his power and authority, after he was come into the City, there was a decree granted out of the Senat-House, that Q. Fulvius should have as large a commission of rule and command as the Consuls themselves. Annibal, after he had made souldier work and havoc in the territory of Fregella, than in other places, for anger that they had cut down the bridges against his coming, led his army through the Frusinæ, Ferentinat, and Anagnine countries, and came forwards into the territory Lavicos: and so by Algidum he marched toward Tusculum. And when he could not be let in there within the walls, he defended beneath Tusculum, on the right hand to Gabii: from whence he conducted his army into Pupinia, and eight miles from Rome encamped. The nearer the enemy approached to the City, the greater laughter was made of the peasants that fled from him, by his vancuerris, the Numidian light-horsemen whom he sent afore to make riddance. And many there were of all conditions and ages that were taken captive.
